Vers. 16, 17. Moab's destruction . . . splendid rod. So near and certain is the destruction of Moab that his neighbors and friends are called upon to bemoan the overthrow of this power so highly extolled hitherto by themselves.—Bemoan him. Comp. xv. 5; xvi. 5; xxii. 10.—Neighbors (comp. xlv. 14; xlviii. 39; xlix. 5), literally those round about him, therefore most intimately acquainted with him, ye who know his name, being the more distant acquaintances. (Comp. the related expressions in Ps. lxxxvii. 4; Job xix. 18; xlii. 11; Ps. lvi. 14; lxxxviii. 9, 19).—The mighty stem. Comp. Ps. cx. 2; Ezek. xix. 12, 14.

6. Message to the Fugitives on the Arnon.

XLVIII. 18-25.

- 18 Come down from thy glory and seat thyself in the thirsty,¹
Thou inhabitant daughter of Dibon!²
For the spoiler of Moab is advancing against thee,
He destroyeth thy strongholds.
19 Place thyself by the wayside and look out,
Thou inhabitress of Aroer;
Ask of the fugitive and her who is escaped!³
Say, What hath been done?⁴
20 "Moab is confounded, for she is broken down."⁵
Howl and cry!⁶
Proclaim it on the Arnon, that Moab is destroyed;
21 And judgment has come on the land of the plain,
On Holon and on Jahazah, and on Mephaath,
22 And on Dibon, Nebo and Beth-diblathaim,
23 And on Kiriathaim, Beth-gamul and Beth-meon,
24 And on Kerioth and Bozrah,
And on all the cities of the land of Moab, far or near.
25 The horn of Moab is broken off,
And his arm is shattered"—saith Jehovah.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ Ver. 18.—Judging from the parallel passage (Isa. xlvii. 1) we must read with the Keri צָמָא, צָמָא everywhere also signifies thirst. "To seat one's self in the thirst," however, sounds very strange. We must then either punctuate צָמָא, or regard צָמָא as a collateral form of צָמָא (comp. צָמָא with צָמָא, Gen. xlix. 12; חָלַב with חָלַב, Exod. xxiii. 19). In Latin also sitientia is used for regionis aride. Comp. PLIN. Hist. N. X. 73; XII. 28; XXV. 11.

² Ver. 18.—שַׁבַּת בֶּת-דִּיבּוֹן. This form of expression is found besides here only in xlv. 19. The construction is as in צִיּוֹן בֶּת-דִּיבּוֹן, Isa. xxxvii. 22. Comp. NAEGLSB. Gr., § 64, 4.

³ Ver. 19.—וּנְמִלְטָה. The different gender is to express the variety. On the irregular accentuation of נְמִלְטָה comp. OLSH., § 253 and 363.

⁴ Ver. 19.—וְהָיָה וְהָיָה and its difference from the masc. (the idea of multiplicity involved in the feminine) comp. NAEGLSB. Gr., § 60, 6 b.

* Ver. 20.—The alteration of the Keri (to accord with the following קִרְיָתַיִם) is unnecessary, since the fem. form of the imperf. evidently attaches itself to the preceding עָכָר, etc. Accordingly it is Aroer, which is addressed, not Moab.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

An animated picture! First some concrete forms of cities are directly addressed: Dibon is to go down, Aroer to question the fugitives (vers. 18, 19). The answer of the latter is sad enough. Arrived on the Arnon, where Aroer is situated, and thus on the borders of the mishor, they proclaim that it is at an end with Moab, for all the cities of the northern half of the country are taken (vers. 20-24). From this it follows as the total result, that the power of Moab is broken (ver. 25).

Ver. 18. Come down . . . thy strongholds. Isa. xlvii. 1 was here in the prophet's mind, "Come down and sit in the dust, O virgin daughter of Babylon."—On Dibon, which, as we conclude from thy strongholds, was a fortified city and was situate a league north of the Arnon, comp. Num. xxxii. 8, 34; Josh. xiii. 9, 17; Isa. xv. 2; RAUMER, Pal. S. 261.

Ver. 19. Place thyself . . . done. To the inhabitants of Aroer, the southern boundary city of the מִישׁוֹר (comp. rems. on ver. 8) the sad summons is addressed to go out into the street, to spy out (comp. Nah. ii. 2) and then to make inquiries from the approaching train of the fugitives.

Vers. 20-25. Moab . . . saith Jehovah. These verses contain the answer of the escaped.

—Judgment. The choice of the expression is occasioned by the mishor, plain, which signifies not merely plain, but æquitas, justitia. Comp. Ps. xxix. 11; xlv. 7; lxvii. 5. Judgment is thus to come upon the land, whose name also signifies "land of righteousness." The cities mentioned afterwards are all in the Mishor. Holon (different from another in Judah, Josh. xv. 51) is mentioned here only. Jahaza (Comp. Isa. xv. 4; Num. xxi. 23; Josh. xiii. 18; Jud. xi. 20) lay, according to EUSEBIUS and JEROME, in the vicinity of Medaba. Comp. RAUMER, S. 263.

—Mephaath is elsewhere called מִפְעַת (Josh. xiii. 18) or מִפְעַת (Josh. xxi. 37; 1 Chron. vi. 64). According to the passages cited from the book of Joshua it belongs to the tribe of Reuben and to the Mishor.—Dibon. Comp. rems. on ver. 18.—Nebo. Comp. rems. on ver. 1.—Beth-diblathaim is not mentioned elsewhere in the Old Testament. Its position is clear from the statement of JEROME, that Jahaza was situated between Medaba and Diblathaim. (Vid. Onomasticon s. v. Jaffa).—Kiriathaim. Comp. rems. on ver. 1.—Beth-gamul occurs here only. If PORTER is correct in recognizing Bozrah, Kerieth and Beth-gamul in the present ruined cities of the Hauran, Bosra, Kureiyeh and El Jemal, we have here three cities not in Moab, but separated from it by the entire territory of the Ammonites. Comp. RAUMER, Pal. S. 251, 2. This hypothesis is, however, improbable, since real Moabitish cities can be shown for Bozrah and Kerieth. See below.—Beth-meon was named in full Beth-baal-meon (Josh. xiii. 17); elsewhere Baal-meon (Num. xxxii. 38), and is designated among the other places as belonging to the Mishor and to the tribe of Reuben. Comp. RAUMER, S. 259 and 264.—Kerieth. Comp. ver. 41 and Am. ii. 2. SEETZEN found a place on Mt. Attarus (comp. עֲטָרָת Num. xxxii. 34, 35) called El-Karriât, which he decidedly regards as Kerieth not Kiriathaim. Comp. RAUMER, S. 251, 2.—Bozrah. There is a Bozrah mentioned as in Edom (comp. rems. on xlix. 13) and one as in the Hauran, but the latter not in the Bible. It was the Bostra of the Romans, the birth-place of Philippus Arabs. Immense ruins still testify to the importance of the city. Comp. RAUMER, S. 244. Since, however, a place בֹּזְרָה in the Mishor is expressly mentioned (Deut. iv. 43; Josh. x. 8; xxi. 36), and since the LXX. always render this name by Bócop, we do not hesitate to recognize בֹּזְרָה in this בֹּזְרָה.—And on all the cities, etc. From the context it can only be the cities to the north of Aroer which are meant, for according to ver. 19 sqq., the fugitives announce to the people of Aroer that both the cities further to the north, and also those more to the south in the vicinity of Aroer were already taken. From this it follows that the whole northern half of the country was in the hands of the enemy, and consequently Moab's horn and arm (the biblical types of dominion and strength, comp. Ps. lxxv. 5, 11, 1 Sam. ii. 31; Ps. x. 15) are broken.

II. The Reasons of the Punitive Judgment (XLVIII. 26-42.)

1. Moab's Pride and his Punishment in General.

XLVIII. 26-30.

- 26 Make ye him drunken, for against Jehovah hath he magnified himself!
And Moab may wallow¹ in his vomit,
And he also may become a derision!
27 Or² was not Israel a derision³ unto thee,
When he was found⁴ among the thieves?
Yea, for at each of thy words concerning him thou shookest thyself.
28 Leave the cities and dwell in the rock, ye inhabitants of Moab,
And be as the dove that maketh her nest on the walls of the yawning ravine.
29 We have heard the arrogance of Moab, the very arrogant,⁵
His loftiness, and his arrogance and his pride and the haughtiness of his heart
30 I know, saith Jehovah, his insolence
And the nothingness of his boastings; nothing have they effected.⁶

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ Ver. 26.—פָּפַק an onomatopoeitic word, denotes originally "to spank, to clap." Comp. פָּפַקְתִּי עַל יָרֵךְ, xxxi. 12. Then it is frequently used of striking hands: Num. xxiv. 10; Job xxxiv. 37; Lam. ii. 15.—פָּפַק is used in part for פָּפַק (Job xxvii. 23), and in part as an independent root with meaning sufficere. In the latter signification it occurs, however, in the Hebrew of the Old Testament only in the imperfect פָּפַקְתִּי (1 Ki. xx. 10), and (perhaps) in the Hiphil (Isa. ii. 6), and besides (perhaps) the substantive פָּפַק (Job xxxvi. 18). Yet in consequence of the interchange of the related radical פָּפַק occurs in Job xx. 22, as also in the Aramaic פָּפַק and פָּפַקְתִּי in the sense of sufficiency and superfluity. Here it is evident that the rendering "that Moab had superfluity in his vomit" (Müller) is feeble, and moreover unsafe, since the prefix פָּ is striking, and it is not proved that the meanings of sufficiency (of the things) and of having a superfluity (of the persons) are united in the verb. The common radical meaning of פָּפַק to strike, to clap, gives a perfectly satisfactory sense. Comp. Isa. xix. 14.

² Ver. 27.—וְאִם—or? Comp. NABELES. Gr., § 107, 4. In the second clause of the disjunctive question וְאִם (with a following Dag. forte. Comp. NABELES. Gr., § 53, 3 Anm.) is repeated as in Gen. xvii. 17; Ps. xciv. 9.

³ Ver. 27.—פָּפַק=object of derision as in Job xii. 4.

⁴ Ver. 27.—The fem. פָּפַקְתִּי is unjustly suspected by the Masoretes. Comp. rem. on פָּפַקְתִּי, ver. 20.

⁵ Ver. 29.—אֲדָמָה is an adjective (Comp. Isa. ii. 12; Ps. xciv. 2), and to be referred to Moab.

⁶ Ver. 30.—Isa. xvi. 6 concludes with פָּפַקְתִּי עַל יָרֵךְ. Here the words עַל יָרֵךְ, also are added. And the Masoretes punctuate so as to connect פָּפַקְתִּי with עַל יָרֵךְ as its subject. We cannot, however, doubt that פָּפַקְתִּי, in accordance with the fundamental passage, belongs to פָּפַק. It would then be "the nothingness (comp. 2 Ki. xvii. 9; Prov. xv. 7) of his boastings (Isa. xlv. 25; Job xi. 3)," while the words עַל יָרֵךְ seem to declare the nothingness of his deeds.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

To ver. 42 the prophet describes specially the judgment of God on the criminal arrogance of Moab, which he manifested particularly towards Israel and Israel's God. First, generally, (vers. 26-30) the disgraceful fate of a drunken man, who falls into his own vomit (ver. 26), is announced as a just punishment for the scorn, with which they always treated Israel when chastised by his God (ver. 27), and further, the fate of the dove driven into the fearful clefts of the rock (ver. 28) as a punishment for his insolent and false arrogance (vers. 29, 30).

Vers. 26, 27. Make ye him . . . shookest thyself. A man, who is beastly intoxicated, falls into his own vomit, and how does he provoke to its full extent the derisive laughter of the beholder! So shall it be to Moab for his boasting against Jehovah. This making drunk reminds us of the figure of the cup of wrath (xxv. 16 coll. xiii. 18). As there, those who make drunk are those whom the Lord has appointed His agents in executing the punishment.—Magnified himself. Comp. ver. 42. The expression seems to be taken from Zeph. ii. 8, 10, an older prophecy against Moab. Comp. also Joel ii. 20.—The objection on the part of Moab that this is too severe a punishment is met with the intimation that Moab had done the same to the Israelites.—When he was found, etc. This is usually also taken as a question. But was not Israel really often caught in thievery and punished for it? Jeremiah expressly affirms this in ii. 26. What reason would Moab otherwise have had for scorning Israel? I therefore regard DM as a particle of time=when, as often as (Num. xxi. 9; Gen. xxxviii. 9). It is then thus admitted that Israel had been more than once caught in criminal conduct and punished, but observe that it is said among thieves. In this there is an allusion to the fact that Israel was only seduced by others, and that the principal thieves, to which Moab belonged, were his heathen neighbors.—Yea, for, etc. This is the answer to the question. We supply Yea.—מִן=pro sufficientia, pro ratione (Isa. lxvi. 23; Zech. xiv. 16), comp. xxxi. 20. From the latter passage we see also that (וְ) him is to be referred to thy words.—Shook-est thyself. This may be shaking of the head (comp. xviii. 16) or shrugging of the shoulders, but equally in either case is it an expression of scorn.

Ver. 28. Leave . . . yawning ravine. The preceding figure was adapted to humble Moab's national pride, the present relates to his warlike pride. They boasted greatly of their valor in war (ver. 14), and doubtless also of their excellent fortifications (comp. ver. 18). They are now told that they will be driven from their bulwarks and into the rocky mountains, there like a wild pigeon to pass a troubled, ever threatened existence.—On the walls. The word is found besides only in Isa. vii. 20, where it undoubtedly signifies beyond. עַל, however, signifies not merely the side beyond, but the side generally. (Comp. xlix. 32; 1 Ki. v. 4; Exod. xxxii. 15). On the doves in Palestine comp. HAZOO, Real-Enc., XV. S. 425.

Vers. 29, 30. We have heard . . . effected. These two verses are no more than a reproduction, extended by a few additions, of Isa. xvi. 6 in accord with Zeph. ii. 10. In this quotation the prophet expresses the thought, which is expected as a foundation to vers. 26-28, viz., an answer to the question, whence comes on the one hand Moab's scorn towards Jehovah and His people, on the other, the particularly severe punishment of the same? Answer: to the pride of Moab corresponds both his scorn against Israel and the chastisement, which he receives on the part of Jehovah. Hence the prophet labors by an accumulation of terms to describe the arrogance of the Moabites as surpassing all bounds.

2. Moab utterly Destroyed.

XLVIII. 81-85.

- 31 Therefore I howl over Moab,
And over Moab, the whole of it, I cry.
Over the men of Kir-heres there is sighing.¹
- 32 My tears over Jazer flow even to thee, thou vine of Sibmah:
Thy shoots are gone over the sea,
Even to the sea of Jazer they did reach.
On thy fruit harvest and thy vintage is the spoiler fallen;
- 33 And joy and gladness is taken from the fruit fields and the land of Moab;
And I cause the wine to fail from the wine presses;
They will not tread with shouting,—
With a shouting that is no shouting.
- 34 From the cry of Heshbon even to Elealeh,
Unto Jahaz they raise their voice:
From Zoar to Horonaim, the three year old heifer,²
For even the waters of Nimrim shall be desolations.³
- 35 And I destroy Moab, saith Jehovah,
Him who ascends⁴ the high places and burns incense to his gods.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ Ver. 31.—The correction מִן, which MEIER allows himself, is unnecessary and not sufficiently authorized by the examples adduced by him (Mic. vi. 10, אִשׁ for שׁ; ver. 11, אִזְכָּר for זָכָר; וְיִזְכָּר for וְיִזְכָּר).

² Ver. 34.—עֵלֶיךָ is used of nations in xlv. 20; i. 11; Hos. iv. 16; x. 11. The genitive עֵלֶיךָ is explained by analogies like בְּשֵׁנֵי הַרְבֵּעִית, anno quartæ, i. e., numeri (Jer. xlv. 2; ii. 59; 2 Ki. xvii. 6), מִשְׁפַּט אֲדָמָה (Lev. xxiv. 22), אֲדָמָה (2 Ki. xii. 10).

from Isalah, where it is fully in place. In the present passage it can only introduce a single point in corroboration of the main proposition (ver. 31).

Ver. 35.—Is יָקַח a participle or a substantive? Grammatically the latter is the easier (comp. ver. 5), but the discrepancy with יָקַח is disturbing. We may take it then in the direct causative meaning (ascensum faciens. Comp. on xiviii. 5, 2), and observe the remark of GAUF that correspondence with this word occasioned the choice of the Hiphil participle.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

After the reason and manner of the judgment on Moab have been set forth in general, the latter is now described more in particular. This is done by the prophet's first expressing (ver. 31 a) what feeling he has in consequence of his knowledge of the destruction threatening all Moab (i. e., no longer merely the northern half as in vers. 18-25), and then turns to single places of the whole land, with special emphasis on the destruction which is impending on the vine and fruit culture of Moab (vers. 32, 33), as well as the worship of the idols connected therewith (ver. 35).

Ver. 31. Therefore . . . there is sighing. This verse begins with a free rendering of Isa. xvi. 7. While there the third person is used, here Jeremiah speaks in the first person, being evidently himself shocked by the fearful import of the message which he has to deliver. Comp. Isa. xv. 5; xvi. 9, 11; xxi. 3 and DRECHSLER ad loc.—In the words, the whole of it, he declares that here he has not merely the northern half of the country, the Mishor, but the whole country in view, mentioning a series of cities from the north to the extreme south (ver. 34).—Over the men, etc. In the original passage it reads "over the raisin-cakes of Kir-hareseth will ye sigh, deeply troubled." There is no need of seeking aid from indistinctly written MSS., it being quite in Jeremiah's manner to substitute for a marked and strange expression, one softer and more usual. He has evidently omitted the concluding words and substituted אֲנָשִׁים (men) for אֲשָׁפִים (grapes, raisin-cakes). The second person plural would be in too strong a contrast to the first person in the hemistich, and therefore the third person singular masculine is chosen, which is to be taken in its impersonal sense.

Vers. 32, 33. My tears . . . no shouting. In Isa. xvi. 9 it reads "Therefore I will bewail with the weeping of Jazer." If we take יָקַח of the text in the sense of a comparison the connection in meaning with the original would disappear, and then no good ground for the comparative is apparent. Jaazer, according to the Onomast. (s. v. Azer and Jazer), was 15 m. p., Sibmah only five hundred paces from Heshbon. They were, therefore, neighboring towns in a fertile district abounding in fruit and wine. Since then they were thus, as it were, sisters, the centres of agriculture closely connected by solidarity of interest, and the blow which strikes one affects the other also, one is not to be bewailed alone, but both at the same time. This is essentially the meaning of יָקַח (in the weeping over Jaazer is contained also that over Sibmah) and of יָקַח (Sibmah participates in the tears which flow over Jaazer).—The district of Salt, in the vicinity of which Jaazer must have been situated (comp. RAUMER, S. 262, 3) is still very rich in vines. Comp. HERZOG, R.-Enc., XVII. S. 611.

The elements of the two following sentences also are found in Isa. xvi. 8, "branches" only instead of "shoots" and "sea," being wanting before Jazer. The sea of Jazer may denote only a pond or great basin. That the term may be so used is shown by the "sea" in the temple (1 Ki. vii. 23). "The sea of Jazer was probably some celebrated large pond, like the ponds of Heshbon, in which the water of the Wady (Nahr) Sir, which springs near by, was collected. SEETZEN found some ponds there still." DELITZSCH, Jes., S. 211 [Eng. Tr., p. 384]. RAUMER, Pal., S. 263, Ann. The hypothesis that the repetition of the word sea is based on a scriptural error is therefore unnecessary. The widely extended (even according to Isa. xvi. 7, 8, over the Dead Sea) wine-culture of Moab is poetically represented under the figure of a single vine. Comp. DRECHSLER [and ALEXANDER] on Isa. xvi. 8.—On thy fruit-harvest, etc. Comp. xl. 10, 12. Instead of vintage, which suits the connection better, we find in Isa. xvi. 9 "harvest," and instead of spoiler the more forcible but less distinct "shouting."—And joy, etc., from Isa. xvi. 10. Comp. Joel ii. 20; iv. 15. Carmel (fruit-fields) cannot possibly be a proper noun here. For what occasion had the prophet to make such a spring?

In Isa. xvi. 10, also stands כִּן הַפְּרָמִל, but there without the following and the land of Moab, and hence evidently in an appellative significance. The prophet would say: joy and gladness having vanished from the vineyards they have departed from the whole country.—And I cause, etc. These words are altered from Isa. xvi. 10 b, in a peculiar manner. Instead of they will not tread with shouting, we read in Isaiah "the treading shall tread out no wine in their presses." The following words contain the justification of the rendering given. It is emphasized that the treading will be altogether without shouting. A shouting will indeed be heard, not, however, such as pertains to the treading of grapes (xxv. 30), but another, a warlike shouting. The word is elsewhere only applied to war-cries, li. 14.

Ver. 34. From the cry . . . be desolations. These words to their voice are taken, with modifications from Isa. xv. 4. The cry of Heshbon, as it is called in Jeremiah, represents at the same time a place, and consequently serves as a terminus a quo. On Heshbon comp. rem. on ver. 2. Elealeh (now El Al) lies only half an hour from Heshbon. Comp. Numb. xxxii. 37; Isa. xvi. 19; RAUMER, S. 261. Jahaz (identical with Jahza, ver. 21) must, according to Numb. xxi. 23 have lain to the south-east, towards the desert. Zonr (comp. ver. 4) and Horonaim (ver. 3) represent the south country of the Moabites. We distinctly meet here the idea of the whole of Moab (ver. 31) in contrast to the limitation, in which Moab is spoken of in vers. 18-25. The individual elements are taken from Isa. xv. 5. There Eglath-shalishiyah appears to stand in apposition to Zoar. In the present passage it is as formally co-ordinated with the name Horonaim. Both are possible only if Eglath, etc., is either a place near both the cities in question, or a predicate equally applicable to both. The latter view is favored by the grammatical structure, for in the former case we should expect וְעַל זֹאֵר or וְעַל (comp. on Jahaz, ver. 21, etc.) In what sense, however, are these cities called Eglath-shalishiyah? KÖSTER (Stud. u. Krit., 1862, I., S. 113 ff.) perceives herein a topographical definition. Eglath was a Tripolis, and "Eglath of the third part" is equivalent to the third part of Eglath. Eglath is the principal name, Zoar and Horonaim the names of the two other parts. It is however surprising that of this group of cities, which must certainly have been of some importance, we find no trace elsewhere. We should also expect the reverse order. Shalishah-Eglath, and if Eglath, Zoar and Horonaim form one city, what is the cry from Zoar to Horonaim to mean? DELITZSCH (on Isa. S. 206) [Eng. Tr., p. 336] attaches himself to GZERNIUS and his predecessors (Vulg., Targ.) taking the words to signify "juvenca tertii, i. e., anni" = indomita, jugoque non assueta. Yet he does not refer the predicate to Moab (which can be done in Isaiah only with great harshness, and in Jeremiah not at all) but to Zoar "the beautiful, fortified, hitherto unconquered city." Although the reason why Zoar should be so called is not very transparent, the language compels us to give this exegesis the preference. Whether Horonaim deserved the predicate in the same degree as Zoar is a question of minor importance, for the transference to Horonaim, which is mentioned only one line after in Isa. xv. 5, can be only accidental.—For even, etc. Comp. Isa. xv. 6. If by וְעַל זֹאֵר we are to understand Beth-Nimrah, we shall thus be carried into the extreme north-west of the country, not inappropriately to the purport of the strophe. (Comp. the whole, ver. 31). The name and character of Beth-Nimrah favor the identity, for this place at the mouth of the Wady Shaib or Shoëb in the plain of the Jordan is still celebrated for its wealth of springs. Comp. WINEB, R.-W.-B., s. v. Bethnimra. Yet it must be confessed, that according to the connection, a place in the South, as the ruined Numère with the spring Moyet Numère (DELITZSCH, S. 207) [Eng. Tr., p. 327], might be meant.

Ver. 35. And I destroy . . . to his gods. The prophet has Isa. xv. 2 and xvi. 12 in mind. What he means by the words וְעַל זֹאֵר is not perfectly clear. They may mean, who erects the high places, throws them up (Hirzig) or, who offers on the height (literally: offerers of the height), or who ascends to the height; or, finally, the ascending to the height. Each of these renderings has its light and its shadow. In Isa. xvi. 12, however, the idea of going up to the sanctuary is expressed. Hence I give those explanations the preference which take וְעַל זֹאֵר in the sense of ascending.

3. The Lamentation for the Dead.

XLVIII. 86-88.

- 36 Therefore my heart sighs over Moab like flutes,
And my heart sighs like flutes over the men of Kir-heres;
Because the remnant¹ of what was gained has perished.
- 37 For every head is bald, and every beard cut short,
Upon all hands cuttings, and on the loins sackcloth!
- 38 On all the roofs of Moab and in his streets all is lamentation:²
For I have broken Moab like a vessel
Wherein there is no more pleasure, saith Jehovah.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ Ver. 36.—On the construct state of וְעַל זֹאֵר comp. NAEGLER, Gr., § 65, 2, 3.

² Ver. 38.—In regard to the construction, the abstract stands for the concrete. Comp. NAEGLER, Gr., § 59, 1.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

The prophet feels his heart to be, as it were, a mourning flute in view of the great loss of Moab (ver. 36) and this all the more that he perceives in Moab itself on every hand lamentation for the dead (vers. 37, 38 a). This is also warranted, for the Lord has broken Moab like a vessel which has become worthless (ver. 38 b.)

Ver. 36. Therefore . . . perished. This verse is parallel to ver. 31. For 1, both begin with therefore; 2, in both the object of the utterance of feeling is designated as Moab (hardly Ar Moab ver. 4, on account of "whole," ver. 31—and why should Jeremiah have constantly omitted the קר) and Kir-heres; in both cases an analogous thought is introduced by the particle "therefore:" there the expression of howling and crying, here the sighing of the heart compared with the tone of a funeral flute. "Therefore" in ver. 36 then refers not to the special calamities enumerated immediately before, but to that general description, which we have read in vers. 25-30. Moreover here also the single elements of the discourse are taken primarily from Isa. xv. This employment of foreign property explains much of the unevenness in the arrangement of the sentences. Isa. xvi. 11 and xv. 5 are in the prophet's mind, but he changes the harp, spoken of in Isa. xxi. 11 into the flute, as is correctly remarked, because the flute is the instrument used in mourning, and thus conformity is obtained with the funeral customs afterwards described. On the use of the flute in mournings for the dead comp. Matth. ix. 23. JOSEPH. Bell. Jud. III., 9, 5; OVID Fast. VI., 656; HERZOG, R.-Enc., XVI. S. 864.—Because, etc. The words are from Isa. xv. 7, but there they are the object of the following verb (נאצו) instead of which we here find perished. The words remnant, etc., must therefore be the subject of the verb, since נאצו never means "to lose" but only "to be lost, to perish." The plural of the predicate is explained by the collective meaning of the subject.—על-בן is also here taken from Isa. xv. 7, but it cannot possibly signify "therefore" as it does there. So unless we assume an error there is nothing left but to take it as equivalent to אשר בן-אשר, a meaning which is certainly not proved, since this very passage is adduced as the strongest evidence (comp. Geseu., Thes. pag. 669). A double reason is then given for the mourning of the prophet in ver. 36: 1. a mediate, ver. 36 b; 2. an immediate, vers. 37, 38 a. Whence dost thou know that all is lost? From the fact that all mourns.

Vers. 37, 38. For every head . . . Jehovah. Isa. xv. 2, 3 is the original passage. On Bald comp. vii. 29; xvi. 6. Instead of cut short (נרצו) Isaiah has "cut off" (נרצו) caesa. Isa. xxii. 1; HERZOG, R.-Enc. XVI., S. 868.—All is lamentation. In Isaiah "everything wails, melting into tears."—For I have broken, etc. The ground of the facts which cause the lamentation is, that (not chance, or any human or demoniac power, but) Jehovah has broken Moab. In like a vessel, etc., Jeremiah quotes himself, xxii. 28.

4. Pride comes before a Fall.

XLVIII. 89-97

- 39 How is she broken! How do they howl!
How has Moab turned the back shamefully!
And Moab shall become a derision
And a horror to all his neighbors.
- 40 For thus saith Jehovah: Behold like an eagle he flies,
And spreads his wings over Moab.
- 41 Taken are the cities,
And the fortresses captured,¹
And the heart of the heroes of Moab in that day Shall be like the heart of a parturient woman.²
- 42 And Moab shall be destroyed from being a nation,
For against Jehovah hath he magnified himself.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ Ver. 41.—קריית cannot here as in ver. 14, be a proper name on account of the following מערות. The plural קריות does not indeed occur in an appellative sense elsewhere, but this forms no objection, since the prophet may have chosen this form with reference to the names of the Moabitic cities. Comp. OLSH., § 146 d; 152 a.

³ Ver. 41.—The expression אשה מצרה (mulier uterum comprimens) occurs here and in xlix. 22 only. On the subject-matter comp. iv. 31.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

With ver. 38 the quotations from Isa. xv. and xvi. cease; the beginning of ver. 39 reminds us of the beginning of vers. 31 and 26; vers. 39 and 41 are evidently closely related, reproducing, as it were, the fundamental thought of vers. 26, 27 that Moab is to become a derision, because he has magnified himself against the Lord. I therefore take vers. 39-41 as one strophe. This begins with an exclamation: how is Moab broken, given up to shameful flight, and thus become an object of ridicule and horror (ver. 39)! This effect corresponds exactly to the cause, for a powerful enemy, comparable to a powerful eagle, is to come upon Moab (ver. 40). In consequence the fortified places are taken, the courage of all the warriors broken (ver. 41), and Moab stricken from the roll of nations. This is his punishment for having magnified himself against Jehovah.

Ver. 39. How is she . . . his neighbors. Moab is here again conceived of as feminine. Comp. rems. on ver. 20. Since this passage was generally in the prophet's mind, מִן־הָעַמִּים also must be taken in the meaning which it has there, viz., of being broken. (Comp. Isa. vii. 8). The first result of this being broken is howling. We however take מִן־הָעַמִּים as 3d pers. perf., since the imperative here, as afterwards in שׁוּב, does not suit the connection. The further consequence is shameful flight (שׁוּב to be regarded as in the accusative. Comp. Mic. i. 11). From all this it follows lastly that Moab is become two things, a derision (vers. 26, 27) and a terror (xvii. 17) to all his neighbors.

Ver. 40. For thus saith . . . over Moab.

—For is argumentative. The effect corresponds to the cause. The choice of figures is founded on Deut. xxviii. 49, where the people of Israel are assured in case of apostasy of severe judgment, to be executed by a nation coming from afar. In iv. 13 also there was an echo of this passage. It is possible that Isa. xlv. 11 was in the mind of the prophet, even as this present passage lay before the prophet Ezekiel, when in xvii. 3 he used the same figure of Nebuchadnezzar. Who the eagle is here the prophet does not say. If what we have said in the introduction concerning the date of composition of this and the contemporary prophecies against the Nations is correct, the present passage is in so far dissimilar to xlv. 18 in that there Nebuchadnezzar is mentioned just before (ver. 13). Here the non-mention is due to the circumstance that the prophet did not yet know who was the chosen instrument for the execution of the judgment.—And spreads, etc. Here also a passage from Deuteronomy (xxxii. 11) seems to have hovered before the prophet's mind. This however applies only to the expression, for here the spreading of wings is intended in an exactly opposite sense. Comp. also Job xxxix. 28. A repetition of this passage and of the following verse is found in xlix. 22.

Vers. 41, 42. Taken . . . magnified himself. The prophet here passes into the literal style of discourse.—From being, etc. Comp. ver. 2 and Isa. vii. 8.—For against Jehovah, etc. This points back to ver. 26, and here as there is to be regarded as a reminiscence from Zeph. ii. 8, 10. The prophet here brings to a close that part of his prophecy, which has the pride of Moab especially for its object.

III. Two Appendices with a Concluding Word (xlvi. 43-47).

1. Application to Moab of a passage from Isaiah.

XLVIII. 43, 44.

- 43 Terror¹ and ditch [pit] and trap² on thee,
Thou inhabitant of Moab,³ saith Jehovah.
44 He that fleeth⁴ from the terror shall fall into the ditch,
And he that riseth from the ditch shall be taken in the trap;
For I bring upon them, upon Moab,⁵
The year of their punishment, saith Jehovah.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ Ver. 43.—פֶּחַד fear, terror, is found besides in Jeremiah only in xxx. 5 and xlix. 5.

² Ver. 43.—פֶּחַח pit, only in ver. 28. פֶּחַח snare, only in the plural, xviii. 22. [The rendering ditch for pit and trap for snare is given to express the alliteration of the original pa'hadh, pa'hath, pa'h.—S. R. A.]

³ Ver. 43.—יֹשֵׁב מוֹאָב. This expression is entirely contrary to the usage of Jeremiah, as he never uses the singular in this connection. Isaiah however uses the singular in a similar connection.

⁴ Ver. 44.—The Chethibh מִן־הָעַמִּים (comp. FURST, Concord, S. 631, 1365) is a form which does not occur elsewhere, so the Keri would read מִן־הָעַמִּים after Isaiah. An echo of this passage is found in Lam. iii. 47,

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Application of a passage from Isaiah (xxiv. 17, 18). That Jeremiah is the original here, and at most took the remote analogy of Am. v. 19 for his model, appears to me an entirely unwarranted assertion. This pithy drastic play upon words corresponds as much more to the Old Testament master of such word-play, Isaiah, as it is contrary to the softer and more fluent style of our prophet. In addition it is inconceivable that at the close of his discourse, where he has evidently already exhausted himself and has for some time been speaking only in quotations, he should suddenly make such a pithy original utterance. Comp. DELITZSCH in DEBCHSLER'S Comm. zu Jes. III., S. 406, 6, and in his own Comm. on Isaiah, S. 271 [Eng. Tr., pp. 431, 2].

2. The Testimony of the Book of Numbers concerning Moab, and concluding word.

XLVIII. 45-47.

- 45 In the shade of Heshbon the fugitives stand powerless;¹
For fire² goes forth from Heshbon,
And flame from the midst of Sihon,
And it devoured the side of Moab
And the crown (of the head) of the sons of tumult.³
46 Woe unto thee, Moab i Destroyed is the people of Chemosh,
For thy sons are led away into prison,
And thy daughters into captivity.⁴
47 And I turn the captivity of Moab at the end of days, saith Jehovah.
—Thus far the judgment on Moab.

² Ver. 45.—אֵשׁ is used in Numbers as feminine, as it usually is, but here as masculine, as in Ps. civ. 4. (In Job xx. 26 אֵשׁ regarded as neuter is in apposition. Comp. NABEGLER, Gr., § 60, 4 coll. Jer. xx. 9).

⁴ Ver. 46.—The form שְׁבִיָּה is found in Jeremiah here only. Since he uses שְׁבִיָּה (שְׁבוּת) only in the connection of שָׁבֵב he was obliged, in order to have a corresponding word to שְׁבִי, to choose either שְׁבִיָּה or שְׁבִיָּה, which latter occurs more rarely than the former, since it is found only in Isa. iii. 2.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

With the exception of ver. 45 a, the verses are a free reproduction of Num. xxi. 28, 29; xxiv. 17. The prophet who already in the previous context has brought into use old prophecies against Moab, does the same here with some passages of the book of Numbers. It is only natural that Jeremiah should not leave unemployed those ancient utterances occasioned by the first conflict between Israel and Moab. This use is evidently the main intention, and no emphasis is therefore to be laid on the less strict connection of the words with the previous context, and with each other. GRAF has, therefore, rightly rejected the hypothesis of MOYERS and HIRTZIG, that these verses are a later gloss.

Vers. 45, 46. In the shade . . . captivity. As the passage to be used speaks of a going forth of the fire from Heshbon upon the Moabites (Num. xxi. 28), the Moabites must be represented as having come into the district of Heshbon. This is done by assuming a flight of the Moabites in that direction (doubtless also with a reference to "he that fleeth," ver. 44). It has indeed been correctly remarked that as the enemy is approaching from the north, the flight could not be towards Heshbon (comp. rem. on ver. 19 sqq.), but all that concerns the prophet is to show that the ancient sentence will be verified anew in this judgment on Moab. It is assuredly not his meaning that this will take place literally in the form chosen by him (for which Isa. xxx. 2, 3, also was, perhaps, in his mind). Ver. 45 a is thus a mere connecting clause, of which the expressions are not to be emphasized.—Powerless declares that the fugitives, who for protection had betaken themselves to the shade of Heshbon, receive from thence no strength but the contrary. The following 3 which is also taken from Num. xxi. 28, need not then be taken in an adversative sense (but).—From the midst of Sihon. In Num. xxi. 28 it reads, “from the city of Sihon.” Heshbon is called in xxi. 26 the city of Sihon the king of the Amorites. Owing to the omission of city here, I would neither alter the text with J. D. MICHAELIS, EWALD and MEIER (סִיחֹן for סִיחֹן) so as to read, from the house of Sihon, nor with GRAF, conceive an ideal presence of Sihon (with reference to Gen. xlix. 10), but as in ver. 4, and more frequently according to GRAF, Moab stands for Ar-Moab, and elsewhere usually Shechem for city of Shechem (Gen. xxxiii. 18), so here also the name of Lord of the city stands for the city itself. The sense of from the midst, is that fire breaks forth from between the openings of the city (i. e., the gates of the walls and towers).—The side of Moab. Num. xxiv. 17, “and a sceptre shall rise out of Israel, and shall smite the borders of Moab.” As here the subject is a staff which smites, the borders can mean only the sides of the body. Accordingly in this passage also it is more natural to think of the side (MEIER) as burnt or roasted by the fire, than the end of the beard [HENDERSON: corner of the beard], which would inflict no material injury.—And the crown, etc. Num. xxiv. 17, “and destroy all the children of Sheth.” Sheth has also the meaning of tumult. The children of tumult are homines tumultuosi. The designation corresponds on the one hand to the arrogant character of the Moabites mentioned in vers. 26-30, and on the other hand there seems to be an allusion to Am. ii. 2, where it reads “and Moab shall die with tumult.”—Woe unto thee, etc., from Num. xxi. 29. Moab is called the people of Chemosh (comp. ver. 7) as Israel the people of Jehovah (Num. xi. 29; xvii. 6; Jud. v. 11).—For thy sons, etc., Num. xxi. 29: he gives his sons up as fugitives, and his daughters into captivity. It is apparent that the original is softened down. Comp. Gen. xii. 15.

Ver. 47. And I turn . . . on Moab.—Close of the chapter. Comp. xli. 26; xlix. 6, 89.—I turn. Comp. xxx. 3, 18; xxxiii. 7, 11.—At the end of days. Comp. rem. on xxiii. 20. The expression points to that final period in which the heathen also will be converted to the God of Israel. Comp. iii. 17; Isa. xxiv. 13-16; xxv. 6; Hag. ii. 7.—Thus far the judgment. Comp. ver. 21; li. 64. With the exception of the latter passage (on which comp. the exeg. rem.) this formula is not found in Jeremiah. It appears to be a later addition.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

must note well what particular sins are specified, of which they were guilty, and for which such heavy punishments were heaped upon them, viz.: 1. Disdain, in that they gave no one a good word, were unfriendly and only blustered and boasted with every one, Ps. lli. 3 (1). 2. Confidence in their fortifications, in their power, money and riches, 2 Chron. xxxii. 8; Isa. xl. 6. 3. Security, all being prosperous and peaceful, which was the sin of their sister Sodom, Ezek. xvi. 49; Zeph. ii. 9. 4. Talking great things, and thrasonic self-praise. But although Goliath was such a mighty fellow he had yet to bite the grass, 1 Sam. xvii. 50. 5. Pride and Arrogance. These never do well, but act with violence and injustice. 5. On ver. 11. “Moab retained its old character; being far from the traffic of the great world it was well pleased to keep to itself. Yet things cannot continue thus in this world forever, every family and every nation is at some time rudely terrified from its rest, for what is peculiar, natural or national is not in itself the good. This comes here only through conflict and tribulation, and by God’s word among men. One’s own way is full of idolatry, and all idols will in like manner come to shame: the golden calf of the Israelites certainly first, but afterwards Kamosh.” DIEDRICH.

6. On ver. 11. “*Hic notetur, quod hac allegoria Jeremias nefarie et fanaticè abusus circa annum Christi 1564 quidam Martinus Steinbach, viri vinaris sive doliarii Selececiadiensis, qui se esse dicitavit spiritum sanctum incarnatum uti Christus filius incarnatus est, hæreseos suæ fundamentum statuens hoc præsens Jeremias dictum. 7. On vers. 26, 27. Proud men rejoice with malicious pleasure when they can treat one, whom they do not like, as a caught thief. But it may happen to them that notwithstanding their age, rank and high dignity, they may yet fall in a truly beastly manner into that which they have themselves vomited, and thus become a laughing stock to the street gamins.

8. On ver. 39. “It also comes about that the natural man hangs his head, and at this time believers commonly look up and raise their heads, because their redemption draweth nigh.” ZINSENDORF.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

1. “How many are still like the Moabites?

For how many are there of those who depend on their power and violence, their fortified cities and buildings, riches, money and property, and set all their hope and confidence thereupon! How many are there of those who, when they have been some time at peace, become secure and think there is no more trouble from the rising to the setting of the sun! How many of those who rely on their own strength and say, let the enemy come, they are a match for him! How many who, when they surpass others in bodily and mental gifts or in perishable goods, become proud and despise, ridicule and treat badly their inferiors, as if they had found such among thieves, as God the Lord here says! Not to mention that even the dear God is not exempted. For although all good and perfect gifts come only from above, from the Father of light (Jas. i. 17), yet many will not acknowledge this, but ascribe them to their own wisdom and skill, do not thank God for them, and thus make themselves and the outward means, by which they obtain one and another thing, the idol which they serve." Bibl. Summarien, Halle, 1848.

2. On ver. 10. Remissness in the work of the Lord. 1. Wherein it consists (in not doing or doing ill that which is commanded. Comp. Saul in 1 Sam. xv., and doing that which is forbidden). 2. Its causes (Selfishness, Pride, Unbelief, Cowardice,

3. On ver. 42. The world's boldness towards God. 1. Whereon it is supported (on the one hand on the real [material] powers apparently standing at its behest alone; on the other hand, on the apparent powerlessness of God's servants, who have only truth and right on their side). 2. What its end will be (Destruction, or termination of national existence). 6. Prophecy against the Ammonites.

XLIX. 1-6.

The Ammonites also, the brother nation of the Moabites, (Gen. xix. 37) after centuries of various conflict (comp. Jud. iii. 13; x. 7 sqq.; xi. 32; 1 Sam. xi.; 2 Sam. x., xi., xii. 26; 2 Chron. xx.; xxvi. 8; xxvii. 5) in consequence of the deportation of the East-Jordanic tribes have appropriated a part of their territory. This fact forms the point of departure for the present prophecy. Older prophecies against Ammon are extant only by Amos (i. 13-15) and Zephaniah (in consequence of a declaration against Moab, (ii. 9, 10). Of these Jeremiah has made considerable use of the prophecy of Amos. Comp. the exposition. There is at most an echo of the brief utterance of Zephaniah in the expression desolation, ver. 2. coll. Zeph. ii. 9. Since Nebuchadnezzar and the Chaldeans are not named, the prophecy must be older than the battle of Carchemish, and since the beginning agrees in form with the beginning of the first prophecy against Egypt (xlvi. 2), and the prophecies against Moab (xlviii. 1), Edom (xlix. 7) and Damascus (xlix. 23), the supposition is natural that the date of its origin is the same as that of these prophecies.

1 AGAINST THE CHILDREN OF AMMON.

Thus saith Jehovah: Has then Israel no children, or has he no heir?

Why then does Malcom inherit Gad and his people dwell in his cities?

- 2 Therefore behold, the days come, saith Jehovah,
That I cause the war-shout to be heard against Rabbah of the children of Ammon;
And she shall become a desolated heap,
And her daughter shall be burned with fire:
And Israel shall be heir to his heirs, saith Jehovah.

- 3 Howl Heshbon, for devastated is Ai!
Cry, ye daughters of Rabbah, gird on sackcloth;
Lament and run to and fro' on the walls;
For Malcom must go into captivity,
His priests and his princes together.

- 4 Why boastest^a thou of the valleys?
Thy valley is flowing away,^b thou rebellious daughter,
Who trusted in her treasures;—"Who will come to me?"
- 5 Behold, I bring fear upon thee, saith the Lord, Jehovah Zebaoth,
From all thy neighbors;
And ye shall be driven away, each one before him;
And there shall be no gatherer of the fugitives.
- 6 But nevertheless I will turn the captivity of the children of Ammon, Saith Jehovah.

3. Comp. iv. 2; ix. 22, 23; Ps. xlix. 7, etc.

^c Ver. 4.—עֲמִיקָךְ. The explanation of EWALD and GRAF, "of the luxuriance, the superfluity of thy valley" would suit the connection, but the abstract rendering of עֲמִיקָךְ is an objection, since this form (עֲמִיקָךְ) elsewhere is used almost wholly in the formation of participles, very rarely of substantives of concrete meaning, as עֲמִיקָךְ people, עֲמִיקָךְ city. עֲמִיקָךְ occurs (in the masc. form) only of a man with emission of seed (Lev. xv. 4), in the fem. of a woman with emission of blood (Lev. xv. 19), and of Canaan as a land flowing with milk and honey (Exod. iii. 8, 17; Lev. xx. 24; Num. xiii. 27, etc.). Hence the explanation: thy valley flows away, passes away, or redundat sanguine confessorum, does not correspond to the use of the word elsewhere. I would, therefore, explain with SCHLEUSNER: quid gloriaris vallibus tuis? (quod scilicet) fecunda sit vallis tua? Thus one idea is expressed independently of the preposition.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Four parts may be plainly distinguished. In the first (vers. 1, 2) the prophet alludes to the fact, from the theocratic point of view regarded as improper, that the Ammonites had taken possession of the Gadite territory (ver. 1), and declares that this cannot remain so. Ammon must be involved in war, the capital with the neighboring cities destroyed, and Israel again put into possession of his country (ver. 2). In the second part (ver. 3) a brief specification follows, in the third (vers. 4, 5) a reason for the punitive judgment, with express indication, that the recompense would correspond exactly to the inculpation. In the fourth part (ver. 6) the prophet concludes with a consolatory outlook into the future.

Vers. 1, 2. Against . . . saith Jehovah.—The prophet here presupposes the possession of the Gadite territory by the Ammonites in consequence of the deportation of the East-Jordanic tribes by Tiglath-Pileser (2 Ki. xv. 29; 1 Chron. v. 6, 26. Comp. Intro. to ch. xlviii.). Amos refers to former attempts by the Ammonites for the same object (i. 13).—Malcom. Jeremiah has Am. i. 15 in view. In this passage Malcom appears to me to be used in a double sense. Why should the king be mentioned only with the people of the Ammonites? Why does Amos say of Damascus (ver. 5) and Philistia (ver. 8), "him that holdeth the sceptre," and of Moab (ii. 8) "the judge?" Did he not wish it to be understood that the expression used only of Ammon, was to be taken here in a special sense? I believe, then, that Malcom (Am. i. 16) refers primarily to the King, but in such wise that an allusion to the God is also intended. This allusion was all the plainer, if the Ammonites really, as MOVERS supposes (Phœnic., I., S. 323. Comp. HERZOG, Real-Enc., IX., S. 714), called the god מלכִי, i. e., our king. With reference to this he might fitly, when the Ammonites were spoken of, be called מלכִי by the Israelites. It is, therefore, unnecessary here, and in ver. 3 to read מלכִי, as EWALD, GRAF and MEIER would do, after the example of the LXX. and Syr. Since we cannot express the specific meaning of the word by the translation, we have retained Malcom as if it were a proper name.—The war-shout, etc., is a reminiscence from Am. i. 14.—Rabbah Beni Ammon. This was the complete name of the city (comp. Deut. iii. 11; 2 Sam. xi. 1; xii. 26 sqq.). It was called Rabbah, the great, the capital, in contrast to the neighboring cities. Comp. HERZ., R.-Enc. XII., S. 469.—A desolate heap. literally hill of desolation, therefore, heap of ruins. Comp. Josh. viii. 28 and Zeph. ii. 9.—Burned with fire. This also reminds us of Am. i. 14 (comp. OLSH., § 242 b).

Ver. 8. Howl Heshbon . . . princes together. The immediate consequences of the war-shout being heard are specified. Heshbon is to howl. It was then an Ammonitish city. Comp. rems. on xlviii. 2, 45. It is given as a reason that Ai is destroyed. What city this was is not to be ascertained. VENEMA's and EWALD's explanation (Rabba ita vastata est, ut jam sit tumulus ruderum) is forced. GRAF would read עֲמִיקָךְ with reference to Rabbah. But Rabbah could be called עֲמִיקָךְ only in the appellative sense, and then it must have the article. To suppose that Ai is transferred hither from Josh. viii. 28, because there alone the expression "heap of desolation" occurs, is to attribute to the prophet either ignorance or carelessness. Many commentators therefore (J. D. MICHAELIS, HIRZIG, comp. V. RAUMER, S. 168, Ann. 150) are disposed to assume an East-Jordanic Ai, which expedient seems to me thus far the best.—There is no reason for taking daughters of Rabbah in a different sense here from ver. 2.—Sackcloth. Comp. rems. on xlviii. 37.—On the walls. I do not see why these should be regarded as the walls of a sheep-fold, as many would do. What is more natural in a city, against which the enemy is advancing, than to run up and down on the walls to take measures for defence? That the city walls may be meant is evident from Ps. lxxxix. 41; Ezek. xlii. 12.—For Malcom, etc. These words are taken from Am. i. 15. Only in the present passage we have his priests for "he," which is evidently not from misunderstanding, but to emphasize more plainly the intended meaning of Malcom. Comp. rem. on xlvi. 7.

Vers. 4, 5. Why boastest thou . . . fugitives. Reason of the primitive judgment. The pride, the stubbornness, the security of Ammon must be correspondingly punished. Comp. xlvi. 26, 30.—Rebellious daughter. Comp.

xxxi. 22.—Who will come to me? The Ammonites' boast, Who will come to us? The Lord tells them, the enemies will come upon them, and that from all sides, yea, even behind them, so that the Ammonites will be driven straight before them, and because the enemies come from all sides will be so scattered that no one will be in a condition to collect the fugitives again.—Fear. Comp. xlviii. 43, 44.—Each one before him. Comp. "every man straight before him," Josh. vi. 5, 20; v. 13.—Gatherer. Comp. Isa. xlii. 14; lvi. 8; Nah. iii. 18.

Ver. 6. But nevertheless . . . Jehovah. Ammon also is to share in the salvation of the future, which is to issue from Israel unto all nations. Comp. rem. on xlvi. 47 and xlix. 89.

7. Prophecy against Edom (xlix. 7-22).

On account of their relationship to the Israelites, the Edomites, in consequence of an express divine command, were not treated as enemies on the journey to Canaan (Deut. ii. 4; xxiii. 7). Saul, however, conquered them (1 Sam. xiv. 47). David subjected them entirely (2 Sam. viii. 14). In this state of dependence they remained after Hadad's attempt at revolution had failed (1 Ki. xi. 14-22) till the reign of Joram, when they revolted (2 Ki. viii. 20-22; 2 Chron. xxi. 8). Amaziah and Uzziah indeed made by no means unsuccessful attempts to bring them again into subjection (2 Ki. xiv. 7, 22), but their success was not lasting. In the reign of Ahaz the Edomites again invaded Judea (2 Chron. xxviii. 17), and in the time of the Chaldeans we also find their ambassadors among those who came to Zedekiah to consult concerning means to be taken in common (Jer. xxvii. 8); but at the destruction of Jerusalem they are on the side of the Chaldeans, greeting the destruction of the long hostile city (comp. עֲלֵיכֶם עֹלָם, Ezek. xxxv. 5) with scornful triumph (Lam. iv. 21; Ezek. xxxv. 15; xxxvi. 5; Ps. cxxxvii. 7).

As regards the date of our prophecy, the construction of the superscription (לְאֶדוֹם), as well as the non-mention of the Chaldeans, point to the same date at which the other portions with similar superscription, at the head of which is the first against Egypt (xli. 1-12), originated, i. e., the time immediately before the battle of Carchemish. Comp. rem. on xli. 1, 2, and Introd. to the Prophecies against the Nations.

Of special importance for our prophecy is its relation to the prophecy of Obadiah directed against Edom. They correspond to each other as follows:

Jer. xlix. 7 and Obad. 8.
" " 9 " " 5.
" " 10 " " 6, 7.

That Jeremiah drew from Obadiah, and not vice versa, has been shown by CASPARI (Der Proph. Obadja ausgel. Leipzig, 1842) in such an exhaustive manner that there can be no further question on this point. The quotations then from Obadiah extend only to ver. 8 of his prophecy. On the other hand, the following context (Obad. 9 sqq.) has frequent points of contact with Joel, which is not the case in the previous context, and it is just in these verses that the indubitable references to the capture of Jerusalem by the Chaldeans are found (comp. Obad. 10, 16). Hence recently either the old theory has been retained (held by AUGUSTI, KRAHMER, EWALD, MEIER in ZELLER'S Jahrb. I. 3, S. 526) of the use of an older source in common on the part of Jeremiah and Obadiah (comp. MEIER, die proph. BB. d. A. T. übersetzt u. erk., S. 368 [The proph. Books of the O. T. transl. and explained]), or it is supposed that Obad. 9-21 was a later addition, composed after the Chaldean catastrophe. This is not the place to enter into this difficult investigation specially or with the precision which it requires. I content myself therefore with putting two questions: 1. Is it then so decidedly demonstrated that Obadiah quotes Joel and not Joel Obadiah? 2. How is it, that in vers. 12-14 Edom is only warned against committing hostilities against Judah "in the day of their calamity?" Such hostilities had certainly been already committed (vers. 10, 11, 15, 16). But is it not clear from the turn which the discourse takes (with לֹא) in ver. 12 that the prophet distinguishes two points of time, a past and a future? Once already have the Edomites greeted the calamity of Jerusalem with malicious joy. When now they are warned against doing this again, is it not presupposed that Jerusalem is still by no means wholly destroyed, but that the really great day of calamity is still impending (observe the וַיִּזְכֹּר repeated eight times in vers. 12-14)? Would it not accordingly be exegetically more exact to suppose that the prophet, finding occasion in the hostility displayed by the Edomites in a transient occupation of Jerusalem, warns them from a repetition on the great day of Jerusalem, which he foresees as inevitable, and on the presupposition that this warning will not avail, threatened them with a just recompense?

Of the other older prophecies against Edom (Isa. xxxiv. 5-17; Am. i. 11, 12; Joel iv. 19) Jeremiah has made no use.

The whole prophecy is plainly to be discriminated into three parts. The first (vers. 7-13) has for its topic the judgment to be executed on Edom according to the elements of its outward appearance (vers. 7-10) and its objective inward ground, which is the decree of Jehovah. The second part (vers. 14-18) is predominantly occupied with the statement of the subjective ground of the visitation, i. e., with the guilt of Edom. The third part (vers. 19-22) brings before us the subject of the destination; that is, the instrument thereof, chosen by Jehovah.

1. The judgment on Edom in its external appearance and objective reason.

XLIX. 7-13.

7 AGAINST EDMOM. Thus saith Jehovah Zebaoth:

Is there no longer wisdom in Teman?

Hath counsel vanished from the intelligent?¹

Is their wisdom expended?²

8 Flee, turn, bow low,³ ye inhabitants of Dedan!

For the destruction of Esau I bring upon him,

The time, when I visit him.

9 If vintagers come to thee they will leave no gleanings,

If thieves by night they destroy their fill.

10 For I have stript Esau bare, discovered his hiding places,

And he cannot hide himself.⁴

His seed is destroyed and his brethren and his neighbors,

And he is no more.

11 Leave⁵ thy orphans, I will preserve their life,

And let thy widows confide⁶ in me.

12 For thus saith Jehovah, Behold,

They, whose rule it was not to drink the cup, must drink it,

And art thou⁷ to remain unpunished?

No, but thou shalt drink.

13 For I have sworn by myself, saith Jehovah,

That Bozrah shall become a desolation,

A reproach, a desert⁸ and a curse;

And all her cities shall become desolate for ever.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ Ver. 7.—כִּנְיִם Part. Kal from כִּין instead of the more usual Part. Niph. נִכְנִים (Gen. xii. 33, 39, etc.). The form does not occur elsewhere.

² Ver. 7.—כָּרַח is to overflow, overhang. So Exod. xxvi. 12 of the overhanging curtain; Ezek. xvii. 6, וְכָרַח הָיָה וְיָסַד הָיָה, vitis patula, late effusa. Part. Pu'al כָּרַח, poured out, stretched out on the couch, Am. vi. 4, 7. כָּרַח, Ezek. xxiii. 15, redundantes mitris d. i. gestantes mitras longe dependentes. Hence Niph. (which occurs here only), profusum, effusum esse, בָּקַק from בָּקַק, Isa. xix. 3 coll. Jer. xix. 7.

forms like נִקְרָא, נִרְכָּה, נִחְלָם (OLSH., §266, c), and as regards the construction, ver. 23. This expedient removes at least the great grammatical difficulties which חֲרָפָה affords.

* Ver. 11.—On the Imperative form comp. OLSHAUSEN, §234, a.

† Ver. 11.—חֲרָפָה. Comp. Ezek. xxxvii. 7. Except in connection with suffixes, we find only this and אָרִיָּה as examples of the abnormal affirmative. Comp. OLSH., §. 452. 3.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

The destruction of Edom is described, 1. as it appears outwardly, 2. according to its inner reason in the divine decree. First the irresistible nature of the attack is set forth, in opposition to which all the renowned wisdom of Edom will be unavailing (ver. 7). The Dedanites, the neighbors and commercial allies of Edom, are warned to consult their own safety (ver. 8). The enemies will come, and, like vintagers or thieves, make a clean sweep (ver. 9). It will turn out that Edom's material means of defence, his rock fortresses regarded as impregnable, together with his own and his allied offensive forces, cannot avert destruction (ver. 10). This must be so, because it is the will of Jehovah. This is seen in Jehovah's taking charge, as it were, of the widows and children of the Edomites, which presupposes the death of their guardians (ver. 11). Jehovah must permit their death, as without being unjust, He cannot spare Edom the cup which Israel had to drink. Edom must therefore drain it irrevocably (ver. 12) for Jehovah (in accordance with the imperative demands of His justice) has sworn, that Edom will be a prey to everlasting desolation (ver. 13). Thus the strophe concludes, and from the similarity of this conclusion with ver. 18 it is seen, that in both cases we have a larger section of the discourse.

Ver. 7. Against Edom . . . expended. Wisdom and intelligence are necessary in carrying on war (Prov. xxiv. 6) and where these fail, all is lost. This lack is observable in Edom. This is the more striking since the wisdom of Edom and especially of Teman was celebrated from of old. Comp. Ob. 8; Job ii. 11 (Teman was the home of Eliphaz); Baruch iii. 22, 23. On Teman comp. HENZ., R.-Enc., III., S. 650. [COWLES on this verse.—S. R. A.]

Ver. 8. Flee . . . visit him. On Dedan comp. rems. on xxv. 23. They were not Edomites but neighbors (Ezek. xxv. 13), and at all events connected with them by mercantile intercourse (comp. Isa. xxi. 13). Hence they are also threatened by the tempest which is breaking over Edom. They are therefore admonished to look to their own safety.—For, etc. Comp. ver. 32; xlv. 21; vi. 15.

Vers. 9, 10. If vintagers . . . no more. Ver. 9 is taken from Obad. 5. The sense is clear. It could not be so if we should render the sentence interrogatively, as many do, in too servile adherence to the passage in Obadiah. Ver. 10 reminds us of Obad. 6, though there we read "searched out" and "sought up" for stript bare and discovered. These terms applied to Esau refer to the uncommonly strong fortress-dwellings, occupied by the Edomites. Comp. rems. on ver. 16.—His seed is destroyed, etc. "Both the real Edomites and the descendants of related and other nations, which were mingled with them, as the Amalekites, Gen. xxxvi. 12; Horites, Gen. xxxvi. 20; Simeonites, 1 Chron. iv. 42 and neighboring tribes, as Dedan, ver. 8. Tema and Buz, Jer. xxv. 23" are to be destroyed says GRAF. He also justly remarks that the expression his brethren and his neighbors appears to have been occasioned by "men of thy confederacy" and "men of thy peace" in Obad. 7.—And he is no more. Comp. Isa. xix. 7.

Vers. 11-13. Leave thy orphans . . . desolate forever. HIRTZIG sees in ver. 11 a preliminary conclusion parallel to ver. 6 and xlviii. 47. But ver. 11 is no conclusion, being followed by two sentences with for, vers. 12, 13, of such a purport that no inference favorable to Edom can possibly be drawn from them. I therefore take ver. 11 with THEODORER, NEUMANN and others, as irony. The Edomites are called upon, the men, namely, to leave their widows and orphans. Observe that it is not said, wives and children. The death of the men is presupposed. When Jehovah immediately adds that He will care for the survivors, this is a poor consolation for the Edomites who do not believe in Jehovah. For what other care but such as slaves receive, can be expected from Him, who announces as his unalterable determination so total a destruction of Edom, as in vers. 13, 17, 18, 20, 21?—I will preserve, etc. Comp. Exod. i. 17, 18; 2 Sam. xii. 3; 1 Ki. xviii. 5; Isa. vii. 21. We see from these passages that the meaning of the word is primarily negative: not kill, but secondarily positive: do what is necessary for the preservation of life.—Whose rule it was not, etc. It was an abnormal thing for Israel, the chosen people, to be obliged to drink the cup of wrath. I therefore take מִשְׁפָּט in the sense of norm, law, rule. Comp. xxx. 11; viii. 7.—The cup. Comp. xxv. 15 sqq.—Unpunished. Comp. xxv. 29.—Have sworn, etc. Comp. xxii. 5.—A desolation. Comp. xxv. 11, 18; xlv. 6, 22.—Bozrah (Isa. xxxiv. 6; lxiii. 1; Am. i. 11, 12) was one of the most important cities of Edom (comp. xlviii. 24) of which there are still remains under the name of Basseyra, i. e., Little Bozrah. Comp. RAUMER, Pal., §. 278.—Desolate for ever. Comp. xxv. 9.

2. The Judgment on Edom according to its subjective reason.

XLIX. 14-18.

- 14 I have heard a report from Jehovah,
And a messenger is sent among the nations:
"Assemble yourselves and come up against her,
And rise ye for the war."
15 For behold, I make thee small among the nations;
Despised among men.
16 Thy object of horror¹ deceived thee,
The pride of thy heart,
Thou that dwellest in the clefts of the rock,
Thou that occupiest the height of the hill.
Even though, like an eagle, thou buildest thy nest high,
I will bring thee down from thence, saith Jehovah.
17 And Edom shall become a wilderness;
Every one that passeth by shall be horrified,
And jeer on account of all her strokes.
18 As in the overthrow of Sodom and Gomorrah,
And their neighboring cities, saith Jehovah,
No man will dwell there,
Nor a son of man sojourn in her.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ Ver. 16.—תפליצת does not occur elsewhere. It is usually taken in the sense of terror—תפליצת (Jer. xxi. 4) and understood to mean the terror which Edom inspires. But because the following verb is in the masc. some have thought it necessary to separate תפליצת from it and regard it as an isolated exclamation (comp. הפנכס, Isa. xxix. 16), which SCHLEUSSNER renders O arrogantiam tuam; HIRZIG, "fear to thee;" GRAF, "horror at thee." But this exclamation appears somewhat exaggerated. Why should a people, who are deceived by pride, be especially inspired with fear? Is not this very common? Was the pride of Edom greater than that of Moab (xlviii. 29)? Or was it threatened with a worse fate? I find it more suitable to take תפליצת in the sense of תפליצת. The latter word in 1 Ki. xv. 13; 2 Chron. xv. 16 designates an idol, an idol-image. This is called a terror, an object of holy horror, as frequently פִּתְרָה, Gen. xxxi. 42; כֹּרֶא, Isa. viii. 13; אִי־כִים, Jer. i. 38 are used in an analogous sense. The LXX. may have the same idea, translating ἡσυχία σου, i. e., risus, jocus tuus. According to SCHLEUSSNER, they had Priapus in mind, for which also Jerome holds תפליצת in 1 Ki. xv. and 2 Ki. xv. Rabbis also, according to KIMCHI's testimony, have understood the word of עֲבֹרָה וְרֵרָה, i. e., idolatry. Among the moderns, J. D. MICHAELIS and MEIER adopt this view. The gender of the verb is no hindrance, for the prophet could properly use the masc. when thinking of the person of the idol. Comp. NAEGLER, Gr., § 60, 4.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Jeremiah proclaims in the words of Obadiah, that nations will be summoned to make war upon Edom, to make her small and despised (vers. 14, 15). To such a procedure has Edom given occasion by her idolatrous abominations and her pride. This pride is now to be punished (ver. 16) and Edom is now to become a horrible waste and like Sodom and Gomorrah (vers. 17, 18). These verses are taken with modifications from Obadiah 1-4. The main thought is evidently expressed in ver. 16; the statement of the subjective cause of the punitive judgment, impending over Edom.

Vers. 14, 15. I have heard . . among men. Hemistich 1 is taken from Obad. 1 only with the alteration of "we have heard" (Israel) to "I have heard," and "arise ye" to "assemble yourselves." The report which the prophet bears directly from the Lord and the message (רִצְיָ vialor, nuntius, Prov. xiii. 17; xxv. 13; Isa. xviii. 2; lvii. 9) which is sent among the nations are of the same purport. We must regard the report however as expressing not only the command itself, but also that it has been issued. Hemist. 2 is extended in Jeremiah. It reads in Obadiah "Arise ye, and let us rise up against her in battle." Ver. 15, taken from Obad. 2, states the object of the war, for the attainment of which the nations are summoned. The words correspond to vers. 11-13, expressing the decree of Jehovah concerning Edom, the execution of which is the object of the war. "For" is wanting in Obadiah. In small and despised there is evidently an antithesis to Edom's pride (ver. 16). Hemist. 2 reads in Obadiah, "thou art greatly despised."

Ver. 16. Thy object of horror. . . saith Jehovah. We evidently have here the kernel of the strophe, that by which it is distinguished from the context, viz., the guilt of Edom is here stated, the subjective reason of her destruction. While Obadiah mentions as this reason only "the pride of thine heart" (ver. 8), Jeremiah mentions also the "being a terror," or, as I understand the word, the horror, i. e., the idol. We may well conceive that wishing to extend the text of his source the prophet would insert a word which would state the ground of Edom's moral corruption. Whence does arise the moral pollution of the heathen world? According to Rom. i. from idolatry. Here also Jeremiah would say that it was really the idol which deceived Edom, pride being involved in idolatry.—The pride of thy heart is then in apposition to horror. It is in accordance with this that inaccessible rock-castles are designated as the ground of pride, for, were not all heathen idols local deities? Was not then the idol who had built these rocks and continually protected them the real lord on whom their proud confidence was founded?—Clefts of the rocks, etc. It appears to me beyond doubt that Jeremiah had here in view the peculiar character of the Edomite cities, especially the capital, which was called Sela (2 Ki. xiv. 7; Isa. xvi. 1). Comp. the remarks on Bozrah, ver. 13. The second hemistich is abbreviated from Obad. 4. Comp. Am. ix. 2.

["The descriptive points in this verse are wonderfully accurate. Petra, the ancient capital of Edom, for ages the main thoroughfare of the great trade and travel between India and Mesopotamia on the East, and Egypt and North Africa on the South-West; the seat therefore of wealth and art, perhaps of wisdom also, and culture, held a position of great military strength. It was built in a vast ravine, partly on the broad area inclosed by lofty precipitous walls of rock, which by some of nature's mighty convulsions had been rent asunder, and partly in those very fronts of lofty rock, chiseled out with immense labor, so that the pillars of the temples and the apartments of its tombs and dwellings were wholly cut from the solid, eternal rock. Here—her nests built high in these crags like the eagle's—old Petra sat in her pride and her strength, cherishing the vain fancy that no power could ever bring her down. But the Almighty spake and it was done!—The site of ancient Petra, for ages unknown, has been brought to light during the present century. A number of travelers have visited and explored it. Laborde, Dr. Robinson and others, have given full and precise statements of its wonderful ruins, placing Petra in the front rank of those ancient witnesses who bear their silent but resistless testimony to the precision of the old prophetic descriptions, and to the marvellous correspondence in the most minute details between prophecy and history—the prophecy of twenty centuries ago and the history of to-day." COWLES.—S. R. A.]

Vers. 17, 18. And Edom . . . sojourn in her. These verses do not contain any reminiscences from Obadiah, but they do from Jeremiah himself and from other writings.—And Edom, etc., is formed after xxv. 11, 38. Comp. l. 18.—Every one that passeth. Comp. xix. 8.—As in the overthrow, etc., is from Deut. xxix. 22. Comp. Isa. xiii. 19; Jer. l. 40. The expression neighboring cities points to Deut. xxix. 22, where Admah and Zeboim are mentioned with Sodom and Gomorrah. Comp. Hos. xi. 8.—No man will dwell, etc. Comp. ver. 33; l. 40; li. 43.

8. The instrument chosen by Jehovah for the destruction of Edom.

XLIX. 19-22.

- 19 Behold, as a lion he cometh up
From the pride of Jordan to the evergreen pasturage,
For in a twinkling I drive him (Edom) from thence.¹
And who is chosen?² Him will I set over him.
For who is like me? And who will appoint me the time?
And who is the shepherd that would stand before me?
- 20 Therefore hear the counsel of Jehovah which He hath counselled against Edom,
And His thoughts, which he has thought concerning the inhabitants of Teman:
Verily they will be dragged along, the feeble little sheep;
Verily their pasturage will be astounded³ at them.
- 21 At the sound of their fall⁴ the earth trembles.
Crying¹⁶ The sound of it⁵ is heard on the Red Sea.
- 22 Behold, as an eagle he ascends and flies,
And extends his wings over Bozrah;
And the heart of the heroes of Edom on that day
Will be as the heart of a woman in anguish.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

This strophe also describes the destruction of Edom, but in such wise that the instrument in the hand of the Lord is prominent, without being mentioned by name. As a lion from the reed thickets of the Jordan falls upon a flock, which is pasturing on the luxuriant, ever-green meadows of the Gôr, so shall Edom be surprised in his rock-dwelling and be driven away in a twinkling. So shall a new shepherd, chosen ad hoc by the Lord Himself, be set over Edom, for the previous shepherds of Edom have no prerogative to maintain their position in spite of the Lord (ver. 19). The new Shepherd, however, will not pasture the flock in the old way peaceably, but will drag them away, so that their pasturage will be assounded at the disappearance of the flock (ver. 20). Thus the fall of Edom will be a violent one, so much so that the sound of it will be heard afar (ver. 20). Again, in conclusion, the one who is called to the destruction of Edom is compared with an eagle (after Deut. xxviii. 49), who will extend his wings over Bozrah, which is fortified indeed, but powerless against such an enemy, so that on that day even the heroes of Edom will be as faint-hearted as parturient women.

Ver. 19. Behold as a lion . . . before me. As in xlvii. 18 with Carmel, and in xlviii. 40 with an eagle, so here the instrument of the Lord is compared with a lion, one who lurks in the reedy margin of the Jordan (the pride of Jordan, "the luxuriant bushes and reeds growing on its banks, by which it is enclosed as by a green garland." KÖHLER on Zech. xi. 3 coll. Jer. xii. 5; RAUMER, Pal. S. 58; HERTZOG, R.-Enc., VII., S. 8) and from thence makes his inroads on the flocks pasturing on the luxuriant evergreen meadows of the Jordan valley. For the Gôr, though in general arid and infertile, where brooks flow down from the mountains to the Jordan has oases, which under the influence of the tropical climate are exceedingly fertile. Comp. ARNOLD in HERTZOG, R.-Enc., S. 10, etc. I am therefore of opinion that אֶרֶץ does not directly signify the land of Edom, and thus is neither to be taken as "rock-dwelling" nor as "evergreen pasturage" with sole reference to the undisturbed possession of the land for centuries. I take it in the latter meaning, but I think that the expression is chosen because it admits of a double reference, to the oases of the Jordanic valley and to Edom itself, which may be thus designated both as the ancient residence of the Edomite nation, and with reference to the strength and indestructibility of its national defences (comp. Num. xxiv. 21; Mic. vi. 2). In referring the expression at the same time to Edom, a transition is formed from the comparison to the thing compared.—For in a twinkling. From the "For" we see that the prophet has in view the suddenness of the attack as a tertium comparationis. From the thickets of the Jordan lions could easily fall upon herds feeding near the bank (comp. HERTZOG, R.-Enc. XI. S. 29). In like manner shall Edom be suddenly assailed and driven away from his pasturage.—And who is chosen? We see from this expression that the prophet had no definite person in view. He does not yet know who the chosen one is, but only that there will be one. Whoever it is will really obtain the supremacy over Edom, appointed to him. (xv. 8; li. 27). The elder commentators understood Nebuchadnezzar, or even (interprete Luthero, as Förster says) Alexander the Great.—For who is like me? Edom's princes of ancient and illustrious descent (Gen. xxxvi.) might well be caught in the delusion of inviolable security. Here they are told that they have a higher power above them, who can remove them, and set others more pleasing to him in their place—Jehovah, namely, who has none like unto Him, (Comp. CASPARI, Micha der Morast, S. 14sq.; Exod. xv. 11), whom no one can bring to an account (Job ix. 19), whom no earthly national shepherd (x. 21; xxv. 34; xxxii. 1) can defy. ["To 'appoint one the time' is the ancient phrase for a legal indictment and summons. Who shall prosecute me before the court for this proceeding, i. e., set himself against me as an opponent, or an antagonist." COWLES.—S. B. A.]

Vers. 20, 21. Therefore hear . . . Red Sea. As it is, therefore, undeniable that the Lord has power over all kingdoms of the nations, it is solemnly made known to all the world as the decree of the highest Majesty; the Edomites shall suffer the same fate from Him, who shall attack them like a lion, as the lion brings upon the weaker animals, i. e., they shall be dragged away (xv. 3; xxii. 19)—carried into captivity. Thus will the land be desolated, as the prophet poetically expresses it in the words, the land will be horrified at the sudden stillness and desolation. There is a similar personification in Job vii. 10, (Ps. ciii. 16). From this it follows 1. that the entire representation of these two verses is based on a figure of a place of pasturage; 2. that by the new shepherd, a conqueror is understood who will desolate the land and carry the people into captivity; 3. that the sentence with therefore, occasioned by the emphatic causal sentence of three clauses, ver. 19, 6, contains no more than an emphatically repeated inference (A, then B, therefore A), consequently the same thought in substance, which was already expressed in I will drive him from thence. On ver. 20a comp. ver. 80; xviii. 11; xxix. 11; Isa. xiv. 26, 27; xix. 12 — Teman, comp. ver. 7. The city lay according to Jerome, five, according to Eusebius, fifteen Roman miles from Petra, comp. The "smallest of the flock" are the weakest, most helpless, who are least adapted for flight or resistance, and most for being dragged away.—[HENDERSON adheres to the A. V., making "the smallest of the flock" the nominative.—S. R. A.] —At the sound, &c., immediate effect of the overthrow of the power of Edom. Comp. Ezek. xxvi. 15; xxxi. 16; Isa. xiii. 18; Jer. li. 29.—The whole passage, vers. 19-21, is repeated and applied to Babylon (l. 44-46).

Ver. 22. Behold . . . in anguish. That which is in ver. 19 declared by means of a figure taken from a lion, is here repeated in the form of a figure derived from an eagle. The first half of the verse is taken from xlviii. 40, the second from xlviii. 41. The reason of the assailer of Bozrah appearing here as an eagle may be that the "castellated rock" of this city is designated as accessible only to an eagle. Comp. RAUMER, Pal. S. 278; SCHUBERT, Reise in das Morgenland, II. S. 426.

8. Prophecy against Damascus.

XLIX. 28-27.

Out of a large number of small kingdoms (thirty-two are mentioned in 1 Ki. xxi. 1, 16) with which the Israelites after the period of the Judges had to endure many conflicts, (Jud. iii. 8; 1 Sam. xiv. 47; 2 Sam. viii. and x.), a large one was formed after David's death by Rezon, with Damascus for its capital (1 Ki. xi. 23, 24). With this great Syrian kingdom also the two kingdoms of Israel had to endure many and severe conflicts, (1 Ki. xv. 18 sqq.; xx. 1 sqq.; xxii. 1 sqq.; 2 Ki. v. 1 sqq.; vi. 8 sqq.; viii. 28, 29; x. 32, 33; xii. 17; xiii. 3; xiv. 25; xv. 37; xvi. 5, 6), till at last the Assyrians, solicited by Ahaz of Judah, (2 Ki. xvi. 7-10), fell upon Syria and brought the country permanently under their dominion (2 Ki. xvi. 9). We need not seek the fulfilment of Jeremiah's prophecy of the destruction of Damascus in a particular "conquest and devastation of the country by Nebuchadnezzar." (GRAF). For even if Nebuchadnezzar did seize Syria and Damascus and treat them with a certain degree of hostility (whether as an Assyrian province or as an Egyptian tributary) yet the prophet's perspective extends over the whole future of Damascus (comp. the Intro. to chh. l. li.). He sees in one picture what in the fulfilment will be divided into many stages, comp. HERZOG R.-Enc. III., S. 260.

As regards the date of the prophecy both the superscription and the purport of it indicate that it formed part of that Sepher, beginning with xlv. 1, which owes its origin to the period before the battle of Carchemish. Comp. Intro. to the Prophecies against the Nations.

23 AGAINST DAMASCUS.

Ashamed are Hamath and Arpad,
For a bad report have they heard: they are dissolved.¹
In the sea there is terror,² it cannot rest.

24 Enfeebled is Damascus, she turns to flee,
And terror³ seizes her;⁴

Anguish and sorrow lay hold on her like a parturient.

25 How! Is not the city of renown abandoned,
The place of my delight?

26 Hence her youths fall in the streets,
And all men of war shall perish on that day, saith Jehovah Zebaoth.

27 And I kindle a fire in the wall of Damascus,
Which shall devour the palaces of Benhadad.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

- ¹ Ver. 23.—נָכַח used frequently of the effect of fear in loosening the compagines corporis; Exod. xv. 15; Josh. ii. 9, 24; Ps. lxxv. 4; Isa. xiv. 31.
- ² Ver. 23.—כִּים רָאָה Since the following words לֹא יִכָּל הַשִּׁקָּט are taken verbatim from Isa. lviii. 20, the previous words in Isaiah may rule the previous words here. There we read וְהַשִּׁקָּט כִּים נָרָשׁ. It would now be certainly most convenient to read כִּים in the present passage instead of כִּים. Jeremiah however does not quote the last words accurately as a whole. And כִּים also is not without difficulty. We should expect it to be in the construct state. I therefore think that the reading in the text is the correct one.—רָאָה is fear, terror, unrest. Comp. Josh. xxii. 24; Prov. xii. 25; Ezek. iv. 16; xii. 18, 19. The subet. in Jeremiah here only; the verb in xvii. 8; xxxviii. 19; xlii. 18.
- ³ Ver. 24.—רָטַח ar. aey. a Syrian word, without doubt chosen purposefully. Comp. רָתַח, Hos. xiii. 1.
- ⁴ Ver. 24.—הַרְוֵיקָה is so punctuated by the Masoretes that it is evident they took Damascus for the subject (terroris prehendi) having in view passages like Isa. xlii. 8; Job xviii. 20; xxi. 6. But the punctuation הַרְוֵיקָה would correspond better to Jeremiah's usage. Comp. vi. 24; viii. 21; i. 43.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

An enemy coming from the north threatens first Hamath and Arpad, which are thus thrown into commotion, like a tempestuous sea (ver. 23). This agitation reaches also Damascus, hence discouragement, anxiety, in part flight (ver. 24). The city is not abandoned by all the troops (ver. 25), hence a great blood-bath and destruction of the army in the streets (ver. 26) and destruction of the city by fire (ver. 27).

Ver. 23. Against Damascus . . . cannot rest. The superscription is as in xvi. 2; xlviii. 1; xlix. 1, 7. I cannot at all discover that the superscription is too limited, as GRAY supposes, for in fact this brief utterance is occupied only with Damascus, the cities Hamath and Arpad being mentioned only to designate the successive advance of the calamity and the direction in which the enemy comes. It is a matter of course that the fall of the capital involves that of the kingdom, hence the superscription is incorrect neither in itself nor in relation to the purport of the passage. According to Num. xxxiv. 8 Hamath is to be the northern limit of the land to be occupied by Israel. The boundaries were also really extended thus far at times. Comp. 2 Ki. xiv. 28 with 2 Chron. viii. 4. The city was situated on the Orontes to the North of Damascus, and was afterwards called Epiphania by the Greeks. Comp. JEROME on Am. vi. 2, 14. Arpad, which is always named together with Hamath (Isa. x. 9, comp. DELITZSCH on the passage; xxxvi. 19; xxxvii. 13), must have been situated in the neighborhood of this city. We thus see that the prophet expects the enemy from the North, as it was natural that the army of the Egyptians then in northern Syria should turn his gaze in that direction. Hamath and Arpad stand confounded in consequence of the evil tidings. They flow away, dissolve, pass away with anguish.—The following words are taken verbatim from Isa. lvii. 20. Jeremiah has doubtless from this passage the idea of the sea in general in his mind. The expression נָכַח had directed his thoughts to that passage and still exerts some influence. He thus imagines these cities as a wildly agitated sea. In the swaying hither and thither of the waves is mirrored the inward unrest and anguish. It is not then the real sea that is meant (Hirzig), but the human multitude compared to a sea. (Comp. Isa. xvii. 12; viii. 7, 8).

Vers. 24-27. Enfeebled . . . Benhadad. The bad report reaches even the capital, and this in consequence falls into critical agitation. Despair seizes on the inhabitants. A part turns to flight. (Comp. rem. on xli. 5, 21). Anguish takes hold upon them.—How? Is not, etc. We are not justified in regarding the negative as a strong affirmation, or taking abandoned in the sense of, left free, spared. Rather does the prophet say really: how then is the city not forsaken? (Comp. 2 Sam. i. 14). He is astonished and complains, that it has not been abandoned. This would have been better for the Syrians. For just because it has not been, their youths fall in their streets and their whole army is destroyed. Flight might have saved them.—City of renown, etc. Comp. li. 41; Isa. lx. 18; lxii. 7.—My refers to the prophet and there is no irony in it. He lamented that the city was not abandoned. He has a human pity for the destroyed city as he has a human joy in its beauty. Comp. rem. on xlviii. 81. [The Vulg., Syr., Chald., omit my. BOOTHROYD maintains that this omission is necessary to make good sense!—S. R. A. J.]—The youths. Comp. ix. 20.—Ver. 27. And I kindle. The whole verse in its main constituents is taken from Am. i. and ii. Comp. Am. i. 4, 7, 10, 12, 14; ii. 2, 5.—In the wall, not on the wall, for the wall itself does not burn, but within the wall, so that all which the wall includes is consumed by the fire. The palaces of Benhadad are the royal palaces, since Benhadad (there were three of them, 1 Ki. xv. 18, 20; xx. 1-8; 2 Ki. vi. 24; viii. 7, 9; xiii. 8, 24, 25) was the best known name of Syrian kings.

9. Prophecy against Kedar and the Kingdoms of Hazor.

XLIX. 28-33.

From Damascus the prophet turns his gaze eastward to the bordering Arabians, comprised in the designation of the title. In xxv. 23, 24 Jeremiah mentions among the populations to be subdued by Nebuchadnezzar several Arabian tribes. We feel impelled to suppose that the limits of the Arabian conquests of Nebuchadnezzar were undefined in the mind of the prophet, for we shall be obliged to distinguish a real and ideal dominion of that ruler, though the boundary line between the two is a vague one. It is unnecessary to inquire after a special occasion for this prophecy. Nebuchadnezzar being now universal ruler, the Arabs, being the immediate southern neighbors of his native country, cannot possibly be omitted from subjection to his power. Moreover, the Arabs had enough to do with the Israelites from the time of Gideon (comp. Jud. vi.-viii.; 2 Chron. xvii. 11; xxi. 16, 17; xxvi. 7).—As regards the date of this prophecy we have in the mention of Nebuchadnezzar's name a sure proof that it was written later than most of its sisters in chh. xli.-xlix., for only a single one of these (the second against Egypt, xli. 13-28) mentions Nebuchadnezzar. If his expedition against the Arabian tribes were really the first, which he made after his ascension to the throne (comp. the ezeq. rem. on vers. 28, 29) this prophecy might be ascribed most fitly to the time in which he was preparing for the undertaking.

- 28 Against KEDAR and the kingdoms of HAZOR, which Nebuchadnezzar¹ the king of Babylon smote, Thus saith Jehovah:
Arise, go up against Kedar,
And spoil ye the sons of the east.²
- 29 Their tents and their flocks shall they take,
Their curtains and all their utensils;
And their camels shall they take for themselves,³
And shall cry over them, "Terror round about."
- 30 Flee, run apace, stoop, ye inhabitants of Hazor, saith Jehovah,
For Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon hath planned a plan against you,
And hath had thoughts against you.
- 31 Up! Move against a nation at ease,⁴
That dwelleth securely, saith Jehovah.
They have neither doors⁵ nor bolts,
They dwell apart by themselves.
- 32 And their camels shall become a prey,
And the multitude of their flocks a plunder;
And I scatter to all (the four) winds, those with cropped hair-corners,
And from all sides I bring their destruction, saith Jehovah.
- 33 And Hazor shall become a habitation for jackals,
A desolation in perpetuity:
Not a man shall dwell there,
Nor a son of man sojourn therein.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ Ver. 28.—The י with which the king's name is written in the Chethibh is due to a scriptural error occasioned by the word נצור standing just before.

² Ver. 28.—שדד. On the singular imperative form comp. OLS. § 235, 6.

⁴ Ver. 31.—The form שלין formed like עיר (comp. OLS. § 180, Ann.) is found here only. Elsewhere שלי (Job xvi. 12; xx. 20) or שליין (Job xxi. 23).

⁵ Ver. 31.—לרתים. By this are meant not house-doors, but city gates. Comp. Deut. iii. 5; 1 Sam. xxiii. 7.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Plunder, desolation and dispersion by Nebuchadnezzar are proclaimed to the pastoral tribes living in Arabia to the East of Palestine. First the enemies are called upon to advance, and with war-cries to fall upon the Arabs and spoil them (vers. 23, 29). The Arabs, however, are admonished to flee and hide themselves, to escape the plans formed against them (ver. 30). Hereupon the enemies are summoned anew to the attack, and are told, as if to allure them, that they have to deal with a people at peace and not intrenched behind bulwarks (ver. 31). Rich booty is placed before them in prospect. Dispersion on all sides will be the result, corresponding to the attack on all sides (ver. 32). The land shall be devastated and cease to be a habitation for man (ver. 33).

Vers. 28, 29. Against Kedar . . . terror round about. Kedar is named in Gen. xxv. 13 as the second son of Ishmael, with which the Arabian tradition agrees. Comp. HERZOG, R.-Enc. I. S. 463. [Comp. KEIL and DELITZSCH, Comm. on the Pentateuch (Eng. Ed.) Vol. I. p. 264]. They lived "in the desert between Arabia Petraea and Babylonia" (KNOBEL, Gen. S. 212), and are frequently mentioned as rich in flocks, living in tents (Song of Sol. i. 5; Ps. cxv. 5; Isa. xlii. 11; lx. 7; Ezek. xxvii. 21) and celebrated for their skill in archery (Isa. xxi. 16, 17). Comp. rems. on ii. 10.—Hazor, different from the localities of this name in Palestine (Josh. xi. 1-3; xii. 19; xix. 36; Jud. iv. and v; 1 Ki. ix. 16; xv. 23—Josh. xv. 23, 25—Neh. xi. 33), is mentioned here only as a district in Arabia. According to NIEBUHR (Ass. u. Bab., S. 210 coll. 428), Hazor is "the present Hadshar, a district which occupies the whole north-eastern corner of Nedshed, and to which in the wider sense the coast lands of Lachsa also belong." This corner is formed by the southern course of the Euphrates and the Persian Gulf. With regard to the meaning of the name it is natural to think of Isa. xlii. 11 and to suppose that הָצֹר denotes the inhabitants of the הָצֹרִים, i. e. villages without walls and gates (comp. Gen. xxv. 16). DELITZSCH remarks on Isa. xlii. 11, "the settled Arabs are still called Hadarije in distinction from Wabarije, the tent Arabs; hadar, הָצֹר, is the fixed dwelling-place in contrast to bedû, the steppe, where the tents are erected temporarily now here and now there." Accordingly הָצֹר and קָדָר are related not as opposites, but only as the more limited and more extended idea, and Jeremiah would address his words to Kedar and to all other Arabs dwelling in הָצֹרִים. With this would accord not only the Chaldean incursion generally, which it is easier to regard as directed against a settled people than against nomads, but especially the description of the devastation in ver. 23, which seems to presuppose not the pasturage of a passing horde but the abiding-place of men who build houses. It seems opposed to this, however, that in ver. 29 the tents and curtains of the attacked are spoken of, according to which part of them at least were tent-dwellers. It is also surprising that in Isa. xlii. 11 the Kedarenes are inhabitants of הָצֹרִים, while elsewhere (comp. the passages cited) they are described as tent-dwellers. I believe that all may be united in the hypothesis that there were some Kedarenes living in tents and some in villages, and that the text has in view both these and also the other tribes settled in villages of northern Arabia.—Which Nebuchadnezzar, etc. These words appear to be a later addition, as otherwise the prophecy characterizes itself as a vaticinium post eventum. Yet even HITZIG remarks, the addition is "contained in the LXX. and preserving the older form of the proper name as in xlii. 80 is relatively very old, and probably genuine and certainly contains historical truth, which is not handed down elsewhere." NIEBUHR (Ass. u. Bab., S. 209, 10) and DUNCKER (Genh. des. Alterth., I. S. 827) are of opinion that Nebuchadnezzar, after returning from the victory of Carchemish, had strengthened his internal dominion, first taking into consideration "the extension of his dominion over the Arabs on the lower Euphrates, in North Arabia and the Syrian desert" (DUNCKER). It is to be remarked in this connection, that according to CRESIAS, whose statement DUNCKER regards as credible (S. 804, 806 Ann. 2, etc.), the Babylonians had already brought Arabs with them to the siege of Nineveh.—The expression "sons of the East" is the "general designation of the Arabs, especially the nomad tribes of northern Arabia" (ARNOLD in HERZ., R.-Enc. I. S. 460). Comp. Jud. vi. 3, 33; vii. 12; viii. 10; 1 Ki. v. 10; Job i. 8; Isa. xi. 14; Ezek. xxv. 4, 10.—Curtains are the mats or canvas of which the tents consist. 10. Prophecy against Elam.

Elam is mentioned in the Old Testament in Gen. x. 22; xiv. 1, 9; Isa. xi. 11; xxi. 2; xxii. 6; Jer. xxv. 25; Ezek. xxxii. 24; Dan. viii. 2; Ezra iv. 9. Comp. supra ad xxv. 25. It is here mentioned as the representative of the more remote populations, beyond the Tigris, all those who are enumerated in the catalogue of nations beyond the Tigris in xxv. 25, 26. M. NIEBUHR assumes as certain a victorious war of Nebuchadnezzar with Elam between the ninth and twentieth years of his reign (Ass. u. Bab. S. 212). In this, however, he relies not on positive historical testimony but only on inferences, the correctness of which may be disputed. We are further in no need of an actual overthrow of Elam by Nebuchadnezzar. The kernel of the prophecy is an idea which retains its truth even if Nebuchadnezzar had never made war on Elam.

Why Jeremiah chose Elam as the representative of the eastern nations is not apparent. The supposition of EWALD (Proph. d. A. B., II. S. 130), that "the wild warlike Elamites had acted as auxiliaries shortly before in the deportation of Jehoiachin and the first great deportation of the people, and in this had shown themselves particularly cruel," does not appear to be well-founded. For 1. if the Elamites already served in the army of Nebuchadnezzar they needed not to be subjugated; 2. the superscription affords no sure criterion of the date. For it is highly probable that it is placed here by mistake, as we shall show on ver. 34. The prophecy does not mention Nebuchadnezzar by name, and we must therefore regard it as of the same date as the others in chh. xlv.-xlix. against the nations (except xlv. 13 sqq. and xlix. 28-33).

- 34 The word of Jehovah which came to Jeremiah the prophet with respect to Elam, in the beginning of the reign of Zedekiah, king of Judah, saying,
35 Thus saith Jehovah Zebaoth :
Behold, I will break the bow of Elam,
The chief part of their strength.
36 And I will bring upon Elam four winds from the four corners of heaven,
And will scatter them to all those winds;
And there shall be no nation whither the dispersed of Elam¹ shall not come.
37 And I will terrify² Elam before their enemies,
And before those who seek their life;
And I will bring calamity upon them,
The fierceness of my anger, saith Jehovah;
And I will send the sword after them,
Until I have utterly consumed them.
38 And I will set my throne in Elam,
And destroy king and prince from thence, saith Jehovah.
39 And it shall be at the end of days,
I will turn the captivity of Elam, saith Jehovah.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ Ver. 36.—עֵלָם In the Chethibh has expressions such as ver. 13; xxv. 12; II. 26, 62, etc., in view.

² Ver. 37.—וְהִפְתִּיתִּי comp. OLSEN., S. 563, 4,—xlv. 26; ix. 15.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

The bow of the Elamites, wherein their strength consists, shall be broken (ver. 35). They shall be attacked and scattered on all sides (ver. 36), and be pursued to destruction (ver. 37). In the country itself the Lord will hold strict judgment and exterminate all the rulers (ver. 38). Yet in the distant future Elam also shall be liberated and obtain salvation (ver. 39).

Ver. 34. The word . . . Judah. There are well-founded doubts as to the authenticity of this superscription. We have hitherto found without an exception, that in all prophecies which are older than the battle of Carchemish, Jeremiah never mentions Nebuchadnezzar and the Chaldeans, while in all the oracles subsequent to this catastrophe he knows and names Nebuchadnezzar as the Lord's chosen instrument. If now this prophecy really dates from the beginning of Zedekiah's reign, why is not Nebuchadnezzar mentioned? Why are the agents of the punishment spoken of in as general a manner as in the older prophecies? Or must not Nebuchadnezzar be necessarily regarded as the agent, as GRAF supposes (S. 676)? I hold it quite impossible for Jeremiah in the beginning of the reign of Zedekiah to have thought of any other than Nebuchadnezzar as an instrument of the execution, or to have left this point even in suspense. Compare only xxvii. 5 sqq., where the whole earth, with all that is thereon, is given over without exception or reserve to the Chaldean king. Add to this an external circumstance. Unreliable as the Alexandrian translation in general is, yet in some circumstances it may serve to indicate the original form of the text (comp. GRAF, Einkl. S. LVII.). This is here the case. As is well-known the prophecies against the nations have in the LXX. their place immediately after that indication of a Sepher, containing them, in xxv. 13, and this prophecy against Elam is at their head. It is introduced with the words: ἀ ἐκροφήτευσεν Ἰερემίας ἐπὶ τὰ ἔθνη τὰ Αἰλάμ. It further closes with the words: ἐν ἀρχῇ βασιλείωντος Σεδεκίου βασιλέως ἐγένετο ὁ λόγος οὗτος περὶ Αἰλάμ, and these words form in addition the beginning of ch. xxvi. However severely we may judge the arbitrariness of this translator, it must be admitted that this exceeds the customary degree thereof, which is substantially confined to abridgement (comp. GRAF, Einkl. S. XLIII.). What could have induced him to invent this postscript, since the brief oracle was sufficiently characterized by the prefixed words τὰ Αἰλάμ (evidently corresponding to the Hebrew דָּלַיִל, but on account of its brevity added as in apposition to the preceding ἐπὶ τὰ ἔθνη? Whence now that postscript? It is remarkable that in the LXX. the first verse of ch. xxvii. (Heb.) is wanting. It is the verse with the undoubtedly false name of Jehoiakim! Now ch. xxvii. stands in the closest topical relation to ch. xxv. In the symbolio sending of the yoke it forms an actual commentary to the symbol of the cup of wrath, xxv. 15 sqq. Ch. xxvi. on the other hand belongs to a much earlier date, and is merely inserted here, because it likewise (as ch. xxvii.) has for its subject the conflict with the false prophets, and bears as date the beginning of the reign of Jehoiakim. Compare the Introduction to the Ninth Discourse (ch. xxv.), and the rems. on xxvii. 1. This postscript now which the LXX. subjoins to the oracle against Elam suits exactly (only with the omission of the words περὶ Αἰλάμ) in the place of the verse wanting at the beginning of ch. xxvii., and, which is a matter of importance, it contains the right king's name, viz., that of Zedekiah. The supposition is thus pressed upon us that the prophecies against the nations originally had place immediately after ch. xxv., that ch. xxvii. was connected directly therewith (without the intervention of ch. xxvi.), that the prophecy against Elam formed the conclusion of the oracle against the nations, and that by mistake the Diaskenast who altered that original order, removed xxvii. 1, and attached it, as a postscript, to the oracle against Elam. In this behalf the words "against Elam," had to be inserted. This alteration must have been made in very early times, for it makes itself felt in both the Hebrew text and in the LXX. only with this difference.

that in the text, on which the LXX. was based, the misplaced words still stood at the close of the word directed against Elam, so that this had a superscription and a postscript, while in our Masoretic recension the postscript is made into the title by the assumption into it of the words דָּלַיִל-לָמ. For this purpose the form of the sentences must also have been altered, so that it was in correspondence with the superscription, xlvii. 1 and xlvii. 1, while in the Greek text (xxvi. 1) the old form is still perceptible. Thus substantially MOVES and HITZIG, with whom I feel compelled to agree in the main.

Vers. 85-89. Thus saith . . . saith Jehovah.

It seems to me far-fetched to take נִשְׁבַּע in the sense of virī fortes as HITZIG and GRAF would do, after the example of the Targum and several Rabbis. This meaning also does not seem to me to be proved. For in Isa. xxi. 17 the word is to be understood peculiarly (comp. DELITZSCH, ad loc.). In 1 Sam. ii. 4 and Hos. i. 5, it stands by synecdoche for all the means of attack and defence. And it is thus to be rendered here the rather as we know from history, that the Elamites were really celebrated as archers (comp. Isa. xxii. 6; Livy XXXVII. 27; HERZOG, R.-Enc., III. S. 748). The bow was the chief part of their strength (comp. ii. 8; Am. vi. 1, 6). When HITZIG inquires "why limit the breaking to the bow?" the answer is, because it was the main element of their power. To break their bow was to render them defenceless. When this is done, the advance is made upon them positively; from the four corners of the heaven are the four winds to rage against them and drive them one to another, i. e., the four winds shall scatter them to the four winds (comp. ver. 32; Zech. ii. 10; vi. 5). Without a figure, they shall be attacked on all sides and scattered on all sides, so that there will be no nation in which such Elamites are not to be found. That this is the sense is clear from ver. 37, where the same thing is expressed without a figure.—In the country itself will the Lord erect His throne (comp. the related but not identical expression, i. 15 and xlvii. 10), i. e., He will sit in judgment, and the heads of the people must appear to receive their sentences. But Elam also at the end of days shall share in the salvation which the Lord shall then bring to all nations by the Messiah (comp. xlix. 6; xlviii. 47). It is also not to be doubted that this word of consolation applies not to Elam alone, but to all the nations before mentioned.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. On xlix. 1. Has then Israel no heir? So the prophet tells the Ammonites. But to Israel himself he speaks differently; I will cast you out from my presence, as I cast out all your brethren, the whole seed of Ephraim (vii. 15). Thus the Ammonites have no right in Israel, and Israel, although he has forfeited his claim with respect to Jehovah, still has a right to his country with respect to the Ammonites, which he will one day, through God's grace, make good again. "Israel will one day possess and rule his possessors and rulers. This is Israel's eternal calling, which, in spite of every sin, must again be manifested, and is fulfilled in the Christian church to which all nations are given as a possession. Even now Jeremiah by God's word, of which he is the bearer, has power over Ammon as over all the heathen world. He surveys their whole character, and already holds judgment. In him is Israel's majesty and triumph even though on this account he is most mocked by the Jews." (DIEDRICH). As then the servants of Malcom occupied the territory of Israel, so since then have the servants of Mohammed occupied the territory of the Christian church in Asia and Europe. In both cases it was a judgment on the latter without conferring any right on the former. A time, however, will come when the restoration of Israel and of Christianity to their country, and their right will take place at the same time.

2. On vers. 4, 5. "The real confidence of the world is always on Mammon. They would satisfy the deity with their dead self-devised works, but with desire and the tension of all their powers does the world serve material interests, as they are now-a-days called? Soon, however, Ammon's corn-fields are overflowed by enemies, then even their confidence gives way to despair." DIEDRICH.

3. On ver. 7. "We see here, how God puts to shame those who depend on their wisdom and craftiness, so that we may ask: is there no more wisdom or counsel among the wise? Is their wisdom come to naught? Paul also writes of this (1 Cor. i. 19, 20) from the prophet Isaiah (xxix. 14 coll. Jer. ix. 23, 24). Biblische Summarien, etc.

4. On ver. 7 sqq. "Although Edom was the nation nearest to Israel both in relationship and acquaintance, it is thus only a precursor of Antichrist, who endeavors to hide a worldly character in Christian forms. Edom is irritated by the existence of Israel, the presence of the pure word of God is always a thorn in his conscience. From Edom came Herod who wanted to murder the child Jesus, and who also mocked the suffering Saviour. Edom was celebrated for wise proverbs; it possessed high mental endowments; but are not even these put to shame, when not accompanied by the fear of God?" DIEDRICH.

5. On ver. 12. Israel was the chosen nation, the son of the house (comp. Exod. iv. 22; Jer. xxxi. 9), and yet he was severely chastised. Further, there were in Israel many just and pious men, who did not share the sins of their people, but zealously contended against them. But even these also had to bear the severe chastening. "Prophets and priests were also carried away to Babylon; Daniel, Ezekiel and pious men like Ananiah, Azariah, Mishael, and probably very many others," says Theodoret. How then could another nation expect to be treated differently? Comp. Prov. xi. 31; 1 Pet. iv. 17, 18. There will, however, be a similarity also in this that finally the chastisement of both, the chosen nation and the other, will redound to their eternal welfare. Comp. ver. 39. "Justus est Dominus et rectum omne judicium ejus! Quæ etiam erat confessio Mauritiî imperatoris, quam edebat, cum videret sanctum suam uxorem gladio ferri paulo post ferendus et ipse." FÖRSTER. Ps. cxix., cxxxvii.

6. On ver. 16. "Fortifications may be constructed and made due use of, but they must not be depended upon. For no fortification is too strong or too high when God is angry, and will punish. And he has various ways of bringing them into the hands of the enemies as, He can cause provisions to fail; or a spark to fall in a powder-magazine; water may be wanting; there may be pestilence or the dysentery or mutiny among the soldiers, or bribes may be used as scaling ladders. Then all is in vain." CRAMER. "What the world calls protection, cannot protect against God's judgment; death mounts over all rocks." DIEDRICH.

7. On ver. 19. "God gives all authority and respect, and takes it all away. For He it is, who poureth contempt upon princes, Job xii. 21; Ps. cvii. 40; Isa. xl. 23." CRAMER. ["We need not be surprised by such a searching question as that in the present passage concerning CHRIST, when we remember that Edom is the prophetic type of Christ's enemies," etc. WORDSWORTH.—S. R. A.]

8. On ver. 25. "God can suffer moderate joyousness, but to be joyous from security and in an Epicurean manner, is commonly a preliminary to destruction, Matt. xxiv. 39." CRAMER.

9. On ver. 30. "Non est quo fugias a Deo irato, nisi ad Deum placatum, AUGUSTIN in Ps. lxxiv."—FÖRSTER.

10. On ver. 38. Where judgment is held there is the Lord's throne. For even the idea of judgment is divine, and all judges are the lower representatives of the highest judge. Woe to those judges who proceed so as to efface the idea which they represent. Well for us that there is a superior tribunal which will reverse all unjust judgments, and in all points bring true justice to the light, before which also summum jus will not be summa injuria.

11. On ver. 39. "In promissione spondetur Persis vocatio ad regnum Christi, cujus primitivæ fuerunt Magi (Matt. ii.), qui et ob id a Chrysostomo Patriarchæ gentium appellantur." FÖRSTER. [The fulfilment of this prophecy was seen, in part, when the Magi came to our Lord at Bethlehem; and still more on the day of Pentecost, when 'Parthians, Medes and Elamites' listened to the preaching of St. Peter at Jerusalem, and were received into the Christian church (Acts ii. 9, 14)."] WORDSWORTH.—S. 11. Prophecy against Babylon (chh. l, li.).

INTRODUCTION.

1. Before the battle of Carchemish Jeremiah predicted to his people a severe visitation by a people coming from the north, whom he afterwards recognized as the Chaldeans, and then constantly proclaimed that Israel and the other nations would be saved from complete destruction only by subjection to Nebuchadnezzar. It may, therefore, be said that during part of his ministry he spoke of the Chaldeans unknowingly in a manner favorable to them. There is no contradiction, however, as many suppose, in his here predicting the destruction of Babylon itself, and in the same manner by a people coming from the north (l. 8, 9, 41; li. 48). For Jeremiah would only say that for the present, in the proximate future, Babylon is the instrument of judgment on all nations (l. 23; li. 20 sqq.), but the time is coming when Babylon itself must drain the cup of wrath, in punishment for the sins which it has incurred in the execution of its mission (l. 11, 24, 28, 32; li. 6, 11, 24, 36, 56). Jeremiah's declarations for and against Babylon are thus related to each other, as in xxv. 27 the brief declaration, "and the king of Sheshach shall drink after them," is to the previous announcements that Babylon shall offer the cup of wrath. It is not strange to find a prophecy against Babylon in Jeremiah, but must be regarded as perfectly natural.

2. Prophecy against Babylon has a history. First, Isaiah, probably moved by the embassy, which Merodach-Baladan sent to Hezekiah (Isa. xxxix.; 2 Ki. xx. 12 sqq.) proclaimed the judgment of destruction on Babylon (Isa. chh. xlii., xlv., xlii.; xliii. 14; xlv. 1-2; xlvii.; xlviii. 14 sqq.). He is followed by Micah, who, in a brief declaration, comprises all which Jeremiah has said in his whole book for and against Babylon, "thou shalt dwell in the field, and thou shalt go to Babylon; there shalt thou be delivered; there the Lord shall redeem thee from the hand of thy enemies." Mic. iv. 10. Habakkuk then, the cotemporary of Jeremiah, prophesied before him, but after the battle of Carchemish, against Babylon, characterizing it not only in the narrower sense as a power hostile to the people of Israel, but also in a higher and more comprehensive sense as a worldly power, self-deifying, and the enemy of God. Jeremiah finally appropriates his predecessors: ♀ represents the acme of Old Testament prophecy against Babylon. He thus forms the main foundation for the prophecy of the Apocalypse concerning the Babylon of the final period. It is, however, to be observed that he gives relatively less prominence than Habakkuk to the ideal significance of Babylon as a type of ungodly, self-deifying, worldly powers. The latter does this in brief but wondrously profound and significant utterances. "For, lo, I raise up the Chaldeans, that powerful and irrepressible nation, which goes as far as the earth extends, to occupy dwellings which are not. Terrible and fearful are they; from themselves proceed their judgment and their dignity" (i. 6, 7). "Then he overflows with courage and transgresses and becomes guilty; this his power is unto his God" (i. 11). "Lo, inflated, not upright is his soul within him, but the just by faith shall live" (ii. 4). "Yea also because wine stultifies a man, who is arrogant and is not contented, who enlargeth his desire as hell, and is like death and cannot be satisfied, but draweth to himself all nations and gathereth to himself all nations" (ii. 5).—Jeremiah by no means passes over this element, but he rather intimates it only in single words, in those significant names which he gives to Babylon when he calls it Double defiance (l. 21), Pride (as personification in l. 31, 32), Heart of my opponents (li. 1), Golden cup making the whole earth drunk (li. 7). We may then say that of the two contemporary prophets, who lived to see the culmination of the Babylonian power, Jeremiah draws the grandest and most complete picture of the destruction menacing Babylon, but in such wise that he only intimates the ideal element which represents Babylon as the centre and type of all worldly enmity to God, while Habakkuk, who, notwithstanding the external insignificance of his little book, has a powerful and profound mind, gives us deeper glimpses into the inner life of the Babylonian empire.

3. It is not, however, the prophets who first stamped Babylon as a centre and type of ungodly empire. This character was impressed upon it from the earliest period. It was the locality of the first earthly principedom. That Nimrod, whose memory is preserved to the present day by the ruined tower of the Birs Nimrud, and who still lives in the traditions of the East as a great

11. Prophecy against Babylon (chh. L, li.).

INTRODUCTION.

1. Before the battle of Carchemish Jeremiah predicted to his people a severe visitation by a people coming from the north, whom he afterwards recognized as the Chaldeans, and then constantly proclaimed that Israel and the other nations would be saved from complete destruction only by subjection to Nebuchadnezzar. It may, therefore, be said that during part of his ministry he spoke of the Chaldeans unknowingly in a manner favorable to them. There is no contradiction, however, as many suppose, in his here predicting the destruction of Babylon itself, and in the same manner by a people coming from the north (l. 3, 9, 41; li. 48). For Jeremiah would only say that for the present, in the proximate future, Babylon is the instrument of judgment on all nations (l. 23; li. 20 sqq.), but the time is coming when Babylon itself must drain the cup of wrath, in punishment for the sins which it has incurred in the execution of its mission (l. 11, 24, 28, 32; li. 6, 11, 24, 36, 56). He is followed by Micah, who, in a brief declaration, comprises all which Jeremiah has said in his whole book for and against Babylon, "thou shalt dwell in the field, and thou shalt go to Babylon; there shalt thou be delivered; there the Lord shall redeem thee from the hand of thy enemies." Mic. iv. 10. The latter does this in brief but wondrously profound and significant utterances. "For, lo, I raise up the Chaldeans, that powerful and irrepressible nation, which goes as far as the earth extends, to occupy dwellings which are not. Terrible and fearful are they; from themselves proceed their judgment and their dignity" (i. 6, 7). "Then he overflows with courage and transgresses and becomes guilty; this his power is unto his God" (i. 11). "Lo, inflated, not upright is his soul within him, but the just by faith shall live" (ii. 4). "Yea also because wine stultifies a man, who is arrogant and is not contented, who enlargeth his desire as hell, and is like death and cannot be satisfied, but draweth to himself all nations and gathereth to himself all nations" (ii. 5).—Jeremiah by no means passes over this element, but he rather intimates it only in single words, in those significant names which he gives to Babylon when he calls it Double defiance (l. 21), Pride (as personification in l. 31, 32), Heart of my opponents (li. 1), Golden cup making the whole earth drunk (li. 7). We may then say that of the two contemporary prophets, who lived to see the culmination of the Babylonian power, Jeremiah draws the grandest and most complete picture of the destruction menacing Babylon, but in such wise that he only intimates the ideal element which represents Babylon as the centre and type of all worldly enmity to God, while Habakkuk, who, notwithstanding the external insignificance of his little book, has a powerful and profound mind, gives us deeper glimpses into the inner life of the Babylonian empire.

3. It is not, however, the prophets who first stamped Babylon as a centre and type of ungodly empire. This character was impressed upon it from the earliest period. It was the locality of the first earthly principedom. That Nimrod, whose memory is preserved to the present day by the ruined tower of the Birs Nimrud, and who still lives in the traditions of the East as a great criminal and enemy of God, had, according to Gen. x. 8 sqq., Babylon as the beginning of his dominion. The first aristocrat, hero of the chase and of war, conqueror, and despot, proceeded from Babylon. Add to this, that the Babylonian tower-structure is, according to its most essential nature, to be regarded as an undertaking of human pride begun without God and in man's own strength. The tower was to be a memorial of a period of gigantic effort and aspiration towards the political concentration of the human race into one irresistible power. Thus we see that the ideas of earthly power and glory were from the first native to the soil of Babylon. Comp. NAGELSB., Jer. u. Bab., S. 6 sqq.; PERIZONIUS, Orig. Babylonica, Cap. 10-12; JAHN, Archæology I., 1, S. 80, coll. DRYLINO, Observ. Sacra, P. III., p. 19 ff.—BRIAN WALTON in his Polyglott, Lond., Proleg. I., pag. 8; HETZEL, Gedanken über den babylonischen Thurmbau, Hildb., 1775; GÖRRES, Die Völkertafel des Pent., Regensburg, 1845, I, S. 51. The seed sowed in that primitive period reached its full bloom in Nebuchadnezzar. By him Babylon was really made the first "all-devouring" universal monarchy, by which I mean that his power was greater than that of the Assyrians before him, or the Persians and Romans after him. But he also devoured the theocracy, i. e., the only point on this earth where the kingdom of God was represented in the form of a human popular and civil life. Since that time the kingdom of God as such has had no place on earth. It is still as the church in the embrace of worldly power. Babylon, however, the first worldly power which brought the kingdom of God into this condition, appears from that time in the Scriptures as the worldly power, κατ' ἐξοχήν, so that not only what the Old Testament prophets declare of the different representatives of worldly dominion, of Egypt (Rev. xi. 8), Tyre (Rev. xviii. 11 coll. Ezek. xxvii.), Nineveh (Rev. xviii. 3, 6 coll. Nah. iii. 4; Jon. i. 2), is transferred in the New Testament to Babylon, but even the name of Babylon itself is attributed to the final form of the worldly power, antichristian Rome. Comp. Rev. xvii. 9, 18. See in general Rev. xiv. 8; xvi. 9, and especially chh. xvii., xviii. This subject is treated more in detail in NAGELSB. Jer. u. Bab.

4. With regard to the etymology of the name Babylon there have been two opposite views. According to one, which was first broached by STRAPHANUS BYZANTINUS and the Etymologicon Magn. s. v. Βαβυλῶν, the name, designates Bel as the founder of the city. EICHHORN (Biblioth. d. bibl. Litt. III., S. 1001) accordingly explains בָּבֶל as arising from Bâb Bel, i. e., porta or aula Bel. GESSENIUS (Thesaur., pag. 212), TUCH and others modify this view, in so far that they translate בָּבֶל domus Bel, since the word is written in Arabic bâbel, and bâ is frequently used in Arabic names of cities for bî, bêt. KNOBEL (Gen., S. 128) derives Babel from Bar-bel, i. e., arx (βάρυς, בִּירָה) Bel. It is opposed however to these explanations that they are supported on partly much too recent and partly altogether insecure linguistic analogies. The other explanation is founded on Gen. xi. 7, 9 (בְּלֵלָה שְׁפָתָם), ver. 7 and

אֶרֶץ כְּנַעַן שְׁפָתָם כְּנַעַנִי. According to this בְּלֵלָה arose from כְּנַעַנִי. The punctuation of the first syllable is to be explained after the analogy of שְׁפָתָם for שְׁפָתָם, כְּנַעַנִי for כְּנַעַנִי (Ew. § 158, c; OLSH. § 74, § 189, a). For the Segol of the second syllable appeal might be made to כְּנַעַנִי (DELITZSCH on Gen. xi. 9). The meaning would be confusio. Comp. Exod. xxix. 2, 40; Lev. ii. 4-6; further, כְּנַעַנִי, farrago; כְּנַעַנִי, troubling, blemish (Lev. xxi. 20). These explanations are also favored by the ancient translations. ONKALOS translates כְּנַעַנִי Gen. xi. 7, by כְּנַעַנִי, ver. 9, by כְּנַעַנִי, confudit. Comp. BUXTORF, Lex. Rabb. et Talm., pag. 309. The Peshito version has in xi. 9 balbel (comp. CASTELLI, Lex., pag. 100); SAADIAH balbala confudit.—Comp. GABLER, Urgeschichte II. 2, S. 228. HAEVERNICK, Einleit. i. A. T., I., S. 147, 8.—The Babylonian monuments lead to still another etymology. According to OPPERT, namely (Exp. en. Mesop. II. S. 46), the word reads on the monuments Babi-ilu, Babilu. Bab is the Shemitic בָּב door, Ilu the Ἡρακλῆς in Diodorus, the Κρόνος of the Greeks, Saturn, the god of the deluge. The meaning of the name would then be Porta Dei diluvii. Comp. Ib., S. 67, 157, 259.—Which of these explanations is the correct one is by no means decided, for even the cuneiform inscriptions, presupposing that they are correctly deciphered, represent a late date in relation to the origin of the name, and it is a question whether the Babylonian scholars themselves knew the correct etymology of the word. [Comp. also SMITH's Dictionary of the Bible, s. v., Babel, Babylon; RAWLINSON, Ancient Monarchies, I., p. 149; ID., Herodotus, II., p. 574; DR. PUSEY, Lectures on Daniel, p. 271, n, quoted in WORDSWORTH ad loc.—S. R. A.]

5. The genuineness of this prophecy has been shown by me in detail in my work Jeremia und Babylon, S. 69 ff. GRAF also acknowledges it (S. 580 ff.). Only EWALD and MEIER, so far as I know, still persist in maintaining its unauthenticity. "This portion evidently belongs to the last period of the exile, and cannot therefore proceed from Jeremiah," says the latter (Die prophet. Bücher d. A. T., S. 350, 2). I myself formerly regarded the passage l. 41-46 as a gloss, but I have now retracted this opinion. But after repeated investigation I cannot regard the passage li. 15-19 as original. Consult the exegesis. In respect to the word שְׁפָתָם, li. 41, also, my suspicions have not yet been removed.

6. In what manner the prophecy is related to its fulfilment has been fully shown in NAGELSB. Jer. u. Bab., S. 135. I add to the remark there, that according to THEODORET Jews were the last inhabitants of the destroyed city of Babylon, the following notice from OPPERT (Exp. I., S. 135): "Hillah fut fondée par Seifeddaulet vers l'an 1100 à la place de l'antique ville de Babylone, où ils dem. Jusque-là, des Juifs avaient habité seuls la ville ou plutôt les ruines de Babylone; en 1030 après Jésus-Christ ils quittèrent ces lieux." Many later witnesses thus corroborate the statement of THEODORET, that the people of Israel could not separate themselves from the corpse of the city, which had destroyed Jerusalem and the temple.

7. In regard to the division of the portion, I am no longer of opinion that the whole is to be discriminated into three main sections with thirteen subdivisions. I still think that three chronological stages may be distinguished, in so far as the destruction of Babylon is represented partly as future, now in the stage of preparation (comp. l. 9, 21, 26, 41) partly as present, in the process of execution (comp. l. 14, 24, 25, 43, etc.; li. 1, 11, 27), partly as already accomplished (comp. l. 2, 15, 46; li. 39, 41, 46, 57). And these three stages are so distributed that the first is chiefly in the beginning, the second chiefly in the middle, the third towards the close; but not so sharply defined that l. 21—li. 33 may be regarded as the second and the foregoing and following as the first and third divisions. The single tableaux or pictures, of which, according to the peculiar style of Jeremiah, the discourse consists, are more distinct. I find nineteen of these, exclusive of the superscription and the historical close. The exegesis will exhibit these in detail.

1. The Superscription.

L. 1.

- 1 The word which Jehovah spoke against Babylon, against the land of the Chaldeans, by Jeremiah the prophet.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

The form of the superscription is like those in xlvi. 1; xlvii. 18. The expression יְהוָה is not found in any other superscription of Jeremiah's. It occurs in this sense only in xxxvii. 2. In my work, Jer. u. Bab., S. 22, I have proposed the hypothesis that there is in this an intimation that this prophecy, according to li. 59 sqq., was given only by the hand, not by the mouth of the prophet. אֶל-אֶרֶץ defines more particularly the idea of כָּל and guards against too narrow a rendering. Comp. l. 8, 45; li. 54.

2. The cord broken; Israel free (Ps. cxxiv. 7).

- 2 Declare it among the nations,
Publish it and erect a signal;
Publish it, conceal it not.
Say "Babylon is taken, with shame stands Bel,
Merodach is thrown down, with shame stand her images, Thrown down are her idols."
- 3 For a nation cometh against her from the north,
And will make her land desolate,
That no inhabitant shall be therein
From man down to beast they flee; up, away!
- 4 In those days and at that time, saith Jehovah,
The children of Israel shall come,
They and the children of Judah together;
Weeping shall they come
And seek Jehovah their God.
- 5 After Zion shall they inquire,
Their faces turned thitherward:
"Come, let us join ourselves to Jehovah.
In a perpetual covenant that shall not be forgotten."

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ Ver. 5.—(נלל) נלל. Both forms are Imperative, and there is no need either to take נלל as Perf. or to alter נלל into נלל (Gram.). Comp. EWALD, § 226, b; OLSEN, § 264; Joel iv. 11; Isa. xliii. 9.

² Ver. 5.—ברית עולם. Accus. modalis. Comp. NABOLSE, Gr., § 70, f; xxxi. 31, 32; xxxii. 40.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

The prophet in the first two verses goes to work analytically, first (ver. 2) causing the destruction of Babylon to be proclaimed aloud to all nations, and then (ver. 3) saying, how and by whom this destruction will be accomplished. This analytic description serves him, however, only as a basis for a promise important to him above all, viz., that in those days the captives of Israel and Judah being liberated, will come home and be united to their God in an eternal and unforgettable covenant (vers. 4, 5).

Vers. 2, 3. Declare it . . . up, away. The importance of the matter is shown in the grandeur and animation of the opening, in which the summons to proclaim and the declaration of the destruction are five times repeated. Comp. iv. 5, 6; v. 20; xxxi. 7; xlv. 14.—Erect a signal, i. e., for the rapid spread of the tidings. Comp. li. 12, 27; iv. 6; vi. 1; Isa. v. 26; xliii. 2.—Conceal it not. The address seems to be to the friends of Babylon, who might be disposed to withhold this Job's post.—Taken. Comp. viii. 9; x. 14; xlv. 24; xlviii. 1.—Bel and Merodach are not different deities, but one and the same (comp. DELITZSCH on Isa. xlv. 1). The temple of Belus (comp. Herod. I. 181, 2) was also the temple of Marduk, as he is called on the monuments. Here he was worshipped as the Bilu rabu (בַּלְעַל רַב) as deus augurationis and protective deity of Babylonia. "Toute la dynastie Babylonienne (says OPPERT, Exp. en Mesop., Tom. II., p. 272) le met (Merodach) à la tête des Dieux, et l'inscription de Borsippa le nomme le roi du ciel et de la terre. Nebo prend la seconde place et les autres divinités ne paraissent que rarement." Comp. Tom. I, p. 178, 9.—That he is not Mars, as I formerly supposed and HAHN in DRECHSLER's Jeeaja on xxxi. 1 (II., 2, S. 212) directly maintains, is decidedly affirmed by OPPERT (p. 271).—The purport of the proclamation is expressed in vers. 2b and 3 only. From ver. 4 we have the words of the prophet, who predicts in what manner these results will be attained. This is seen from the imperfects נִיָּי, נִיָּי, etc.—A nation from the north. Comp. ver. 9. The destroyers of Babylon are to come from the north, and in li. 27, 28 nations to the north and north-east of Babylonia are mentioned. Comp. the map in NIEBUHR's Ass. u. Bab., and S. 185, Anm. 1; 427, 8.—Moreover, the remarkable parallelism should be noticed, Babylon, once the nation from the north, menacing Israel, is now attacked by such a nation. Comp. ii. 15; iv. 7; ix. 9; xxxiii. 12; li. 62.

Vers. 4, 5. In those days . . . forgotten. The destruction of Babylon is immediately followed by the redemption. The prophets so regard it as to comprise all the stages of its fulfilment through several thousand years in one picture. To this picture belongs above all the reunion of the tribes of the northern and southern kingdom (comp. iii. 14-16) and then their honest conversion to the Lord (comp. iii. 21; xxxi. 9-19; Hos. iii. 5), the return to Zion (xxx. 8), the conclusion of a covenant with Jehovah, which shall not be broken and forgotten like the first (comp. Gen. xvii. 10; Lev. xix. 5-7; Deut. xxix. and xxx.). Comp. also Jer. xx. 11; xxiii. 40.

3. The Chastisement of the Chastiser.

L. 6-13.

- 6 A lost herd¹ was² my people:
Their shepherds had led them astray on seductive mountains,³
From mountain to hill they went,
Forgot their fold.
- 7 Whoever found them devoured them,
And their oppressors said: We incur no guilt,
Because they have sinned against Jehovah,
The true pasturage and their fathers' hope, Jehovah.
- 8 Flee out of Babylon and—
Let them go⁴ forth out of the land of the Chaldeans,
And be as the rams before the sheep!
- 9 For behold, I raise and lead⁵ against Babylon
An assembly of great nations from the north country;

- They equip themselves against her, there^e she is taken—
 Their arrows^f like those of a successful^g hero, who returneth not empty, 10 And Chaldea shall become a prey;
 All that plunder her shall be satisfied, saith Jehovah.
 11 For thou rejoicest^h, for thou exultedst, robber of my heritage,
 For thou skippedst like a thrashingⁱ calf
 And neighedst like the strong steeds.
 12 Your mother is put to great shame,
 She that bare you blushes.
 "Behold the last of the nations, wilderness, waste, and steppe," 13 Because of the wrath of Jehovah it shall be uninhabited,
 And shall be wholly a desolation:
 Whoever passeth by Babylon is amazed,
 And mocks her on account of all her strokes.

- Ver. 6.—The plural אֲנָכִים depends on the ideal plural in מָן. Comp. NABEGLSB. Gr., § 105, 3; Gen. xxx. 38; Jer. xxxiii. 13; Job i. 14.
 Ver. 6.—The Chethibh הָיָה is referred to the subject as e. g., in Gen. xxxi. 8. The Keri is therefore unnecessary.
 Ver. 6.—הָרִים שׁוֹכְנִים. The Chethibh is usually read שׁוֹכְנִים (iii. 14, 22) the Ker שׁוֹכְנִים. I think, however, that we must read the Chethibh שׁוֹכְנִים (comp. xxxi. 8; xlix. 4), and understand it in the meaning of "alienating, seductive mountains." We then take the word in the same sense as those who follow the Keri, and find our support like them in passages like Isa. xlvii. 10. Comp. rems. on xxxi. 8.
 Ver. 8.—Chethibh מָן. This sudden change of person is not uncommon. (Comp. v. 14; xii. 13; xvii. 13; xxi. 12 Chethibh); xxxi. 3; xxxvi. 29, 30; xlv. 3-6; xlvii. 7. NABEGLSB. Gr., § 101, 2, Ann.
 Ver. 9.—מַעֲרִי וּמַעֲרָה. Observe the paronomasia and compare li. 1, 11; Isai. xlii. 17.
 Ver. 9.—מַעֲרָה. If this word is regarded as local, it is difficult after עָרְכָה לָהּ to find a suitable terminus a quo. I therefore prefer to understand it with ROSENTHAL, DE WETTE, UMBRIT, of time. Comp. Hos. ii. 17; Job xxxv. 12.
 Ver. 9.—רָצִי. The suffix is to be referred to the entirety of those nations regarded as one male person.
 Ver. 9.—מַשְׁכִּיל. Comp. x. 21; xxiii. 5.
 Ver. 11.—The Keri הַשְׁכִּיחָה, etc. is occasioned by שָׁפִי, but is unnecessary, for the prophet conceives the Chaldean nation as one female individual, as in רָצִי the enemies as one male. Comp. e. g., iii. 8-10, and אֲפָכָם in ver. 12.
 Ver. 11.—רָשָׁא. Part. from רָשָׁא to thrash (Hos. x. 11), אֲ for רָ as e. g., Lam. iii. 12; comp. OLSH. § 108, e, Ann. 164, b.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Israel has certainly sinned greatly by idolatry (ver. 6), and has therefore been deservedly chastised by his enemies (ver. 7). But now the hour of deliverance strikes (ver. 8), for the Lord sends against Babylon great hosts of nations from the north, who will attack it successfully (ver. 9). In consequence Babylon itself shall become a prey (ver. 10), and receive the punishment for having discharged its office as punisher of Israel with arrogant and malicious joy (ver. 11). It shall thus be the last of nations, and the country be a horrible wilderness (vers. 12, 13).

Vers. 6, 7. A lost herd . . . hope, Jehovah. Comp. Ezek. xxxiv. 4, 16; Ps. cxix. 176; Luke xv. 4, 6.—Their shepherds. Comp. x. 21; xii. 10; xxiii. 1 sq.—Seductive. The mountains may well be thus called, which by means of the worship of high-places practised upon them, exerted such an irresistible charm on the heart of carnal Israel. Comp. ii. 20; iii. 2; vi. 23; xvii. 2.—Whoever found them. Comp. ii. 3; x. 25; xxx. 16. In this expression there is evidently an intimation that Israel has been often devoured. The enemies had a certain degree of justification in this, but in yielding to the illusion that they could not sin against Israel, forsaken by his God, and could therefore do any thing to him, they incurred great guilt, as is seen in what follows.—True pasturage. Zion is called מְצֻדָה in xxxi. 23. Here Jehovah Himself is so called, as elsewhere a fortress (Ps. xviii. 8) sun, shield (Ps. lxxxiv. 11), shade (Ps. cxi. 6).—Father's hope. Comp. xiv. 8; xvii. 13.

Vers. 8-10. Flee . . . saith Jehovah. The tables are turned. Babylon must now suffer the punishment of injustice. The hour of deliverance has struck for Israel and the other nations held in bondage. Hence the summons is made to Israel to flee. Comp. Isa. xlviii. 20; lii. 11; Zech. ii. 10.—As the rams, etc. The sense is not both that Israel is to press forward in order to save himself before all, but rather that it is to go before all (comp. ver. 16) as an example and leader in the flight.—North. Comp. rems. on ver. 3.—Like those, etc. Comp. iv. 81; xlv. 22; NABEGLSB. Gr., § 65, 3 Ann.—Who returneth, etc. Comp. 2 Sam. i. 22.—Chaldea, Kasdim as the name of the country, as in li. 24, 35; Ezek. xi. 24.—A prey. Comp. xlix. 32.

Vers. 11-13. For thou rejoicest . . . stroke.—I take פִּי simply as "for," so that ver. 11 gives the reason why Chaldea is to become a prey. The imperfects then designate the action as continuing in the past. Comp. NABEGLSB. Gr., § 87 f.; Jer. xv. 9; xxxvi. 18.—Vers. 12, 13 conclude the discourse with a lively description, sketched in a few powerful strokes of the condition of Babylon after the attack predicted in vers. 9, 10. The prophet beholds this as though it had been produced in his presence. Hence the perfects is put to shame, and blushes (xv. 9). Observe that the prophet here addresses the single individuals of the nation. Hence your mother and last of the nations. Comp. Ps. cxxxix. 9; Am. ix. 1; Jer. xxxi. 7.—Waste (וָצַד). Comp. li. 48.—Uninhabited. Comp. Isa. xliii. 20; Jer. xvii. 6, 25; xxx. 18.—Whoever passeth. Comp. xviii. 16; xix. 8; xlix. 17.

4. The Vengeance of Jehovah.

L. 14-16.

- 14 Array yourselves against Babylon round about, all ye archers, Shoot¹ at her, spare not² the arrows,
For against Jehovah hath she sinned.
15 Cry against her round about!
She stretches forth³ her hand;
Fallen are her bastions,⁴
Thrown down are her walls.
For Jehovah's vengeance it is.
Avenge yourselves on her!
As she hath done, do also unto her.
16 Exterminate the sower from Babylon,
And him that handleth the sickle at the time of harvest.
Before the destroying sword let every one turn to his people,
And every one flee into his own land.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ Ver. 14.—וָצַד. The Kal here only. Elsewhere Piel only occurs; Joel iv. 3; Obad. 11; Nah. iii. 10; Lam. iii. 58; Zech. ii. 4.

² Ver. 14.—חָצַל with מָל, as in li. 3; Isa. ix. 18.

³ Ver. 15.—Owing to the animation of style, the perfects are without the connecting Vau. Comp. Josh. vi. 5, 10, 16, 20; 1 Sam. xvii. 23.

⁴ Ver. 15.—אֲשֵׁרֶיהָ or אֲשֵׁרֶיהָ (Chethibh) occurs here only. Likewise the form of the Keri אֲשֵׁרֶיהָ. The root appears to be אֲשַׁר, from which at most in Hebrew the proper name אֲשֵׁרֶיהָ is derived. Related, however, is אֲשַׁר, to be strong, firm (Arab. assa) from which אֲשַׁר (Isa. xvi. 7) the foundation-walls and the Aram. אֲשַׁר, plur. אֲשַׁר (Ezr. iv. 12; v. 16; vi. 3), which the prophet chose purposely. Comp. ver. 23. From the radical meaning "to be strong," may also be derived that of fortification, defence, bastion.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

This picture is a supplement to the foregoing, and a further delineation of particular features. (a) The attack is described more in detail (vers. 14, 15 a); (b) the connection between the fall of Babylon and its malignant pride (ver. 11) traced through the idea of recompense and vengeance of Jehovah (vers. 14 b, 15 b); and (c) the desolation of Babylon, described generally in vers. 12, 13, is rendered more palpable in ver. 16 by the setting forth of single characteristic features.

Vers. 14, 15. Array . . . unto her.—Array evidently refers to equip (עָרַךְ), ver. 9, but as the attack was only ordered there in general, the manner of it is here more specially designated. Comp. ver. 29; xlv. 9—Both these verses correspond exactly in their structure. Each begins with a summons to attack, and closes with a causal sentence of the purport that this warlike proceeding is an act of Jehovah's vengeance. Yet there is a gradation in the two, for while in ver. 14 the attack is described in only its first stage, ver. 15 brings before us the last decisive storm in the words Cry against her, which has the surrender for its immediate consequence. That the words are to be understood in this sense, seems to me clear from round about. Comp. ver. 14. The triumphant cry sounds not from the environs, but from within the city.—Stretches forth her hand. This is a token of subjection. Det manus vincique se patiat. CICERO, De Amic. Cap. 26 fin. Comp. 2 Chron. xxx. 8; Lam. v. 6.—For Jehovah's, etc. This point also is here expressed more strongly than in ver. 14 b, and thus forms the transition from ver. 14 to the threatening of judgment. Babylon has called forth the vengeance of Jehovah by its malicious pleasure and arrogant violence. Comp. ver. 28; li. 6, 11, 86; xlv. 10.—As she hath done. Comp. ver. 29; Ps. cxxxvii. 8; Rev. xviii. 6, 7.

Ver. 16. Exterminate . . . his own land. This verse also specializes a general idea expressed in the previous context, viz., that of desolation, and this from two points of view. It is first said that what had hitherto been an ornament of the city, and had increased their power of resistance, viz., the fields inside the walls (DROB. SIC., II. 9; CURT. v. 4; PLIN. Hist. Nat., XVIII. 17), will be given up to desolation for lack of men. It is evident that the prophet had these fields within the city in view from the fact that he is describing the siege of the city of Babylon throughout. Then, however, he predicts the flight of all who are not Babylonians (for the Babylonians will fall by the sword), Israel at their head (ver. 8). Comp. xlv. 16; Isa. xiii. 14.

—Destroying sword. Comp. xxv. 38; xlv. 16. In the latter passage the LXX. translates as here, μάχαιρα ἑλληνική, which Theodoret explains: πρὸ τῆς Βαβυλωνος Ἀνδρὸς ὁ Κύριος κατεστρέψατο καὶ Ἰωνας καὶ Αἰόλεας. Another explanation is given by WALTON (Polyglott, Lond., Tom. I., pag. 47. Introd.): Ira columbæ (xxv. 38), gladius columbæ designant iram et gladium Chaldeorum, in quorum labaro erat columba argentea pennis inauratis Semiramidem representans.

L. 17-20.

- 17 A scattered sheep is Israel, which the lions chased.¹
First the king of Assyria devoured him,
And last this Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon hath broken his bones.²
18 Therefore thus saith Jehovah Zebaoth, the God of Israel;
Behold, I visit the king of Babylon and his land
As I have visited the king of Assyria.
19 And I bring Israel home to his pasturage,
To pasture on Carmel and Bashan,
And on mount Ephraim and Gilead his soul shall be satisfied.
20 In those days, at that time, saith Jehovah,
The iniquity of Israel shall be sought for,³—and it is gone!
And the sins of Judah—but thou findest them not.⁴
For I will pardon him whom I reserve.

¹ Ver. 17.—This is to be regarded as a relative sentence with אֲשֶׁר understood. Comp. NABEGLER, Gr., § 80, 6.

² Ver. 17.—נִסְּרָה here only. It is formed like נִסְּרָה, denominative from נִסְּרָה. As this signifies "to strip off, to gnaw off" (Num. xxiv. 8; Ezek. xxiii. 34), so the former means "to bone, to destroy the bones."

³ Ver. 20.—אֵינָם עוֹנִין נִכְשָׁן אֶת-יְהוָה. Comp. xxxi. 34; xxxiii. 8; xxxvi. 3. In regard to the construction comp. NABEGLER, Gr., § 100, 2.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Hitherto Israel has been a poor frightened sheep, driven and devoured by two mighty wild animals, Assyria and Babylon (ver. 17); but the tables are to be turned. Assyria has already received its chastisement. That of Babylon will not be deferred (ver. 18). Then will Israel again feed peaceably on his own pasture (ver. 19). The reason of this wonderful change consists in this, that the Lord will show kindness to His people and forgive them all their iniquity (ver. 20).

Vers. 17-19. A scattered . . . be satisfied. Assyria destroyed the northern, Babylon the southern kingdom. In both cases the destruction was complete, and consequently represented by the figure of devouring, only with this difference that as a still higher degree the breaking of the bones is mentioned in the second case. After the destruction of the kingdom of the ten tribes the kingdom of Judah still remained as the skeleton of the theocracy. In destroying Jerusalem and the temple Nebuchadnezzar, as it were, broke its bones.—As I have visited. Comp. xlv. 25. The then already long past destruction of Nineveh is thus the type and pledge of the destruction of Babylon.—Bring Israel home. Comp. Ezek. xxxviii. 4; xxxix. 2.—Pasturage. Comp. xxiii. 8; xxii. 6; Mic. vii. 14; Isa. xxxiii. 9; Nah. i. 4; Ezek. xxxiv. 13, 14.

Ver. 20. In those days . . . reserve. Comp. ver. 4. As in the mention of Assyria and Babylon, vers. 17, 18, there was a reference to the community of the two halves of the theocratic nation in misfortune, so here their union in prosperity is expressly set forth. Comp. rema. on ver. 4. The reason of their restoration to prosperity is here mentioned; Jehovah's grace which will grant forgiveness to the survivors, and cause their guilt to disappear without a trace.

6. One Hammer crushed by the Other.

L. 21-23.

- 21 Against the land of DOUBLE-DEFIANCE;¹
 Go up against it and against the inhabitants of VISITATION!
 Slay² and burn after them, saith Jehovah,
 And do according to all that I commanded thee!
 22 Cry of war in the land and great ruin!
 23 How is the hammer of the whole earth crushed and broken!
 How is Babylon become a horror of desolation among the nations!

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ Ver. 21.—Ewald has well remarked that the word מְרִיתִים is used in antithesis to אֲרָם-נְהָרִים, Mesopotamia. Not Double-river, but Double-defiance (comp. Zweifbrücken [Bipontes] in Germany) was to be Babylon's title. For similar names comp. e. g., Mic. i. 10. The word does not occur elsewhere. It may be derived from מָר, although the mention of Israel by this name (Ezek. ii. 7; xlv. 6) may be regarded as analogous to, or an imitation of (comp. מְקוֹר, ver. 21, and Ezek. xxiii. 23) this expression. A singular מְרִית from מָר, rebellis fuit, also does not occur. מְרִיתִים is a new form made by the prophet. FURBER would derive it from מָרַת, to which he ascribes the meaning of "lordship." But the analogies מוֹרָה (Job xxxvi. 22; Aram. מָרָא, מָר), מְרִיתִים, מְרִית (Mic. i. 12) are very uncertain, and admit of another explanation. The word מָרַת, rebellis fuit, is always used elsewhere of Israel, but this limitation of the use is not necessarily founded in the radical signification. There is no reason then why a word formed from the root, new and specially ad hoc., should not be applied in another case. In regard to the dual it is ungrammatical to attribute to it the significance of a climax, which it never has elsewhere.

² Ver. 21.—חָרַב a denominative from חָרַב. Comp. ver. 27; 2 Ki. iii. 23.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

A complete picture, the specific element of which is the prophet's showing how the Lord sends a chosen instrument to crush Babylon, which has hitherto served Him as such in the chastisement of mankind. In brief but powerful lines is described the summons to the instrument (ver. 21), the execution of the commission (ver. 22), the result (ver. 23).

Vers. 21-23. Against the land . . . among the nations. What is meant by the double defiance it is difficult to say. We may regard it not inappropriately as the double visitation of the theocratic nation by Assyria and Babylon (vers. 17, 18). The name, however, is given only to Babylon, which according to this view represents only half the defiance. The connection seems to require an interpretation according to which Babylon itself receives the whole reproach, and here, as it seems to me, two points may be observed: 1. The defiance which Babylon manifested both towards man and God, in revolting against the king of Assyria its master, and in sinning against Jehovah by its arrogant demeanor towards Israel. 2. The double defiance, which Babylon manifested in the earliest period in the erection of the tower of Babel and the founding of the first worldly kingdom (Gen. x. 8 sqq.), and in later times by its behaviour towards the theocracy. I formerly inclined to the latter view, but now give the former the preference, because it is more natural and presents more clearly the element of doubleness. For the sin of Babylon against the Lord in earlier and more recent times is too entirely one and the same for it to be represented as a double one.—Against it. Comp. ver. 3. The singular appears to me to be due to a different reason from that in ver. 3, for there we find גּוֹי, nation, which according to what follows is to be taken as collective. Here, however, the subject is left indefinite. This is the more surprising, as previously the enemies of Babylon are always called upon in the plural (vers. 14-16). When then in the following ver. 23 Babylon is designated as the crushed hammer, i. e. as the instrument of Jehovah, which He Himself has destroyed, is it not most natural to regard as the subject of the imperative in ver. 21 the instrument of which the Lord will make use in the destruction of His former instrument? Then, however, it is natural to place over against the Babylonian hammer (מַטְיָשׁ, comp. Grotius ad loc.), viz., Nebuchadnezzar, another hammer, i. e. over against the already known and mentioned (ver. 17) representative of the first empire, the representative (certainly only sometimes present in idea) of the other empire called to its destruction. Comp. li. 20.—Visitation is also a name formed ad hoc, and given to Babylon in antithesis to its double-defiance, which deserves visitation. Thus the former name designates Babylon's guilt, the latter its punishment. Comp. vers. 18 and 81 and Ezek. xxiii. 23, which passage is based on this. Comp. HAEVERNICK on the passage.—Burn. Comp. xxv. 9.—Cry of war, etc. Comp. iv. 6; vi. 1; xiv. 17; xlviii. 8; li. 54.—How, etc. Comp. Isa. xiv. 12; Jer. li. 20, 41.

- 24 I have placed¹ a net for thee and thou art also taken,
O Babylon, and thou knowest it not.
Thou art found and also caught,
For against Jehovah hast thou striven.²
- 25 Jehovah hath opened his arsenal,
And brought forth the weapons of his wrath;
For the LORD Jehovah Zebaoth hath a work in the land of the Chaldeans.
- 26 Come hither even the last, open her storehouses,³ Cast it up as heaps of rubbish and burn it,⁴ Let there be nothing left of it.
- 27 Slay all her bullocks,
Down with them to the slaughter-house!
Woe unto them, for their day is come,
The time of their visitation.
- 28 Hark! the fleeing and escaped from the land of Babylon,
To proclaim in Zion the vengeance of Jehovah, our God,
The vengeance of his sanctuary.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

In this picture the element of secrecy and surprise as excluding all resistance, which will prevail at the capture of Babylon, is made prominent (ver. 24). This mode of capture is rendered possible by the Lord's having opened His armory and brought into use all the means of attack which it affords. He has done this because He would manage the business with Babylon as a matter of the highest importance (ver. 25). As now, however, the Lord has emptied His arsenal against Babylon, so also shall all store-houses in Babylon be emptied and all living and dead treasures contained therein be destroyed (vers. 26, 27). The escaped of Zion, however, shall bring home the joyful tidings of Jehovah's vengeance (ver. 28). We see that these verses also furnish a complete picture progressing from the beginning to the close with special prominence of single specific elements.

Ver. 24. I have placed . . . striven. In this placing of a net or snare lies the element of commencement on account of which we regard this verse as the commencement of a new picture. This must be so the rather as ver. 23 evidently contains a conclusion. The prophet in spirit sees Babylon unexpectedly caught in a net or snare. How literally this would be fulfilled Jeremiah himself might have no idea (comp. 1 Pet. i. 11). Twice was Babylon taken by stratagem, and both times so that the city was in the power of its enemies, before it was aware. Herodotus says (I. 191), with reference to the capture by Cyrus, that if the Babylonians had known or observed his plan (the diversion of the Euphrates) they could have inflicted great injury on the Persians. But these came upon them quite unexpectedly (ἐξ ἀπροσδοκήτου σφί παρέρστησαν οἱ Πέρσαι), the outer parts of the city being already taken before those who dwelt in the central parts had observed what was going on (τοὺς τὸ μέσον οἰκοντοὺς οὐ μανθάνειν ἐπὶ τῶν πόλεων). With reference to the capture by Darius Hystaspis, however, he says (III. 158) that a part of the Babylonians, who saw the entrance of the Persians through the gate opened by Zopyrus, fled, the rest remaining every one in his place till they also perceived that they were betrayed (ἐξ δ' οὕτω καὶ οὗτοι ἔμαθον προδομένοι).

Vers. 25-28. Jehovah . . . sanctuary. The capture of a city like Babylon by an overwhelming surprise is not possible without great means. Such are now provided by Jehovah, for He opens His arsenal (comp. x. 13; li. 16) to take from it all necessary implements of war (comp. Isa. xiii. 5). This He does because He has a מִלְאָכָה, a business in the land of the Chaldeans.

A business or work of Jehovah is always a great and important matter, and is therefore not to be performed negligently (xlviii. 10). To the execution of this work He now summons His servants and instruments (ver. 26), who are to come יָבִיאוּ. If we refer this to the city (attacked from the end, not from the middle) the meaning is feeble and unsuitable, for a city can only be attacked from without and thus from the ends of it. If it be rendered "from all ends" (round about, vers. 15, 29) we miss the word for "all." Hence it is best to take it with EWALD and GRAY —ad unum omnes. If the outermost come, all come. Comp. Gen. xix. 4; xlvii. 2; Isa. lvi. 11; Ezek. xxxiii. 2.  Just as she hath done, do ye also unto her,

 Against the Holy One of Israel.
 30 Therefore shall her young men fall in her streets,
 And all her warriors shall be cut off in that day, saith Jehovah.
 31 Behold I come to thee, O Pride, saith the Lord, Jehovah Zebaoth.
 For come is thy day, the time of thy visitation.
 32 Then Pride totters and falls,
 And none helps him up;
 And I kindle a fire in his cities,
 Which shall devour all round about.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ Ver. 29.—יָבִיאוּ. As there is no substantive here as in ver. 41; xvi. 16, the meaning appears to be different. Derived from יָבִי (Gen. xlix. 23; Ps. xviii. 16 coll. יָבִי Gen. xxi. 20) יָבִי is found with the meaning of "archer," also in Job xvi. 13; Prov. xxvi. 10.

² Ver. 29.—יָבִיאוּ. The Keri unnecessarily adds יָבִי from ver. 26.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Warriors are summoned to recompense Babylon for the pride which it has manifested towards Jehovah (ver. 20). Its men shall perish (ver. 31). Thus will the Lord on the day of recompense bring their pride to totter and fall; no one will raise it up, fire will consume all its power (vers. 31, 32).

Ver. 29. Call . . . of Israel. Convocatio militum initium belli. Comp. ver. 14. יְהוָה יִשְׁמָעֵל is taken by most commentators and translators in the sense of vocare, convocare, as in li. 27; 1 Ki. xv. 22 coll. 1 Sam. xv. 4.—All ye, etc. Comp. ver. 14.—Recompense, etc. Comp. ver. 15; xxv. 14.—Proud. Deserved humiliation of the pride of Babylon is predicted by earlier prophets: Isa. xlii. 11; xiv. 18 sqq.; xlvii. 7, 8; Hab. ii. 5, 8.—Holy One of Israel. Comp.

DELITZSCH on Isa. xlii. 21) are jackals. Ibn-Awi is the Arabic name for jackal. Our translation "Shuhus and Uhus" [horned owls], is based on formal grounds. [UMBERT and BLAYNEY read "wild-cats and jackals" or "wild-dogs." HITZIG as in the text.—S. R. A.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Proceeding from the condition of bondage in which Judah and Israel are found (ver. 33), the prophet predicts deliverance by the strong hand of Jehovah (ver. 34), which to Babylon signifies destruction of all that supports its power and glory: the inevitable fate of an idolatrous people (vers. 35-38). In consequence of this Babylonia will become a deserted and horrible waste (vers. 39, 40).

Vers. 33, 34. Thus saith . . . inhabitants of Babylon. The prophet, who knows the exile of Israel as an accomplished fact and has predicted for years the exile of Judah as impending, may well describe Judah and Israel as oppressed, held fast by their captors (אֲרָיוֹת, captivatores, Isa. xiv. 2; 1 Ki. viii. 46 sqq.; Ps. cxxxvii. 8). It is the same thought which lies at the foundation of the summons to flight (ver. 8 coll. vers. 4 and 28).—They refuse, etc. As Pharaoh, Exod. vii. 14-27; ix. 2.—The strong captor is, however, opposed by a still stronger deliverer of Israel,—Jehovah. With the exception of the words "Jehovah Zebaoth is His name" (x. 16; xxxi. 35; xxxii. 18; xxxiii. 2), the first half of ver. 34 is taken from Prov.

xxiii. 11 coll. xxii. 23; Isa. xlvii. 4; xlviii. 20.—That he may give rest, etc. Since it may be appropriately declared of Babylon, as the “hammer of the whole earth,” ver. 23, that it has disquieted the earth (Isa. xiv. 16), and that consequently its disquieting must contribute to the peace of the earth, I agree with those who take לרַחֵם in its usual meaning, “to make rest, quiet” (Deut. xxviii. 65; Isa. xxxiv. 14; li. 4; Jer. xxxi. 2).

Vers. 35-38. A sword . . . foolishly trust. In these verses it is specially shown how the Lord will conduct His cause with Babylon and bring disquiet upon it. The sword is as it were cited to exercise the office of avenger, both in general and in particular. For as its objects are designated: 1. the Chaldeans in general; 2. the inhabitants of the capital, with the resident princes, wise men (counsellors of the king), Magians (מַגִּיִּן, “talk, chattering,” xlviii. 30; Isa. xvi. 6; Job xi. 3; here personally the lying prophets, astrologers, Isa. xlii. 25, comp. DELITZSCH ad loc.; xlvii. 13, xix. 13) and warriors; 3. horses, chariots and auxiliaries (xxv. 20; comp. НИЗВУХА, Ass. u. Bab., S. 206 Anm. 2 and the article “Griechen” in the Register S. 519; li. 80); 4. treasures and water, on which last the power and safety of Babylon in great measure depended. (Comp. li. 13, 36; Isa. xxi. 1 and DELITZSCH ad loc.).—For it is a land, etc. This sentence corresponds to ver. 34. As there the positive reason of the destruction breaking over Babylon is stated, so here the negative. The positive ground is the strength of Jehovah (קוֹי, ver. 34), the negative is the powerlessness of the idols. Comp. li. 47, 52.—Foolishly trust. The prefix בְּ [on] may designate either the means and instrument, or the supporting or moving reason. The former yields the conception that the idol-images served as the instruments of mad behaviour, the latter that they were the ground thereof. Without doubt the latter is the more correct. The senseless, inflated, arrogant behaviour of the Babylonians was supported by their belief in idols. Comp. ἄλλω with בְּ in ii. 8 and the Greek παλινθεῖν ἐν τῷ θεῷ. HEROD. IV. 79.

Vers. 39, 40. Therefore shall . . . sojourn in her. The first half of ver. 39 is composed of reminiscences from Isaiah (Isa. xiii. 21, 22; xxxiv. 14). The second half of the verse is taken verbatim from Isa. xiii. 20. Comp. ver. 13; xvii. 6. Ver. 40 is a repetition of xlix. 18, but taken originally from Isa. xiii. 19 coll. Am. iv. 11. The original passage on which all these prophetic utterances are based is Deut. xxix. 22.—Comp. xlix. 33; li. 43.

10. Non tu, sed tibi.

L. 41-46.

- 41 Behold, a people cometh from the north,
And a great host and many kings break up from the ends of the earth.
- 42 Bow and lance they bear,
Cruel are they¹ and without compassion.
Their sound roareth like the sea,
And on horses they ride equipped like a man for the battle Against thee, thou daughter of Babylon.
- 43 The king of Babylon hath heard the report of them,
And his hands are feeble;
Anguish hath seized him, trembling as a parturient.
- 44 Behold, like a lion he ascends
From the pride of Jordan to the evergreen pasturage,
For in a twinkling I drive her² from thence,
And—who is chosen? Him I set over her.
For who is like me, and who will order me?
And who is the shepherd who may stand before me?
- 45 Therefore hear the counsel of Jehovah that he hath counselled against Babylon,
And his thoughts which he hath thought against the land of the Chaldeans:
Yea, they will be dragged away, the weak little sheep,
Yea, the pasturage will be amazed concerning them.
- 46 With the cry, “Babylon is taken,” the earth trembles,
And a crying is heard³ among the nations.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

This entire passage consists of quotations, vers. 41-43 being taken from vi. 22-24, vers. 44-46 from xlix. 19-21. As the prophet has already repeatedly designated the enemy as one coming from the north, it was natural to apply the former prophecy of the enemy threatening Judah from the north to Babylon, and it must also be admitted that the prophet would find it appropriate to transfer the prophecy of the chosen instrument for the destruction of Edom (xlix. 19-21) to the similarly chosen instrument of the destruction of Babylon. Although thus the quotations here are accumulated to a degree greater than heretofore, I am yet convinced (contrary to my former view in Der proph. Jer. u. Bab., S. 128 ff.) that the passage is genuine and original. The idea of the unity of God's judgments and of just recompense was to be represented here. This would receive no detriment, even if every single feature of the former prophecies did not seem adapted to be applied to Babylon. This, however, is not the case, for we find in the text such modifications as the application to Babylon required; daughter of Babylon, ver. 42; King of Babylon, ver. 43; against Babylon and the land of the Chaldeans, ver. 45; Babylon is taken, ver. 46; among the nations, for, in the Red Sea, ver. 46. What is not altered is not then opposed, according to the author's judgment, to its application to Babylon. The figure in ver. 44 a is therefore not inappropriate. The pride of Jordan and evergreen pasturage belong to the picture. The lion, which, from the reed-thickets on the Jordan, falls upon the flocks feeding near the bank (comp. rema. on xlix. 19), is a figure which may be applied to any case of overpowering hostile attack. Likewise the description of the northern people (vi. 28) is by no means so special that it may not be applied to any people advancing with warlike impetuosity. Moreover, Jeremiah, when he wrote vi. 22-24, neither had the Chaldeans specially in view, nor are they so very different from their neighbors, the Medes.

The addition and many kings in ver. 41 is thus explained, that in the conception of the prophet the picture was present of a host of enemies, composed of many different elements (comp. li. 27, 28).

11. The Heart of the insurgents, the Fanners and the Invidious.

2 And I sent unto Babylon fanners,²

But their land is full of guilt on account of the Holy One of Israel.6 Flee out of Babylon, and let every man deliver his soul;

2 Ver. 2.—וְנָרִים. The analogy of xlviii. 12 seems to require the punctuation וְנָרִים. וְנָרִים is very troublesome. Although violence by strangers is spoken of in many places (comp. ver. 51), this idea does not at all suit this connection, and the frequent occurrence of וְנָרִים while וְנָרִים is not found elsewhere (only וְנָרִים occurs in Ruth iii. 2), may indeed have occasioned the Masoretic punctuation, unless וְנָרִים itself may be taken as Part. Kal. after the analogy of וְנָרִים, וְנָרִים, וְנָרִים, etc. (comp. OLSH., §245, a).

3 Ver. 3.—וְיָתֵעַל. This is the main difficulty in ver. 3. For, 1. this Hithp. form does not occur elsewhere, 2. the abbreviated Imperfect form, if the word comes from וְיָתֵעַל, is surprising. According to the laws of the Hebrew language, however, וְיָתֵעַל can come only from וְיָתֵעַל (comp. OLSH., §269, d). It must then signify "lift one's self up." Then the abbreviated form is strange, which might be in place after וְיָתֵעַל, but not after וְיָתֵעַל. I do not think, however, that we need be so scrupulous in the matter. As in Jeremiah (and elsewhere) the full form stands where we should expect the abbreviated (comp. iii. 7; EW., §224, c), so may the latter stand where we should expect the former. Comp. Jer. xvii. 8, Chethibh; EW., §224, c, Am., §123, 2, Am.. Then the rest, according to the reading of the Chethibh, affords no difficulty. EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Babylon, the heart of Jehovah's opponents, shall be fanned like chaff (vers. 1, 2). Without a figure; a strong, warlike power shall cast down Babylon (vers. 3, 4). For Israel and Judah are not forsaken widows; rather shall they be delivered and Jehovah's vengeance executed on Babylon (vers. 5, 6).—The passage thus consists of two halves: vers. 1-4, and vers. 5, 6. In the first half the judgment on Babylon is announced, (a) under the figure of fanning, vers. 1, 2; (b) in unfigurative language, vers. 3, 4. The second half is related to the first as a statement of the reason (For, ver. 5). The judgment, namely, is impending, because the Lord will show Himself a faithful husband with respect to Israel, a righteous recompenser with respect to Babylon.

Vers. 1, 2. Thus saith calamity.

Whether וְיָתֵעַל [heart of my insurgents] is to be explained by the Atbash [or principle of alphabetical inversion, according to which it is equivalent to Casdim, the Chaldeans] is doubtful, for the expression might be used by the prophet without any reference to that permutation of letters. As he called Babylon Double-defiance and Visitation in l. 21 and Pride in l. 31, so might he call it Heart-of-my-insurgents. This designation was a natural one. It is founded in the significance which the idea of Babylon has in the consciousness of the entire Old and New Testament prophecy. For though it is only in the Apocalypse that Babylon is distinctly set forth as the comprehensive centre of all and every hostility to the Lord and His kingdom (comp. NABGELSB. Jer. u. Bab., §10 ff.), this representation is rooted in the views of the Old Testament prophets concerning Babylon, and we shall not err if we regard this passage as the chief basis of this conception of Babylon by the New Testament revelator, according to which it is declared to be the "Mother of harlots and abominations of the earth" (Rev. xvii. 5). Still it is remarkable that the name וְיָתֵעַל should form, according to the Cabbalistic play upon words, an expression with a suitable meaning (comp. Buxtorf, Lex. Chald., p. 248, 9; Herzog, Real-Enc., VII., §205). The expression וְיָתֵעַל signifies indeed everywhere else (ver. 11; Hagg. i. 14; Ezr. i. 1, 5; 1 Chron. v. 26; 2 Chron. xxi. 16; xxxvi. 22) "to awaken, excite the spirit." But the expression is not necessarily restricted to this meaning. In this passage where fanning is spoken of, the context requires the meaning "wind." It seems that the expression first began to come into use in the time of Jeremiah, for previously it does not occur. It is however quite natural that a mode of expression still in its formative state should at first waver in its signification. Only when it has become fixed by long usage in a definite sense can it no longer be taken in another sense without misapprehension.—Who shall fan. Comp. xlix. 32, 36.—And empty. Comp. xix. 1, 7; Isa. xxiv. 1; Nah. ii. 3. Here the prophet passes from the figurative to the literal mode of speech, for the fanning will consist in just this, that the land will be emptied, men and property being carried away.—For upon it, etc. Comp. iv. 17; xvii. 17, 18.

Isa. l. 1; liv. 4-6; Lam. i. 1.—Their is to be referred to Babylon. The sense of this half of the verse is: it might appear as if the Lord were better disposed towards Babylon than Israel, because the latter is a captive in the power of the former. It is not so. Babylonia is laden with guilt with respect to Jehovah, and is therefore under the curse of the Holy One of Israel. I do not see what there is unlike Jeremiah in this verse. That וְיָתֵעַל for guilt does not occur elsewhere in Jeremiah is nothing to the point. The occurrence of the expression וְיָתֵעַל here, as in l. 29, is not strange in view of the frequent quotations from Isaiah. With respect to the connection with the preceding and following contexts, however, it should be mentioned that ver. 5 in an exceedingly appropriate manner gives a double reason for the announcement contained in vers. 1-4: 1. a negative one (Israel is not rejected); 2. a positive one (Babylon is full of guilt). Ver. 5 is also connected with ver. 6 in two ways: 1. as an integral part of the entire discourse, vers. 1-5, in so far that ver. 6 draws the inference from all that has gone before (vers. 1-5); 2. specially by the words, "Let not destruction come upon you through their sin," which apparently refer to "their land is full of guilt."—Flee, etc. Comp. 12. The golden Cup broken.

LI. 7-10.

- 7 A golden cup was Babylon in the hand of Jehovah,
Which made all the earth drunken:
Of its wine have nations drunk,
And nations have become mad.
8 Suddenly is Babylon fallen and shattered:
Howl over her, take balsam for her pain,
If so be she may be healed.
9 We have healed¹ Babylon, but she was not healed:
Forsake her and let us go each into his own country:
For her judgment reacheth² unto heaven,
And towers up even to the clouds.

Come and let us declare in Zion the work of Jehovah, our God."

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

These verses also contain a picture complete in itself. For the prophet shows us first Babylon at the height of its power, when it was like a golden cup, in which Jehovah gave the nations the wine of His wrath to drink (ver. 7). Now the parts are changed. Babylon is itself "a sick man," and the prophet therefore calls upon the nations that have become tributary to him to give him medicine (ver. 8). These answer that they had tried this in vain, and mutually expect each other to flee from the common prison (ver. 9). Israel is one among these nations, and therefore calls upon those who belong to it to journey home, and in their home declare the mighty acts of the Lord in the deliverance and justification of His people (ver. 10). We see that the discourse is dramatically arranged, and as to its purport, proceeds from the height and greatness of Babylon to its fall.

Vers. 7, 8. A golden cup . . . be healed. The prophet had here xxv. 15 in mind. That which in l. 23 and li. 20 is expressed by the figure of the hammer is expressed here by the figure of the cup, except that in the hammer the element of irresistible power, in the golden cup that of pride and glory, is more prominent. The cup, however, is "in the hand of Jehovah." It is therefore Jehovah's instrument, and what it bestows is the gift of Jehovah. From the effect of this gift we see that its object was punishment. The nations are intoxicated by it, and become like mad (comp. xxv. 16). This figure portrays the overwhelming fulness of destructive effect which they were obliged to receive.—Comp. Rev. xvii. 2, 4.—[Babylon, "like a fair harlot, has bewitched thee with the love potions of her idolatries." WORDSWORTH. The same image is used in the Apocalypse. Comp. also DOCTRINAL NOTE No. 17.—S. R. A.]—Now Babylon itself is thrown down, shattered, sick unto death. The expression "Babylon is fallen" seems to be taken from Isa. xxi. 9. Comp. Rev. xiv. 8; xviii. 2. The figure of the cup is abandoned gradually. It is still perceived in the word shattered, but the balsam and the pain presuppose a living organism. Those who are called upon must be the same who afterwards speak, vers. 9, 10. It is the nations conquered and held in captivity by Babylon which speak, among them Israel. They are the same who were spoken of in l. 8, 16. These are summoned to heal Babylon, because they are now his servants, and thus obligated to render him assistance.—Balsam. Comp. xli. 11; viii. 22.

Vers. 9, 10. We have healed . . . our God.

Those who are called upon do not refuse to render the service, but this is shown to be in vain. They express this after having made the attempt, and hence the perfect tense—vi. 14; xv. 18; xvii. 14. They thus express that in the service of Babylon they have honestly done what they could for its deliverance. As all their attempts have proved vain, they think of their own safety by flight into their native lands. Comp. Isaiah xiii. 14; Jer. xvi. 16.—The reason why Babylon was not to be helped lies in the immeasurable greatness of the evil which has come upon it. The punitive judgment advances upon them so overpoweringly that it reaches even to the sky. Comp. Ps. xxxvi. 6; lvii. 11; cviii. 5.—Israel, who is especially benefited by the breaking of the prison, rejoices above all that his honor is saved, that he has not everlastingly disappeared and perished as something entirely bad, but is still preserved as good for something. We might be tempted to take righteous works (צְדָקוֹת) in the sense of "salvation" (comp. Isa. lxii. 1), but the plural is opposed to such a rendering. For though the "righteousnesses of Jehovah" are spoken of in the sense of "saving acts" (comp. Jud. v. 11; Ps. ciii. 6) the righteousness of Israel, which the Lord has brought to light, cannot well be other than such facts as render manifest that Israel is still worthy the honor of being the people of Jehovah (comp. Isa. lxii. 2). Comp. Ps. xxxvii. 6; Jer. l. 20.

13. The triple Threatening.

LI. 11-14.

- 11 Sharpen¹ the arrows, fill the shields!²
Jehovah hath awakened the spirit of the kings of Media,
For his mind is against Babylon to destroy it;
For the vengeance of Jehovah it is,
The vengeance of his sanctuary.
- 12 Against the walls of Babylon raise standards,
Strengthen the watch, appoint watchmen,
Lay the ambush!
For as Jehovah hath thought so also hath he done—
All that he hath spoken against the inhabitants of Babylon.
- 13 O thou that dwellest on great waters, on greatness of treasures!
Thine end is come, the ell of thy section.³
- 14 Sworn hath Jehovah Zebaoth by himself:⁴
"Have I filled thee with men as with grasshoppers,
So shall they sing over thee the song of the vintage."

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ Ver. 11.—יִחַרְרֵם is properly to polish, but arrows are polished by being sharpened. The word is thus rendered by the Chaldee and Vulgate.

² Ver. 11.—שָׁלְטִים. The meaning is doubtful. It may be quiver, arrow, or shield. ROEDIGER, in Gen. Thea., p. 1418, decides for the last, and I also think that both the parallel passages (comp. Song of Sol. iv. 4 with 2 Chron. xxiii. 9; Ezek. xxvii. 11; 1 Chron. xviii. 7) and the use of the word in Aramaic favor the meaning "shield." To fill the shields is a phrase like brachio implere. Comp. כִּלְאָ קֶשֶׁת, Zech. ix. 13, and KOEHLER thereon. [WORDSWORTH prefers the translation quivers as given by the Vulg., Syriac, and Targum. COWLES: "The Hebrew word means primarily to fill. GESNIUS supposes it means here, Fill the shields with the soldiers' own body, i.e., put them on; while MAUREK suggests the sense, 'Fill them with oil,' anoint them as a preparation for service, urging that this is in harmony with the preceding clause, 'Polish the arrows,' and corresponds with Isaiah xvi. 5, 'Anoint the shields.'"]—S. R. A.]

⁴ Ver. 4.—בְּנַפְשׁוֹ. Comp. Am. vi. 8.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

A triple call of threatening against Babylon forming a climax; first (ver. 11 a) a general summons to war, with mention of the warlike power thus called upon, then (ver. 12 a) an immediate attack on the walls of the city is commanded, and in the third place (ver. 13), its approaching end is announced. Each of the calls is, however, followed by a statement of reasons, in which also a climax may be perceived. For ver. 11 b announces the decree of Jehovah and its cause; ver. 12 b contains the assurance that with the Lord purposing and acting are the same thing. Ver. 14 strengthens the threatening of ver. 13 by reference to a solemn oath of Jehovah.

Ver. 11. Sharpen . . . sanctuary.—Hath awakened, etc. Comp. rems. on ver. 1. This passage is taken from Isa. xiii. 17, from which we see that the definition of the enemies, threatening from the north (l. 9, 41), as the Medes is older than Jeremiah. Comp. ver. 28. In this sentence the prophet informs us to whom the summons of the preceding clause is addressed. The second half of the verse contains a double statement of cause, first the proximate and immediate, then the remote and mediate, but at the same time deepest ground of the summons. Comp. l. 15, 28.

Ver. 12. Against the walls . . . of Babylon. The military signals are to precede the attack on the walls of Babylon. On account of against the walls, O, standards, seems here to be not the mere general signal of convocation or message, but a military sign indicating a particular point of attack. The word also denotes the flags of ships (Isa. xxxiii. 23; Ezek. xxvii. 7). Comp. WINER, R.-W.-B., s. v. "Fahnen" and "Schiffe." The watch and watchmen appear to be related to each other as defensive and offensive (comp. 2 Sam. xi. 16, and HIRTZIG).—Am-bush. Comp. Josh. viii. 14-16; Jud. xx. 33-35.—For, etc. To wish and to do are to be shown to be identical with Jehovah. Comp. iv. 28; Lam. ii. 17; Zech. i. 6; viii. 14, 15.

Vers. 13, 14. O thou that dwellest . . . vintage. The greatest supports of the power of Babylon were the waters surrounding it (comp. vers. 32 and 36; l. 38; Isa. xxi. 1; Ps. cxxxvii. 1), and the great riches which Nebuchadnezzar accumulated (comp. Βαβυλὼν ἡ πολὺχρυσος, Æsch. Pers. 52, and OPPERT, Exped. en Mésop. l. p. 175), and which rendered it possible for him to erect his immense buildings. DUNCKER says in reference to this: "Nebuchadnezzar had no need to fear that he would exhaust the subjects of his native land by the cost of his buildings. The immense booty of Nineveh, the greater part of which accrued to the Babylonians, the plunder of Jerusalem, the tributes of Syria and the Phœnician cities furnished the greatest means. The fruitfulness of the Babylonian territory, the produce of the fields depended on the overflowing of the Euphrates. By an extensive system of dams, canals and conduits, Nebuchadnezzar succeeded both in conducting the water of the Euphrates to every point of the Babylonian plain, and in draining the marshes and averting the violent inundations, which were not infrequent" (Gesch. d. Alterth., I., S. 846). Add to this that these water-courses were of the greatest importance for the defence of the country. "Their object was primarily irrigation and navigation; but they afforded at the same time strong lines of defence against the enemy," says NIEBUHR (Ass. u. Bab., S. 229).—On a cylinder in the possession of Mr. Thomas Phillips, which has been deciphered by Grotefend, Nebuchadnezzar says (according to OPPERT, p. 281): "Tout autour je fis couler de l'eau dans cette digue immense de terre. A travers ces grandes eaux comparables aux abîmes de la mer, je fis faire un conduit." Comp. ib., p. 234.—Their end is come. Comp. Gen. vi. 13.—Ell of thy section. There are two renderings of this, "measure, end of thy fury, avarice, gain." So GROTIUS, CAPELLE, CHR. B. MICHAELIS, ROSEN-MUELLER, EWALD, HIRTZIG. But עֵלָּא is the ell or yard measure, and does not involve the idea of full measure, or end. Hence the other rendering is to be preferred, which, after the example of Jerome (pedalis præcisionis tux), is adopted by VENEMA, J. D. MICHAELIS, EICHHORN, DE WETTE, GESSENIUS, BÖTTCHER (Proben alttestam. Schrifterkl., S. 289, Anm. m), MAURER, GRAF. The idea lying at the foundation of the expression "the ell of the cutting thee off," is that the thread of life is measured, and when a definite number of yards is reached, will be cut off. Comp. Isa. xxxviii. 12; Job vi. 9.—HAVE I, ON '2, are not here particles of asseveration, as in 2 Sam. xv. 21; 2 Ki. v. 20, but conditional, if I have filled thee with men as with grasshoppers (comp. xlvii. 23), this was only in order to be able to tread the more abundant vintage (עֵלָּא). Comp. rems. on xxv. 80). Hence even the song of the treaders is a sign of their work yielding abundant returns.

Passage inserted from x. 12-16.

LI. 15-19.

- 15 Who maketh the earth by his power,
Establisheth the globe by his wisdom,
And by his understanding stretched out the heavens.
- 16 At the sound of his voice, throng of waters in the heavens,
And vapors he bringeth up from the ends of the earth;
He maketh lightnings to the rain,
And bringeth the wind out of his chambers.
- 17 All men stand there mute, without understanding;
All the founders of idol images are put to shame,
For a lie is their molten work, no spirit is therein.
- 18 They are vapor, turned to ridicule;
At the time of their visitation they perish.

- 19 Not so the portion of Jacob;
For he formeth all things and the rod of his inheritance.
Jehovah Zebaoth is his name.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

This whole passage is a quotation from x. 12-16. It interrupts the connection in a disturbing manner. For even if the words in vers. 15, 16 may be regarded as suitable to support the thought that Jehovah, who has sworn in ver. 14 to destroy Babylon, has also the power to realize this threat, the following exposition of the vanity of idols is a superfluous appendage to the present prophecy. There is no point either in the following or previous context which requires such an exposition. It is a mere digression.

Add to this, that in ver. 19 the words ישראל are omitted before שֶׁכֶתֶם (comp. x. 16). If this omission is not due to a mere oversight, it betrays the hand of an emendator, who, to honor the tribe of Judah, wishes to remove the appearance as though only the Israel of the ten tribes were the stock of Jehovah's inheritance. And with thee I overthrow kingdoms.
21 And with thee I break in pieces the horse and his rider,
And with thee I break in pieces the chariot and its driver.
22 And with thee I break in pieces man and woman,
And with thee I break in pieces old man and boy,
And with thee I break in pieces young man and maiden, 23 And with thee I break in pieces the shepherd and his flock,
And with thee I break in pieces the husbandman and his team,

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

A picture very clearly complete in itself. The prophet sees in spirit a large number of persons before him who are to serve the Lord for a hammer, in order therewith to dash to pieces nations and kingdoms, especially, however, Babylon in all its parts, and thus to recompense to it what it has inflicted on Zion.

Vers. 20-24. A hammer . . . saith Jehovah. In l. 23 Babylon was called "the hammer of the whole earth," and it might certainly be addressed again in the same way here. Many expositors, the LXX., JEROME, THEODORET at their head, are of opinion that it is so. But 1, it should be observed that another word and, indeed, one formed ad hoc is chosen. Comp. TEXTUAL NOTE 1. May not the prophet have intended to indicate by using another word, specially formed for the occasion, that he meant another hammer than that spoken of before in l. 23? 2. The perfects with the Vau consecutive may, indeed, be taken in a past sense (comp. xviii. 4; xix. 4, 5; xxxvii. 11), but this construction is not normal. The imperfect would be more correct. 3. מַסְכֶּה, ver. 24, must at any rate be taken in a future sense. Since, however, this word is a perfectly similar form to the previous perfects and similarly construed, there is a presumption that the perfects are also to be rendered as futures. 4. In l. 21 we found an ideal person addressed, of which the Lord would make use as His instrument in the chastisement of Babylon. It is to the same that the prophet here turns. That he referred in thought to L. 21, 22, is evident from יָצַד, which he opposes to שׁוֹמֵר there used. He here, however, extends the task appointed to the hammer, for it is not to visit Babylon only, as in l. 21, but many nations and kingdoms. Who this chosen instrument was to be the prophet was ignorant.—To take יָצַד weapon, as singular for יָצַד, with HIRZIG and GHAF, appears to me unnecessary. The former is not a single weapon, but comprehends all weapons of war. The objects enumerated as to be broken form in a certain measure a circle, proceeding from the great and strong to the small and weak, and then rising from the young man and maiden again to the great and strong.—Chaldea. Kasdim as the name of the country, as in l. 1*Q coll.* li. 35.—Before your eyes, is to be referred to I recompense, since it would be superfluous referred to have done, and expresses the thought that those who now hear of the destruction of Babylon will also see it, and thus be convinced by ocular demonstration of the truth of Jeremiah's prediction.

15. The Destroying Mountain.

LI. 25, 26.

- 25 Behold, I come to thee, thou destroying mountain,
Saith Jehovah, which destroyed the whole world;
And I stretch forth my hand over thee,
And roll thee from the rocks and make thee a burnt mountain.
26 And they shall take no stone of thee for a corner,
Nor a stone for foundations,
But thou shalt be perpetual ruins, saith Jehovah.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Babylon is here compared to a mountain, which has a widely destroying influence. This can refer only to a volcano, and with this it agrees that the mountain, after being laid bare to its rocky heart, is said to be a burnt-out mountain (ver. 25). So much, however, has it suffered by the destroying energies that its stones are not even available for building material.—We see that these two verses afford a picture perfectly complete in itself. [COWLES: "This blending of the figures of the volcano and the avalanche may not conform to the nicest rules of rhetoric, but none can say the conceptions are not grand and their significance both clear and strong."—S. R. A.]

Vers. 25, 26. Behold, I come . . . saith Jehovah.—Behold, etc. Comp. xxi. 13; xxiii. 30-32; l. 31.—The expression destroying mountain [הַר הַמְשִׁחִית], occurs besides only in 2 Ki. xxiii. 18, where the mount of Olives (or the southern peak thereof, the mons scandali or offensionis of ecclesiastical tradition; comp. KEIL on Kings, S. 362), is so called [A. V. "Mountain of corruption"]. The Mount of Olives evidently received this appellation from the corrupting influence which proceeded from it in religious matters. May not Babylon also be called a destroying mountain in spiritual relations? If then we remember that the name of Babylon is connected even in primæval traditions with defiant worldly power and idolatry (comp. l. 29-32, and NAEGLER, Jer. u. Bab., S. 5 ff.), we may well suppose that the prophet also had the corrupting spiritual influence of Babylon in mind (comp. also l. 88; li. 1, 44). We are not, however, justified in restricting his view to this single point, the element of destructiveness in a physical sense being also quite natural. It is repeatedly expressed in this prophecy. Comp. the hammer, l. 23, and the cup, li. 7 coll. xxv. 15-17.—We may then assume that Babylon is designated as a destroying mountain in a spiritual and physical reference. Perhaps in the term "mountain," there is also a hint at the tower which was widely visible, and corresponded to the widely extended influence. As to the picture in itself the question arises, What sort of a mountain had the prophet in mind? How must a (natural) mountain be constituted so as to be fitly designated a widely destroying mountain? I am of opinion that this designation can be given only to a volcano, for men seek the vicinity of mountains because these afford protection to their habitations and agriculture. Even the vicinity of volcanoes is not shunned, because these become dangerous only from time to time, and the general advantage of their vicinity outweighs the temporary disadvantage. The following description seems also to point to a volcano. How otherwise can we explain the words "roll thee from the rocks," than of a volcanic eruption? The mountain is to be laid bare, the overlying strata are to be thrown down so that nothing will remain but the skeleton,—the masses of stone which form its interior. All this can be said only of volcanoes. And when finally the result of this process is designated by the words לְהָרִיךְ לְהָרִיךְ שְׂרָפָה, is not this a good conclusion to the figure drawn from a volcano? שָׂרָפָה is combustio, exustio. Comp. Isa. ix. 4; lxiv. 10. A mons combustionis or exustionis is either one from which the combustio issues, or one which suffers or has suffered combustion. In the former case it would be difficult to perceive how this could be a punishment. In the latter case the question arises, whether the mount of combustion is to be understood as burning or burnt out. If we regard the previous and following context, we cannot doubt that the words "make thee a mountain of combustion," designate the result of the process, which is further described in ver. 26. The mountain is so burnt out that its stones are not even available for building materials. To GRAF's remark that "this latter point in itself doubtful was hardly so established in the experience of a Jew, that he could make use of it as a figure which would commend itself to his countrymen," I reply, that it did not need much experience to know that stones cracked or vitrified by fire, are bad building material, and that, moreover, here at the close the discourse evidently passes from figure to reality. The prophet has certainly the burnt-up city in view, the stones of which could not be used for building purposes. [COWLES: "In fact, large building stones were never there. Her immense structures were built of brick, either sundried or kiln-burnt. Hence the great mass of these materials lie to this day more or less decomposed in the mountains of rubbish which mark the site of that once magnificent city."—S. R. A.] —But thou shalt, etc. Comp. ver. 62; xxv. 9.

16. War against the Threshing-floor of Babylon.

LI. 27–33.

Blow the trumpet among the nations,
Consecrate nations against her,
Call upon her the kingdoms of Ararat, Minni and Ashkenaz;
Appoint a captain against her,
Bring up horses like bristly locusts.
- 28 Consecrate nations against her,
The kings of Media with her satraps and all her governors,
And the whole land of their dominion.
- 29 Then the earth quakes¹ and trembles,
For the thoughts of Jehovah are being fulfilled² on Babylon,
To make the land of Babylon a waste without an inhabitant.

They sit in their strongholds;
Dried up³ is their strength,
They are become women;
They have burned her dwellings,
Her bars are broken.

"The daughter of Babylon is like a threshing floor,
Now they tread her,⁴
Yet a little and the time of harvest will come to her."

³ Ver. 30.—The form נִשְׁרָה is probably to be derived from נָשַׁר exaruit. This root occurs only in two passages elsewhere: Isa. xlv. 5, נִשְׁרָהוּ, and xli. 17, נִשְׁרָהוּ. The latter form may have stood for נִשְׁרָהוּ with Dag. f. euphon. Comp. יִשְׁרָהוּ.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

A very animated picture! Three main groups may be plainly distinguished, and a conclusion. The first group (vers. 27-29) shows us the enemies of Babylon, the Medes with the nations subject to their dominion advancing against Babylon with so great an army that the earth trembles. The second group is composed of the Babylonian warriors, who, overwhelmed by the success of the enemy, let their hands fall in powerless and spiritless dismay (ver. 30). In the third group we perceive the king of Babylon, who, sitting in his castle, receives from all sides the news of the capture of the city (vers. 31, 32). In the closing words the prophet expresses the thought that all which is now being done to render the city splendid and glorious is no more than the preparation of the threshing-floor, on which in a short time the harvest will be piled. These verses are clearly distinguished from those which precede and follow, and exhibit a clear and connected picture.

Vers. 27-29. Raise ye . . . inhabitant. Ver. 27 evidently contains a new beginning, for it summons to that which has to be done in the beginning of a warlike expedition. Comp. ver. 12; 1. 2.—Consecrate, etc. It was the custom to commence every war with sacred rites (comp. HERZ., R.-Enc., and WINER, R.-B.-W., s. v. "Krieg"); but here, as in Isa. xiii. 8, the war appears to be designated as a holy one, because it has to do with a "work of Jehovah" (1. 25) and "the vengeance of His sanctuary" (1. 28). Comp. vi. 4; xxii. 7; Joel iv. 9; Mic. iii. 5.—Call. Comp. 1. 2, 29.—Ararat. Comp. Gen. viii. 4. [COWLES: "The name Ararat is Sanskrit, meaning 'the holy land,' a name probably due to traditions of Noah's ark."—S. R. A.].—In Isaiah (xxxvii. 38 coll. 2 Ki. xix. 37) a land of Ararat is spoken of. THEODORET says on the present passage, Ἀραρὰτ τὴν Ἀρμενίαν καλεῖ. According to Moses of Chorene (Hist. Armen. p. 361) Ararat was the chief district of Armenia and divided into twenty circuits. Comp. DELITZSCH on Isa. xxxvii. 38.—Minni also, which occurs here only, Ps. xlv. 9 being doubtful, belongs to Armenia; it was, according to NIEBUHR (Ass. u. Bab. S. 427 coll. 136), the second chief state of this country.—Ashkenaz must be sought for at any rate in the neighborhood of Armenia, since Togarmah is the brother of Ashkenaz according to Gen. x. 8, and "the country on the Pontus, Ararat and Caucasus is in general the home of the children of Japheth" (NIEBUHR ut sup.). KNOBEL (Völkertafel and on Gen. x. 8) regards Ashkenaz as the Assorum genus and says in reference to this passage: "The Ashkenaz mentioned in Jer. li. 27 appears to be a remnant of the Asi nation in Asia." [Comp. also KEIL and DELITZSCH on Gen. x. 8, Tr. I. p. 163.—S. R. A.]. In general these three peoples here mentioned correspond to the "nations from the north" which are spoken of in 1. 3, 9.—Appoint a captain—מִפְסָר. The word occurs besides only in Nah. iii. 17. The meaning is doubtful. All we learn from the context is that something hostile to Babylon is intended. The words against her follow four times in vers. 27, 28, and cannot be taken in another sense the third time from the other three. It is therefore not a measure within Babylon but against Babylon which is spoken of. Appoint is then used as in xv. 3. I do not think that number, multitude can be the point of comparison between this and the parallel horses (it is certainly not so with כִּנּוּר in Nah. iii. 17), and that therefore the word designates "troops" of any kind (GRAY, MEIER). It is admitted by most commentators that it is an Assyrian word. (Comp. STRAUSS on Nahum, S. 123). In the inscription of Bisutun, the Assyrian text of which has been rendered in Hebrew letters by OPPERT, (Exp. en Mésop. II. p. 238), the word כִּר occurs times innumerable in the sense of "King," as a title of Darius. Comp. also STRAUSS, S. 124 Ann., etc.; BRANDIS, Gewinn, etc., S. 101, 2. כִּר might thus be a compound of כִּר. The circumstance that the different nations have their leaders in their "kings" is no ground against this hypothesis, for the multifarious host would still need a common head. I therefore adhere provisionally to the meaning "captain."—Like bristly locusts. Comp. ver. 14. The comparison is very graphic, both with respect to the number and also the form and movements of the animals. Comp. CRENER on Joel i. 4.—Consecrate nations is repeated as a sign that the prophet will yet make new and important additions to the nations already mentioned.—Kings of Media. The plural is no more to be regarded as an absolutely indifferent matter than as depending on distinct historical knowledge. It simply leaves open the possibility of a plurality. A great war with Babylon would certainly occupy the whole royal family of Media and might occupy several Median kings in succession. For an analogous case comp. xvii. 20; xix. 3.—Jeremiah's mention of the Medes is significant for two reasons: 1. because at that time, in the fourth year of Zedekiah (155 Nabon.—B. C. 593), Nebuchadnezzar was in all probability at war with Media. His father-in-law, Cyaxares, had died the year before, B. C. 594. This was a favorable epoch to cast off the previous supremacy of Media. "We think that we may unhesitatingly assume that Nabukudrussur had to undertake a great war with Media in the years 154 and 155," says NIEBUHR (Ass. u. Bab., S. 212, 8 and on his reasons for this view Ib. S. 211 and S. 284).—2. because in the mention of the Medes there is a strong argument against those who assert that this prophecy was composed post eventum, during the captivity, for at this time the Persians and not the Medes would have been designated as the conquerors of Babylon. Comp. ver. 11.—

Her satraps. Comp. vers. 23 and 57.—To make, etc. Comp. Isa. xiii. 9; Jer. ii. 15; iv. 7; ix. 10; xlv. 19; i. 3; li. 47.

Ver. 30. The heroes of Babylon . . . broken.—Become women. Comp. i. 37; Nah. iii. 18.—They have burned. The subject is the enemies.—Bars are broken. Comp. Am. i. 5; Isa. xlv. 2; Lam. ii. 9.—As only the capture of the city is described, the burning of the dwellings must not be referred to a burning of the whole city, presupposing the capture. It must rather be intended as a parallel to the breaking of the bars. The sentence discloses that the enemies had begun their work by setting the dwellings on fire. [Compare the account of the siege of Babylon in XENOPHON as given by WORDSWORTH.—S. R. A.]

Vers. 31, 32. Courier . . . confounded. The prophet conceives of the king as in the midst of the city, in his citadel. When the city is taken "from the end thereof" (comp. i. 26) the messengers hastening to inform the king would meet each other. This is a sad meeting, an accumulation of calamities which reminds us of the Job's posts (Job i. 13 sq.).—Passages. מַעְבְּרֹת, are passages. Forts may be meant, but also bridges or tunnels, or even the stations of the messenger or ferries, since on account of the walls a landing could not be made at pleasure. Concerning the bridges which connected the two banks of the river in the middle of the city and the tunnel under the Euphrates, which connected the two royal castles, comp. OPPERT, I. S. 192, etc. The Euphrates, moreover, had no fords, and the article forbids us to think of the bed of the Euphrates, laid dry by the diversion of the stream (Herod., I. 191), as it denotes that definite and well-known points of transition are meant. The expression may well be referred to the bridge, the ferry-stations and perhaps also to the tunnel. Both this sentence and the following parts of ver. 33 belong to the announcements spoken of in ver. 31.—The ponds burned with fire. This sentence is enigmatical. The view that the burning is not to be understood literally, but merely to be taken as figurative for drying up, for which an appeal is strangely made to i. Ki. xviii. 38, seems to me as untenable as that, according to which the burning is to be referred merely to the sedge. The former view is opposed by the formal reason that the figure would be an unsuitably exaggerated one, the latter by the material reason that the burning of the sedge seems purposeless. But are the great water-works of Nebuchadnezzar to be conceived of as having no wood-work about them? Did not the flood-gates at least consist of wood? The great basin of Sepharvaim, c. g., might be opened and closed by flood-gates (comp. DUNCKER, Gesch. d. Alterth. I. S. 849). If the Euphrates were dried up and it was wished to complete the act of demolition, the destruction of the sluices by fire might be an appropriate way of accomplishing this. I do not mean to say that I perceive a special prediction in these words. Jeremiah paints the picture of the destruction of Babylon in colors, which in general betray a correct knowledge of Babylonian circumstances. This picture could not be applied to the capture of any city at pleasure, but the coloring is nowhere so specific that we must say it is either a mantic prediction or a vaticinium post eventum. Jeremiah's mind was occupied only with the great theme,—Babylon will fall and be destroyed, and Israel will be delivered. He greatly varies this theme, and here and there a feature finds a surprisingly accurate fulfilment, but there may be here a deeply hidden connection between cause and effect, which we cannot fathom or demonstrate, and the prophet had no foreknowledge of this agreement of his words with the future reality. Comp. i. 24 and the rem. on li. 39. KUSPER in the Beweis des Glaubens, February and March, 1867.—Are confounded. Comp. Isa. xiii. 8. The words as the purport of the message correspond exactly to what was reported as a fact in ver. 30. [Comp. HEROD., I. 181; ARISTOT., Polit. III. c. 1; RAWLINSON, Anc. Mon. III. 863; and PUSEY, on Daniel, p. 268, in WORDSWORTH and his note on the fulfilment of this prophecy.—S. R. A.]

Ver. 33. For thus saith . . . to her. For attaches these words closely to the previous verse. What follows is separated by its specific contents, and thus the statement of reason forms a conclusion. When Jeremiah wrote Babylon stood at the zenith of its bloom. The rejoinder might then be made to him, How canst thou, contrary to all appearances, speak of such an enfeebling of this glorious army and of the capture and destruction of these impregnable bulwarks? Jeremiah replies, Babylon is a threshing-floor. All that is now done to render her great and glorious is no more than a preparation of the floor by treading. In a short time, however, the season of harvest will come to her. Jeremiah here leans back upon i. 26. The glorious city shall one day serve only as a threshing-floor for all the treasures harvested by her enemies.

LI. 34-40.

- 34 Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon, devoured us, he crushed us,
 He put us away as an empty vessel,
 He swallowed us like a dragon,
 He filled his belly¹ with my best and cast us out.²
- 35 "My wrong and my flesh be on Babylon," say the inhabitress of Zion,
 "My blood on the inhabitants of Chaldea," say Jerusalem.
- 36 Therefore thus saith Jehovah:
 Behold, I fight thy battle, and execute thy vengeance,
 And cause her sea to dry up and seal up her spring.
- 37 And Babylon shall become ruins, the abode of jackals,
 A terror and an object of scorn, which is bare of inhabitants.
- 38 They will roar one with another like young lions,
 They will growl⁴ like the young of the lioness.
- 39 For their intoxication I prepare them a drinking-bout,
 And make them drunken that they may rejoice,
 Fall asleep to a perpetual sleep
 And never awake, saith Jehovah.
- 40 I will bring them down like lambs to the slaughter,
 Like rams with he-goats.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ Ver. 34.—כִּבְדֵּי, belly, is *Ass. Aey.*² Ver. 34.—כִּבְדֵּי. The singular suffix has induced the Masoretes to make the previous verbs conformable to this, but this change of number is by no means rare. Comp. ix. 7; x. 4; xiii. 20; xlv. 9; NAEGLER, Gr., § 105, 7 Ann. 2. Some commentators would attach the word to the following, and read כִּבְדֵּי הָאֵרֶץ because the Hiph of כִּבְדֵּי signifies to wash, rinse away (Isa. iv. 4; Ezek. xl. 38; 2 Chron. iv. 6), and does not occur elsewhere in Jeremiah, while כִּבְדֵּי is very common with him (viii. 3; xvi. 15; xxiii. 3, 8; xxvii. 10, 15, etc.). The meaning of rinsing, however, lies at the foundation of that casting away ("the Hiph. of כִּבְדֵּי is to cast away, wash away," DELITZSCH on Isa. iv. 4, § 89), and the brevity of the second half of the verse is not without analogy. Comp. i. 26; ii. 28.³ Ver. 35.—שָׁכַח. Comp. Isa. xii. 6. The expression occurs only in these two places.⁴ Ver. 38.—נָאָה, snarl, growl, is an Ass. Aey.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Nebuchadnezzar has devoured Israel, emptied his land and caused it to stand like an empty vessel, having cast out the people (ver. 34). For this Israel invokes the vengeance of Jehovah (ver. 35). To this desire the Lord declares Himself willing to respond; as Babylon has emptied Israel, so shall it become an empty unwatered desert; as Nebuchadnezzar has devoured Israel like a dragon, so shall the Chaldeans roar like lions; as they have revelled in Israel's flesh and blood, so shall they empty the cup of wrath even to fatal drunkenness, and be brought as sheep to the slaughter (vers. 36-40). Three main thoughts are thus plainly distinguishable, the expositio facti, the complaint and the sentence.

Ver. 34. Nebuchadnezzar . . . cast us out. Nebuchadnezzar has devoured (l. 7, 17) and crushed (literally disturbavit, Ex. xiv. 25; xxiii. 27; Josh. x. 10; 2 Chr. xv. 6) Israel; and then let the land stand like an empty vessel. HIRTZ regards the words he put us away, as spoken by the land, but this view is opposed by the plural pronoun. It is better to regard the people and land as speaking together. Then the first clause refers to the persons, the second to the land, the third to the particular things, which the enemy took with him as plunder out of the country.—Dragon, נָחַשׁ, is 1, bellua maritima, κῆτος, (Gen. i. 21; Job vii. 12; Ps. clviii. 7). 2. Serpent (Ex. vii. 9, 10, 12; Deut. xxxii. 88; Ps. xci. 18). 3. Crocodile (Isa. xxvii. 1; li. 9; Ezek. xxix. 8; xxxii. 2; Ps. lxxiv. 13). In this place it is usually translated dragon, this being viewed as a modification of the second meaning. It is really a matter of indifference what great animal is intended, and it therefore suffices to render the word by a general term.

Ver. 35. My wrong . . . Jerusalem. After the representation of the condition of things, Israel here appears as a plaintiff, and demands as his right the punishment of the oppressor.—

My wrong. Comp. Gen. xvi. 5.—My flesh and my blood point back to devoured, ver. 34.—Inhabitants of Chaldaea. Comp. ver. 24; l. 10. ["By my flesh we are here to understand the blood-relations of the inhabitants of Jerusalem, or the Jews throughout the country, who were killed or carried captive to Babylon." HENDERSON.—S. R. A.]

Vers. 36-40. Therefore thus . . . with he-goats. The Lord receives the complaint of Israel. He declares himself ready to execute the punishment desired. The close connection of the words with ver. 35 is clear from therefore, and from its whole purport.—I fight, etc. Comp. l. 84; li. 6, 11, 56; l. 15, 28.—Cause to dry up, etc. The abundance of water, to which the land of Babylon owes its fertility and power, the Lord will dry up and even seal up the springs. Comp. l. 88.—Her sea. Comp. rems. on ver. 13. "The main land, on which Babylon stands, is . . . a large . . . plain, which is so broken up with marshes and lakes by the Euphrates, that it floats, as it were, in the sea. The low land on the lower Euphrates is, as it were, wrung from the sea; for before Semiramis erected the dikes, the Euphrates used to overflow it all (πελαγίζειν, Herod., I., 184); Abydenus (in Εὐσεβ. Πρæp., IX., 41), even says that at first it was all water, and was also called θάλασσα." DELITZSCH on Isa. xxi. 1.—Become ruins. Comp. ix. 10; xviii. 16; xix. 8; xxv. 9, 18; xxix. 18; li. 29. According to the theory of recompense which the Lord has presented in ver. 36 (comp. ver. 6) the desolation and evacuation here predicted corresponds to the emptying, which Israel, according to ver. 34, had experienced from Babylon.—In ver. 38 it is not an element of the punishment, but on the contrary the revelling of the Babylonians in the enjoyment of their plunder, which is described (comp. ii. 15; Am. iii. 4).—Ver. 39. While now they are in the heart of their greedy enjoyment (comp. Hos. vii. 4-7) the Lord will prepare them a banquet of his own kind. He will pour them out a full cup, but of wrath (xxv. 15-27). Of this excitement and sleep will be the consequence—the excitement of anguish and the sleep of death (ver. 57).—That they may rejoice, is therefore intended ironically. Comp. Isa. xxi. 5, and DELITZSCH, ad loc.—The remarkable fulfilment of these words in the surprise of the Chaldeans while feasting (Dan. v. 1 sqq.; HEROD., I., 191; CYPRIOT., VII., 23) is no more to be traced to special prediction, than the fulfilment of vers. 31, 32; l. 24. The prophet has no expectation that his picture of wild carousal, and the exchange of this for another ironically so-called, would correspond so literally to the facts. That this was the case was not, however, due to a coincidence, but to divine Providence. Comp. rems. on vers. 31, 32.—I will bring them, etc. Comp. xviii. 15; l. 27. Lambs, rams, he-goats! All classes of the population are to fall a sacrifice to the butcher's knife. Comp. Isa. xxxiv. 6; Ezek. xxxix. 18; Jer. l. 8.—This description also, from ver. 38 onwards, stands in evident contrast to the devouring of Israel by the Chaldeans, in ver. 34.

18. The Demolition of the Prison, the Liberation of the Captives.

LI. 41-46.

- 41 How is Sheshach taken,
And the praise of the whole earth captured!
How is Babylon become a horrid waste¹ among the nations!
- 42 The sea is come up over Babylon,
With the multitude of its waves is she covered.
- 43 Her cities are become a desolation,
A land of aridity and steppe,
A land wherein no man will dwell,
Which no son of man will pass through.
- 44 And I visit Bel in Babylon,
And take from his mouth what he hath devoured,
And no more shall the nations flow to him:
The wall also of Babylon is fallen.
- 45 Go out from the midst of her, my people,
And let every one save his soul from the fury of Jehovah's anger.
- 46 And let not your heart faint,²
Nor fear on account of the rumor which is heard in the land,
For in that year the rumor comes³ and the year after⁴ another,
And feud in the land, ruler against ruler.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ Ver. 41.—שֹׁשְׁחָח is stupor in v. 30; viii. 21. As in the verbal root, so also in the noun, the idea of being rigid and confused is connected with that of horrible desolation. Comp. ii. 15; iv. 7; i. 3, 23, etc.

⁴ Ver. 46.—וְיִרְדּוּ is to be regarded as neuter. Comp. NABOLSB. Gr., § 60, 4.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

A double picture! As in vers. 1. 1-5, on the background of Babylon destroyed the prophet sees Jerusalem delivered. He thus first shows us Babylon taken and desolated (vers. 41-43), the gods robbed of all ability to retain plunder or attract worshippers, and even the strong, proud walls thrown down (ver. 44). He then summons Israel to flee from the abomination of desolation (ver. 45), and not to be afraid at the alarm of war (ver. 46).

Vers. 41-44. How is Sheshach . . . is fallen. Comp. i. 2.—Sheshach. Comp. rems. on xxv. 26. If it is to be derived from שָׁח to stoop down, and taken in the sense of "humiliation, submission," the idea does not accord with the following "praise of the whole earth." It must wait further illumination.—Praise, etc. Comp. xlviii. 2; xlix. 25. Herodotus says of Babylon, ἐκεκδήθητο ὥς οὐδὲν ἄλλο πᾶσιμα τῶν ἡμεῖς ἴμεν (I., 178).—The sea, etc. We might think here of the sea of nations (comp. Isa. viii. 7, 8; xvii. 12; Jer. xli. 7, 8), especially since in ver. 36 and ver. 43, the contrary is expressed. It is, however, possible that the prophet would really say both, viz., that Babylon will be exposed to horrible aridity and fearful inundations. The Euphrates, when left to itself, has at some times too much, and at others too little water. Nebuchadnezzar's great water-works were to regulate the supply, and when these are destroyed (comp. ver. 32) Babylon incurs the double danger.—Her cities, etc. Comp. ix. 10.—Land of aridity, etc. Comp. ii. 6; i. 12.—No man, etc. Comp. ix. 9-11; xlix. 18, 33; i. 40.—Bel (comp.

rems. on i. 2) is here mentioned as Babylon's highest deity, and accordingly as the shield of its power and glory. Whoever conquers and plunders Babylon, conquers and plunders Bel, and whatever Babylon retains of plundered property in its hand, that has Bel. He has, as it were, swallowed all (comp. ver. 84; i. 17). Israel then with all the plunder of Jerusalem (comp. Dan. i. 2) may be represented as "devoured by Bel," and this he is to restore. He is also no longer to have the renown of being a powerful protector. Foreigners shall no longer stream thither to commend themselves to his protection and be amazed at his glory. On the expression, comp. Isa. ii. 2.—The mention of the wall of Babylon (comp. ver. 58; i. 15) again as by way of supplement, may seem surprising. The walls of Babylon, however, seem here to be regarded as a sanctuary of Bel. This is intimated in their names; Imgur-Bel, i. e., Bel protect, was the name of the outer wall comprising 480 stadia, Nivitti-Bel, i. e., residence of Bel, was the name of the inner wall, 360 stadia long. Comp. OPPERT, I., S. 227. [The name of the king also was Belshazzar.—S. R. A.]

Vers. 45, 46. Go out . . . ruler. That which, according to vers. 41-44 is to come upon Babylon, is the effect of Jehovah's wrath. In order that this may not fall upon the Israelites also, they are to flee. Comp. ver. 6; i. 8.—From the fury, etc. Comp. iv. 8, 26; xii. 13; xxv. 37, 38; xxx. 24.—Feud, etc. Comp. xxx. 21; xxxiii. 26.—The prophet evidently presupposes a great war. Comp. rems. on ver. 28. This passage reminds us of Matt. xxiv. 6; Luke xxi. 28. [Comp. RAWLINSON, Anc. Mon., III., p. 515, as quoted in WORDSWORTH.—S. R. A.]

19. Babylon's fall an Occasion of Joy to Heaven and Earth, but especially to Israel.

LI. 47-52.

- 47 Therefore behold, the days come that I visit the idols of Babylon,
And her whole land shall be put to shame,
And her wounded ones shall all fall in the midst of her.
- 48 But heaven and earth, and all therein, shall rejoice over Babylon,
For from the north come the destroyers, saith Jehovah.
- 49 As Babylon caused the slain of Israel to fall,
So at Babylon are fallen the slain of the whole land.
- 50 Ye that have escaped the sword,
Go on, stand not still:
Remember Jehovah from afar,
And let Jerusalem come into your hearts.

- 51 "We are ashamed, for we have heard reproach, Shame covers our face, for strangers are come into the sanctuaries of Jehovah's house."
52 Wherefore behold, the days come, saith Jehovah, that I punish her idols;
And in her whole land groan^s the slain.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ Ver. 48.—The singular יָחִיד stands here as an anticipated predicate. Comp. NAEGLSB. Gr., § 105, 4, 6, 8.

² Ver. 49.—Before לִפְנֵי should be supplied יְרֵי. The sense of the connection is then Babylon tended to, occasioned, the fall. Comp. NAEGLSB. Gr., § 95, 3 b.

⁴ Ver. 50.—וְלִפְנֵי. This imperative occurs here only. The choice of the expression is, however, explained by the circumstance, that יָלַד here does not signify to go away, but as is clear from the antithesis וְלִפְנֵי (comp. Gen. xix. 17; Jer. iv 6) to go on, and is thus used with a certain emphasis. Hence it is also unnecessary with the LXX to connect the וְלִפְנֵי with the previous word, and read וְלִפְנֵי or וְלִפְנֵי.—Comp., moreover, ver. 45; I. 8, 28.

⁵ Ver. 52.—וְלִפְנֵי in Jeremiah here only. Comp. Ezek. xxvi. 15.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

We may observe in this passage that it gradually exhausts itself, and hastens to the conclusion. We may also perceive the effort to revert to the commencement. Hence the great similarity of these verses to l. 3-5. Babylon's idols are to be visited, the land confounded, and filled with the slain (ver. 47), to the joy of heaven and earth. The destroyers coming from the north are to accomplish this (ver. 48). Thus will be recompensed to Babylon what it has done to Israel (ver. 49). The Israelites, however, are encouraged to go home comforted (ver. 50). They seem not to understand the call, for they answer with complaining words, from which it is seen that no other feeling could find place in their hearts, than that of the disgrace they had suffered (ver. 51). But the prophet comforts them by skillfully repeating the opening words of the picture, indicating that even for their disgrace the promised visitation of the idols and of their country would procure satisfaction (ver. 52). If our division is correct, and ver. 52 is really the close of the strophe beginning at ver. 47, and if, as cannot be doubted (see the proof in detail below), these verses reproduce in a certain measure the beginning of the whole prophecy, l. 2-5, an artificial arrangement is here noticeable, of which a trace also recurs in the last picture, for ver. 58 also in its purport refers back to ver. 53.

Vers. 47, 48. Therefore behold . . . saith Jehovah.—Therefore draws a further special conclusion from the premises stated in the previous context. The main purport of this picture follows from all which has been previously stated as the decree of Jehovah concerning Babylon.—Behold, the day. Comp. ix. 24. This formula is found fourteen times in Jeremiah, vii. 32; xvi. 14; xix. 6, etc.—The idols, etc. Generalization of what is said in ver. 44 of Bel alone. In l. 2 also the confusion of Bel, Merodach and the idols generally is spoken of. Comp. ver. 52.

—Put to shame. Comp. xlviii. 18.—Her wounded. Comp. ver. 4.—If we render "slain," we get no suitable meaning from the sentence, even if the emphasis be laid on "in the midst of her," we must, therefore, take the word in the sense of wounded, as in Ps. lxi. 26; Job xxiv. 12. All the wounded will fall, i. e., all their wounds will be mortal.—Ver. 48. Shall rejoice, etc. These words express the main thought of the first part (vers. 47, 48) and at the same time the only new element. Heaven and earth certainly must rejoice when once again the justice, wisdom and power of the Lord celebrate a triumph, and it is anew evident that He, and not the devil, is Lord in the world. Comp. Isa. xlv. 23; xlix. 13; Ps. xcvi. 10, 11.—The sentence gains much in clearness if we regard it as a parenthesis, and refer the following causal sentence to ver. 47. According to the logical sequence the destroyers are the first cause, and the destruction of Babylon the second cause of the rejoicing. If we do not take the imperative sentence as a parenthesis, we must at least refer the causal sentence to all the foregoing context, so that the destroyers appear as the ground both of the fall and the rejoicing. The words from the north, also remind us of l. 3 coll. l. 9, 41, standing here in the same connection as there.—Destroyers. Comp. ver. 58.

Vers. 49-52. As Babylon . . . the slain. In this second part of the picture the prophet expresses substantially the same thought as in the first, but with special application to Israel and emphasis on the idea of recompense. The sin of Babylon against Israel shall be recompensed, and Israel, at first unable to receive the joyful tidings, is greatly comforted by the repeated solemn proclamation of judgment on the destroyers.—Remember, etc. These words remind us vividly of l. 4, 5.—From afar. Jehovah is still always considered as dwelling in Zion. Comp. xli. 5.—Come, etc. Comp. iii. 16; xlv. 21.—The Israelites answer to the call, but with words of grief. They cannot receive the joyful tidings. Their minds are still full of the feeling of the disgrace they have suffered. It is as though they would say, What is the thought of Jehovah and Jerusalem for us? Have we not from thence recollections only of the deepest shame and reproach? We are put to shame and we are ashamed (comp. ix. 18), for we have heard reproach, scorn and ridicule as the part of the heathen (vi. 10; xxiv. 9), the consequence of which is that shame covered our face (Ps. lxi. 8; xxxv. 26; lxi. 13). This scorn which has come upon us refers however to the fact that strangers (comp. v. 19; xxx. 8; Isa. i. 7) have come into the sanctuaries (i. e., into all parts, even those forbidden to profane feet) of Jehovah's house. It must appear surprising that the Israelites respond to the joyful call of the prophet, ver. 50, with words of grief. The strophe cannot therefore possibly be concluded here, or it would end in a harsh dissonance. We therefore attach ver. 52 to it. Even on this account, says Jeremiah, skilfully repeating the opening words of the picture, shall the idols be visited and their land filled with the slain. The prophet speaks very appropriately of the visitation of the idols, for just this is the recompense for the disgrace inflicted on the house of Jehovah.

20. No wall is a defence against the Lord.

LI. 53-58.

- 53 "Even though Babylon should mount up to heaven,
And tower up¹ his defences² to a precipitous height,
From me will destroyers come to her," saith Jehovah.
54 A loud crying from Babylon
And great ruin from the land of the Chaldeans!
55 For Jehovah destroyeth Babylon,
And extirpates from her the loud noise.
And her waves roar like mighty waters,
The noise of their calling resounds.
56 For there is coming upon her, upon Babylon, a destroyer,
And her heroes are taken, their bows broken;³
For a God of recompense is Jehovah,
Who well requiteth.
57 "And I make drunk her princes and her wise men,
Her counts, her dukes and her heroes,
That they may sleep a perpetual sleep,
And never awake," saith the King:
Jehovah Zebaoth is his name.
58 Thus saith Jehovah Zebaoth,
"Babylon's broad walls⁴ is laid bare,⁵
And her high gates burn⁶ in the fire!
Thus then have peoples labored in vain,
And nations wearied themselves⁷ for the fire."

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ Ver. 53.—The Piel בָּצַר denotes to cut off, to separate sharply. This is used in the sense of fortifying, like Kal in בָּצִירָה Isa. ii. 15; xxxvii. 26 בָּצִירָה, because fortifications are sharply separated from their surroundings. Comp. Isa. xxii. 10.

² Ver. 53.—עָזָר is here as in עָזָר Jud. ix. 51; Ps. lxi. 4; Prov. xviii. 10; עָזָר Ps. lxii. 4; עָזָר or עָזָר Is. xxvi. 1; Prov. x. 12; xviii. 11, a strong bulwark for defence or protection.

⁴ Ver. 58.—הַכֹּזֶת is construed as sing. here only. Evidently the totality of the walls, which, in a certain aspect, was a six-fold line of circumvallation (comp. Oppert, p. 228, etc.), is regarded as a unit. Comp. Ewald, § 318, a.

⁵ Ver. 58.—וַיִּפְּלוּ Inf. abs. Pilpel. (comp. וַיִּפְּלוּ, § 253, Anm.) with Hithpal. from פָּלַל, to strip one's self, i. e., thrown down, discovered to their foundations. Comp. וַיִּפְּלוּ Hab. iii. 13; Psalm cxxxvii. 7; and Isaiah xxiii. 13; Ezek. xlii. 14.

⁶ Ver. 58.—וַיִּבְרָקוּ Comp. xli. 2; Isa. xxxiii. 12; וַיִּבְרָקוּ, § 242, b.

⁷ Ver. 58.—Regarding these words as original to Habakkuk, we may also regard וַיִּפְּלוּ as a scriptural error, it being easy to write this instead of וַיִּפְּלוּ. Comp. וַיִּפְּלוּ Jer. ii. Bab., § 97.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

The main thought of the picture is that no dead or living wall can save Babylon, for the Lord, the righteous recompenser, has determined upon its fall. The dead wall of Babylon will not avail, because the Lord will send destroyers, as first expressed in ver. 53. In the following verses the fulfilment of this declaration is exhibited: great noise is heard from Babylon (ver. 54). Whence comes this? Hence, that the Lord has begun the work of destruction on Babylon—destroying both the great masses (ver. 55) and the élite of the population. His justice requires this (ver. 56). Substantially the same thought closes the discourse as began it, and both the beginning and conclusion appear as the verba ipsissima of Jehovah, so that in form also the end reverts to the beginning. The princes and wise men of Babylon may be designated as its living wall. They shall be made drunk with the cup of Jehovah's wrath, and sleep an everlasting sleep (ver. 57). The dead wall, with its lofty gates, shall be subjected to fire, so that it will be made manifest that the immense work, the fruit of the labor of many nations, was achieved in vain, to be consumed by fire (ver. 58).

Ver. 53. Even though . . . saith Jehovah. In the opening words there appears to be a double allusion: 1. to the tower of Babel, Gen. xi. 4; 2. to the high walls with which Babylon was surrounded. Their height must have been very great. Even if the statements of 200 yards (HERODOTUS) and 250 yards (OROSIUS) are to be considered exaggerated, the lowest estimates of the ancients (PHILOSTR., Apoll. Tyan., I., 25) speak of three and a half plethra, i. e., 150 feet (OPPERT, Exp., I., p. 224, 5).—Comp. Ob. 4; Hab. ii. 9; Jer. xlix. 16.—Destroyers. Comp. ver. 48. [WORDSWORTH: "We may compare also the words of Nebuchadnezzar still extant on this cylinder: 'In Babylon is the tower of my abode. . . . To make more difficult the attack of an enemy against Imgur-Bel, the indestructible Wall of Babylon, I constructed a bulwark like a mountain,'" etc.—S. R. A.]

Vers. 54–56. A loud crying . . . requiteth. That ver. 54 describes the execution of what is threatened in ver. 53, the work therefore of the destroyers (comp. I. 22, 46; xlviii. 3) is seen from vers. 55, 56. It is at the same time clear from the connection that the loud noise spoken of in ver. 54 is the united consequence of a double operation directed to the two main portions of the Babylonian population. At one time the work of the destroyers is against the great mass of the people. This is the sense of loud noise and her waves. The sentence And her waves, etc. expresses the result. The destruction of Babylon and the extirpation of the great tumult of nations cannot take place without bringing the masses of the people into wild and noisy excitement, for, as was remarked on ver. 42, masses of people may certainly, as here, be compared with masses of water.—Roar. Comp. v. 22; xxxi. 35; Jer. li. 15—Jer. vi. 23.—Afterwards, however, the work of the destroyers is against the élite of the people, the heroes, i. e., the brave men and warriors (ver. 80; I. 36) and their weapons.—For a God of recompense, etc. The causal particle refers of course not only to the immediate, but all the previous context. The object of recompense is here stated as the ground of Jehovah's procedure against Babylon, as in I. 15, 28; li. 6, 11, 36. Comp. 2 Sam. xix. 37; Isa. lix. 18.

Vers. 57, 58. And I make . . . for the fire. These verses also contain, like ver. 53, the verba ipsissima of Jehovah, and ver. 58 also treats of the dead wall. When, in ver. 57, it is said of the princes, wise men and warriors (comp. I. 35, 36; li. 23, 28), that the Lord will make them drunk and cause them to sleep a perpetual sleep (comp. rem. on ver. 39, whence these words are taken, and xxv. 15, 16, 27), it is evidently to be thus intimated that the Lord will paralyze all the forces which might be able in any way to delay the fall. It may then be said that the prophet treats in ver. 57 of the destruction of the living, in ver. 58 of the dead stone defences. I may be allowed here to insert a passage relating to the building of the walls from the cylinder-inscription already mentioned, as given by OPPER (Exp., I., p. 230). "Babylon is the refuge of the God Merodach; I have finished (observe that Nebuchadnezzar is the speaker) Imgur-Bel, his great enclosure. In the thresholds of the great gates I have adjusted folding-doors in brass, very strong railings and gratings (?), I have dug its ditches, I have reached the bottom of the waters, I have constructed the banks of the trench with bitumen and bricks. Wishing to preserve the pyramid more efficaciously and to defend it from the enemy and the attacks which might be made on Babylon the imperishable, I caused to be constructed in masonry in the extremities of Babylon a (second) great enclosure, the boulevard of the Rising Sun, which no king had made before me. I had the ditches made dry, and caused the banks to be constructed on barrels." Here follow the words quoted above in ver. 13.—The walls of Babylon, however, were not the work of Nebuchadnezzar alone. According to an inscription, now at Aberdeen, some share in the glory of this work is due to Assarhaddon, the son of Sanherib. He says (OPPERT, p. 227, etc.), "Babylon is the city of laws, Imgur-Bel is its enclosure, Nivitti-Bel its rampart; from the foundation to the battlements I founded, continued, enlarged them." OPPER is of opinion that these words express too much, and that Nabopolassar, and especially Nebuchadnezzar, are to be regarded as at least the completers of the work. As to the destruction of the wall, OPPER says (p. 225, etc.), "It is to be presumed that the outer wall, encroached upon by Cyrus, spoiled by Darius, filled with breaches by Xerxes, did not exist at the commencement of the fourth century of the vulgar era. The ditches had been filled—and at least in the greater part the wall had disappeared which was so imposing to the enemies of Babylon, and which inspired Jeremiah with the words recorded in li. 63, 58."—Thus then have peoples, etc. These words are found with slight alteration (transposition of in vain and for the fire) in Hab. ii. 13. Habakkuk was the contemporary of Jeremiah, and also prophesied the punitive judgment to be executed on Judah by the Chaldeans. As in i. 6 Habakkuk expressly mentions the Chaldeans, he cannot have prophesied before the battle of Carchemish, for it is inconceivable that the appointment of this nation was disclosed to him earlier than to Jeremiah. It is possible that he wrote in the reign of Zedekiah, for we see from chap. i. that the dominion of the Chaldeans had then lasted for some time. If now the words "Behold, is it not of the Lord of hosts?" which in Hab. ii. 13 immediately precede the words common to this passage, are to be regarded as a formula of quotation, it is not impossible that this is the passage which he quotes, although, of course, it cannot be denied that both may have drawn from a common source. It is, however, grammatically more correct to take אִם in the sense of command or determination (as in Josh. xi. 20; Ezek. xxxiii. 30), and to translate (with EWALD, MEIER) "it is decreed of the Lord that the nations," etc., and then it is more probable that the words are original to Habakkuk. They suit the context admirably. For Habakkuk wishes to show that a building erected with blood and injustice cannot endure, from which in passing we may derive the important information that Nebuchadnezzar did not execute his immense works without despotic violence.—Labored and wearied themselves are synonymous expressions, comp. Isa. xl. 38 sqq.; so that if we render and wearied themselves (as required by the text here, but not in Hab. ii. 13), we must understand this in an enhanced signification, as exhausted themselves, or are sinking, which it is doubtful if the word will bear. Nor is it in accordance with the sense and connection of the original passage to attribute to the nations, who were compelled to build the wall, a sinking when the wall falls! It is for them rather a victory than a defeat. This long discourse, as EWALD remarks, "very suitably closes with this sentence of Habakkuk, which is here quite appropriate." —פִּרְיָם (to a sufficiency in vain), involves a certain irony. The great wall will be good enough to satisfy the lust of the all-devouring annihilation, or of the fire. It is therefore stronger than פִּרְיָם, Isa. xlix. 4; lxx. 23. Comp. Nah. ii. 13.

21. Historical conclusion.

LI. 59-64.

- 59 The word which Jeremiah the prophet commanded Seraiah the son of Neriah, the son of Maaseiah, when he went with Zedekiah the king of Judah into Babylon in the fourth year of his reign. And this Seraiah was a quiet prince [caravan-marshall]. So Jeremiah wrote in a book all the evil that should come¹ upon Babylon, even all these words that are written against Babylon. And Jeremiah said to Seraiah, When thou comest to Babylon, and shalt see, and shalt [see that thou]² read all these words; then shalt thou say, O LORD [and say, O Jehovah], thou hast spoken against this place, to cut it off, that none shall remain in it, neither man nor beast, but that it shall be desolate for ever. And it shall be, when thou hast made an end of reading this book, that thou shalt bind a stone to it, and cast it into the midst of Euphrates: And thou shalt say, Thus shall Babylon sink,³ and shall not rise from [because of] the evil that I will bring upon her: and they shall be weary [exhausted].⁴ Thus far are the words of Jeremiah.

² Ver. 61.—אִם. This word cannot mean "and when thou seest it (for the first time)." The suffix would certainly not be wanting in that case. Nor can we see why the reading should take place at the first sight of the city. Both time and place might then be very unfavorable. It is rather the apodosis; then see to it. It is indicated upon him that he discharge his commission with circumspection. Comp. 1 Ki. xii. 16; Ps. xxxvii. 37; Isa. xxii. 11.

³ Ver. 64.—שָׁקַע, demergit, desidero, in Jeremiah here only. Comp. Am. viii. 8; ix. 5.

⁴ Ver. 64.—If the word שָׁקַע is not genuine, it can have come here only through the transposition of the following words, "Thus far," etc., with which the copyist, through carelessness or of purpose, connected this. This, however, involves the inauthenticity of vers. 59-64 or their original position before l. 1. HIRZIG says the passage "bears some marks of genuineness, none of the contrary," and it is incredible that it stood before l. 1, since it would then appear that this great prophecy was only of secondary importance. If, then, vers. 59-64 are genuine and in their original position, the same must be said of the concluding words, since they could never have had their position before ver. 59. A copyist could not have added שָׁקַע by mistake. Jeremiah, then, must have done it. His object probably was to give a token of identity to the sinking prophecy by an unmistakable quotation from it. The ancient translations, with the exception of the LXX, which is of no authority, all express the word. Comp. NAKGELS. Jer. v. Bab., § 96.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

When King Zedekiah, in the fourth year of his reign, made a journey to Babylon, Jeremiah gave to Seraiah, the brother of Baruch, the marshal, the prophecy against Babylon to take with him and read in Babylon, and then with prayer to the Lord to cast it into the Euphrates.

Ver. 59. The word . . . caravan-marshal. The commission which Seraiah receives really forms the chief part of this section. For after ver. 60, in which the restoration of the roll forming the basis of this commission is described, all the rest contains only the words in which Jeremiah imparts the commission.—Seraiah, according to xxxii. 18, must be a brother of Baruch, the friend and assistant of our prophet, which explains why the commission was given to him. Other persons named Seraiah are mentioned in this book, xxxvi. 26; xl. 8; lli. 24. It seems to have been a common name among the priests. Comp. 1 Chron. vii. 6, 14; Ezr. vii. 1, 4; Neh. x. 2; xi. 11; xii. 1, 12.—It is not perfectly clear why Zedekiah went to Babylon. His fourth year is the same in which the envoys of the neighboring nations met in Jerusalem, to treat concerning a defensive alliance against the Chaldean power. Comp. rems. on xxvii. 1 and xxviii. 1. НИЗВУХ thinks that the diversion then made by Nebuchadnezzar's war with Media was the occasion of this meeting (Ass. u. Bab., S. 211). The journey to Babylon shows that nothing came of the project, whether that the reports from the East caused the matter to appear too dangerous, or that the warnings of Jeremiah made some impression.—A quiet prince (שֶׁרָ-כְנוּחָה). This expression has been interpreted in the most various and strangest ways, concerning which comp. ROSENTHAL and J. D. MICHAELIS ad loc. The latter was the first to give the substantially correct rendering in his Translation of the Old Testament, 1778, Leader of the caravan. MAUBER first proposed "Reisemarschall," marshal of the journey. Literally it denotes "Prince of the resting-place." Comp. Numb. x. 38.

Vers. 60-64. So Jeremiah wrote . . . exhausted. We may assume that this journey of Zedekiah was the occasion of the prophecy against Babylon. For homage, if not the only object, was certainly one of the objects, of the journey, and it therefore involved a deep disgrace to the theocracy. How fitting it was that the prophet should make use of this journey to furnish the medal with an appropriate reverse. While the king of Judah, in view of all, was casting himself in homage before the throne of the Chaldean king, Seraiah was to cast a roll in the Euphrates, on which was recorded as a divine decree the destruction of Babylon and deliverance of Israel.—That Jeremiah copied the prophecy from the book-roll mentioned in xxxvi. 82 (GRAF) is only supposable, in case Jeremiah successively increased that collection of writings begun in the fifth year of Jehoiakim, first inserting the present prophecy in it, and thus giving Seraiah a copy, a confirmation of which hypothesis may be found in the expression in a [סֵפֶר, one] book. It is, however, possible that Jeremiah would thus intimate that he purposely wrote the prophecy upon one roll, in antithesis to the many rolls forming the main collection. The reason of the prophet's care to write the whole on one roll, would then doubtless be that one could be handled more easily and safely than two.—The reading was evidently for a threefold purpose: 1. With respect to the city of Babylon it was an announcement of judgment (HITZIG), which appears the more significant, as the announcers were not in a condition to make a declaration against Babylon, coming, as they did in all humility, to do homage. 2. With respect to God, it was to be affirmed that the people of Israel had taken solemn notice of the divine promise. Hence after the reading the Lord is to be expressly addressed and reminded of the word of His promise in its main features (comp. ver. 62 with l. 8; li. 26). He is thus, as it were, to be taken at His word and pledged. 8. To the Israelites there was naturally a great comfort in all this, which must have been of special value to them in that moment of deep shame.—The sinking of the roll in the Euphrates is added to the reading as supplementary and confirming the words by a visible symbolic action. The roll being compelled to sink by the stone and thus outwardly given up to destruction, suggests the thought that this external part was no longer necessary after, by the reading, the purport had been received into the living spiritual archives of the consciousness. At the same time, as is expressly stated in ver. 64, the sinking by the weight of the stone is to represent symbolically the ruin of Babylon.—Shall not rise, as the roll with the stone will not.—From the evil does not designate the element in which Babylon is to sink, but the figure is here forsaken and the transition made to literal speech. שֶׁלֹא כֵן then = in consequence of [because of, the evil].—Shall be weary. These words might certainly be dispensed with, as they rather injure than promote the clearness of the sense. As is well understood, however, the easier reading is by no means always the more correct. The question depends on whether the finer and more hidden sense which may be contained in the words is able to balance the formal reasons which favor their spuriousness. Comp. the TEXTUAL remarks.

Thus far the words of Jeremiah. These words, which I cannot regard as misplaced (comp. rems. on ver. 64) have simply the object of indicating that ch. lii. does not proceed from Jeremiah himself, but is the addition made by another person.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. "Daniel's Babylonian empire resumes, as it were, the thread which was broken off with the tower-erection and kingdom of Nimrod. In the Babylonian tower-building the whole of the then existing humanity was united against God; with the Babylonian kingdom began the period of the universal monarchies, which again aspired after an atheistical union of entire humanity. Babylon has since and even to the Revelation (ch. xviii.) remained the standing type of this world." AUERLEN, Der proph. Daniel, S. 280.

2. For what reason does Babylon appear as a type of the world? Why not Nineveh, or Persepolis, or Tyre, or Memphis, or Rome? Certainly not because Babylon was greater, more glorious, more powerful or prouder and more ungodly than those cities and kingdoms. Nineveh especially was still greater than Babylon (comp. DUNCKER, Gesch. d. Alterth. I. S. 474, 5), and Assyria was not less hostile to the theocracy, having carried away into captivity the northern and larger half of the people of Israel. Babylon is qualified for this representation in two ways: 1. because it is the home of worldly principedom and titanic arrogance (Gen. x. 8; xi. 1-4); 2. because Babylon destroyed the centre of the theocracy, Jerusalem, the temple and the theocratic kingdom, and first assumed to be the single supreme power of the globe.

8. "When God has used a superstitious, wicked and tyrannical nation long enough as His rod, He breaks it in pieces and finally throws it into the fire. For even those whom He formerly used as His chosen anointed instruments He then regards as but the dust in the streets or as chaff before the wind." CRAMER.

4. "No monarch is too rich, too wicked, too strong for God the Lord. And He can soon enlist and engage soldiers whom He can use against His declared enemies." CRAMER.

5. "Israel was founded on everlasting foundations, even God's word and promise. The sins of the people brought about that it was laid low in the dust, but not without hope of a better resurrection. Babylon, on the other hand, must perish forever, for in it is the empire of evil come to its highest bloom. Jeremiah owns the nothingness of all worldly kingdoms, since they are all under this national order to serve only for a time. We are to be subject to them and seek their welfare for the sake of the souls of men, whom God is educating therein; a Christian however cannot be enthusiastic for them after the manner of the ancient heathen nor of ancient Israel, for here we have no abiding city, our citizenship is in heaven. The kingdoms of this world are no sanctuaries for us and we supplicate their continuance only with the daily bread of the fourth petition. Jeremiah applies many words and figures to Babylon which he has already used in the judgments on other nations, thus to intimate that in Babylon all the heathenism of the world culminates, and that here also must be the greatest anguish. What, however, is here declared of Babylon must be fulfilled again on all earthly powers in so far as, treading in its footprints, they take flesh for their arm and regard the material of this world as power, whether they be called states or churches." DIEDRICH.

6. On l. 2. In putting into the mouth of Israel, returning from Babylon, the call to an everlasting covenant with Jehovah, the prophet causes them 1. to confess that they have forgotten the first covenant; 2. he shows us that the time of the new covenant begins with the redemption from the Babylonish captivity. He was far, however, from supposing that this redemption would be only a weak beginning, that the appearance of the Saviour would be deferred for centuries, that Israel would sink still deeper as an external πολιτεία, and that finally the Israel of the new covenant would itself appear as a μυστήριον, εἰς δ' ἐπιθυμοῦσιν ἄγγελοι παρακύψαι (1 Pet. i. 9-12).

7. From what Jeremiah has already said in xxxi. 31-34 of the new covenant we see that its nature and its difference from the old is not unknown to him. Yet he knows the new covenant only in general. He knows that it will be deeply spiritual and eternal, but how and why it will be so is still to him part of the μυστήριον.

8. On l. 6. Jeremiah here points back to ch. xiii. Priests, kings and prophets, who should discharge the office of shepherds, prove to be wolves. Yea, they are the worst of wolves, who go about in official clothing. There is therefore no more dangerous doctrine than that of an infallible office. Jer. xiv. 14; Matt. vii. 15; xxiii. 2-12.

9. On l. 7. It is the worst condition into which a church of God can come, when the enemies who desolate it can maintain that they are in the right in doing so. It is, however, a just nemesis when those who will not hear the regular messengers of God must be told by the extraordinary messengers of God what they should have done. Comp. xl. 2, 8.

10. On l. 8. "Babylon is opened, and it must be abandoned not clung to, for the captivity is a temporary chastisement, not the divine arrangement for the children of God. God's people must in the general redemption go like rams before the herd of the nations, that these may also attach themselves to Israel, as this was fulfilled at the time of Christ in the first churches and the apostles, who now draw the whole heathen world after them to eternal life. Here the prophet recognizes the new humanity, which proceeds from the ruins of the old, in which also ancient Israel leads the way; thus all, who follow it, become Israel." DIEDRICH.—"The heathen felt somewhat of the divine punishment when they overcame so easily the usually so strongly-protected nation. But Jeremiah shows them still how they deceived themselves in thinking that God had wholly rejected His people, for of the eternal covenant of grace they certainly understood nothing." HEIM and HOFFMANN on the Major Prophets.

11. On l. 18. "The great powers of the world form indeed the history of the world, but they have no future. Israel, however, always returns home to the dear and glorious land. The Jews might as a token of this return under Cyrus; the case is however this, that the true Holy One in Israel, Christ, guides us back to Paradise, when we flee to His hand from the Babylon of this world and let it be crucified for us." DIEDRICH.

12. On l. 23. "Although the Chaldeans were called of God for the purpose of making war on the Jewish nation on account of their multitudinous sins, yet they are punished because they did it not as God with a pure intention, namely, to punish the wrong in them and keep them for reformation; for they were themselves greater sinners than the Jews and continued with impenitence in their sins. Therefore they could not go scot-free and remain unpunished. Moreover, they acted too roughly and dealt with the Jews more harshly than God had commanded, for which He therefore fairly punished them. As God the Lord Himself says (Isa. xlvii. 6): When I was angry with My people I gave them into thine hands; but thou shewedst them no mercy. Therefore it is not enough that God's will be accomplished, but there must be the good intention in it, which God had, otherwise such a work may be a sin and call down the divine punishment upon it." *Württemberg. 13. On l. 31-34. "God calls Babylon Thou Pride, for pride was their inward force and impulse in all their actions. But worldly pride makes a Babylon and brings on a Babylon's fate. . . . Pride must fall, for it is in itself a lie against God, and all its might must perish in the fire; thus will the humble and meek remain in possession of the earth: this has a wide application through all times, even to eternity." DIEDRICH.

14. On ver. 33. "Israel is indeed weak and must suffer in a time of tyranny; it cannot help itself, nor needs it to do so, for its Redeemer is strong, His name The Lord Zebaoth—and He is now, having assumed our flesh, among us and conducts our cause so that the world trembles." DIEDRICH.

15. On l. 45. "An emblem of the destruction of anti-christian Babylon, which was also the true hammer of the whole world. This has God also broken and must and will do it still more. And this will the shepherd-boys do, as is said here in ver. 45 (according to LUTHER's translation), that is, all true teachers and preachers." CRAMER.

16. On ch. li. "The doctrines accord in all points with the previous chapter. And the prophet Jeremiah both in this and the previous chapter does nothing else but make out for the Babylonians their final discharge and passport, because they behaved so valiantly and well against the people of Judah, that they might know they would not go unrecompensed. For payment is according to service. And had they done better it would have gone better with them. It is well that when tyrants succeed in their evil undertakings they should not suppose they are God's dearest children and lean on His bosom, since they will yet receive the recompense on their crown, whatever they have earned." CRAMER.

17. ["Though in the hand of Babylon is a golden cup; she chooses such a cup, in order that men's eyes may be dazzled with the glitter of the gold, and may not inquire what it contains. But mark well, in the golden cup of Babylon is the poison of idolatry, the poison of false doctrines, which destroy the souls of men. I have often seen such a golden cup, in fair speeches of seductive eloquence; and when I have examined the venomous ingredients of the golden chalice, I have recognized the cup of Babylon." ORIGEN in WORDSWORTH.—S. R. A.]

"The seat and throne of Anti-christ is expressly named Babylon, namely, the city of Rome, built on the seven hills (Rev. xvii. 9). Just as Babylon brought so many lands and kingdoms under its sway and ruled them with great pomp and pride (the golden cup, which made all the world drunk, was Babylon in the hand of the Lord (li. 7), and all the heathen drank of the wine and became mad)—so has the spiritual Babylon a cup in its hand, full of the abomination and uncleanness of its whoredom, of which the kings of the earth and all who dwell on the earth have been made drunk. As it is said of Babylon that she dwells by great waters and has great treasures, so writes John of the Romish Babylon, that it is clothed in silk and purple and scarlet and adorned with gold, precious stones and pearls (Rev. xviii. 12). Of Babylon it is said that the slain in Israel were smitten by her; so also the spiritual Babylon is become drunk with the blood of the saints (Rev. xvii. 6). Just, however, as the Chaldean Babylon is a type of the spiritual in its pride and despotism, so also is it a type of the destruction which will come upon it. Many wished to heal Babylon but she would not be healed; so many endeavor to support the ruinous anti-christian Babylon, but all in vain. For as Babylon was at last so destroyed as to be a heap of stones and abode of dragons, so will it be with anti-christian Babylon. Of this it is written in Rev. xiv. 8: She is fallen, fallen, that great city, for she has made all nations drink of the wine of her fornication. And again, Babylon the great is fallen, and is become the habitation of devils and a hold of all foul and hateful birds (Rev. xviii. 2). As the inhabitants of Babylon were admonished to flee from her, that every man might deliver his soul (li. 6)—and again, My people, go ye out from the midst of her and deliver every man his soul, etc. (li. 45)—so the Holy Spirit admonishes Christians almost in the same words to go out from the spiritual Babylon, that they be not polluted by her sins and at the same time share in her punishment. For thus it is written in Rev. xviii. 4, I heard, says John, a voice from heaven saying, Go ye out of her, My people, that ye be not partakers of her sins and that ye receive not of her plagues, for her sins reach unto heaven and God remembers her iniquities." Württemberg. Summarien.

18. On li. 5. "A monarch can sooner make an end of half a continent than draw a nail from a hut which the Lord protects.—And if it is true that Kaiser Rudolph, when he revoked the toleration of the Picards and the same day lost one of his principal forts, said, 'I thought it would be so, for I grasped at God's sceptre' (WEISMANNI, Hist. Eccl. Tom. II. p. 320)—this was a sage remark, a supplement to the words of the wise." ZINZENDORF.

19. On li. 9. We heal Babylon, but she will not be healed. Babylon is an outwardly beautiful but inwardly worm-eaten apple. Hence sooner or later the foulness must become noticeable. So is it with all whose heart and centre is not God. All is inwardly hollow and vain. When this internal vacuity begins to render itself externally palpable, when here and there a rent or foul spot becomes visible, then certainly come the friends and admirers of the unholy form and would improve, cover up, sew up, heal. But it does not avail. When once there is death in the body no physician can effect a cure.

20. On li. 17, 19, 20. "The children of God have three causes why they may venture on Hm. 1. All men are fools, their treasure is it not; 2. The Lord is their hammer; He breaks through everything, and 3, they are an instrument in His hand, a heritage; in this there is happiness." ZINZENDORF.

21. On li. 41-44. "How was Sheshach thus won, the city renowned in all the world thus taken? No one would have thought it possible, but God does it. He rules with wonders and with wonders He makes His church free. Babylon is a wonder no longer for its power, but for its weakness. We are to know the world's weakness even where it still appears strong. A sea of hostile nations has covered Babylon. Her land is now a desolation. God takes Bel, the principal idol of Babylon, symbolizing its whole civil powers in hand, and snatches his prey from his teeth. Our God is stronger than all worldly forces, and never leaves us to them." DIEDRICH.

22. On li. 58. "Yea, so it is with all walls and towers, in which God's word is not the vital force, even though they be entitled churches and cathedrals . . . God's church alone possesses permanence through His pure word." DIEDRICH.

23. On li. 60-64. When we wish to preserve an archive safely, we deposit it in a record-office where it is kept in a dry place that no moisture may get to it. Seraiah throws his book-roll into the waters of the Euphrates, which must wash it away, dissolve and destroy it. But this was of no account. The main point was that he, Seraiah, as representative of the holy nation had taken solemn stock of the word of God against Babylon, and as it were taken God at His word, and reminded Him of it. In this manner the matter was laid up in the most enduring and safest archive that could be imagined; it was made a case of honor with the omniscient and omnipotent God. Such matters can, however, neither be forgotten, nor remain in dead silence, nor be neglected. They must be brought to such an end as the honor of God requires.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

1. On l. 2. This text may be used on the feast of the Reformation, or any other occasion with reference to a rem bene gestam. The Triumph of the Good Cause, 1. over what enemies it is gained; 2. to what it should impel us; (a) to the avoidance of that over which we now triumph; (b) to the grateful proclamation of what the Lord has done for us, by word and by deed.

2. On l. 4-8. The deliverance of Israel from the Babylonian captivity a type of the deliverance of the Church. 1. The Church must humbly acknowledge the captivity suffered as a just judgment of God. 2. She must turn like Israel inwardly with an upright heart unto the Lord; 3. She must become like Israel to all men a pattern and leader to freedom.

3. On l. 5. A confirmation sermon. "What is the hour of confirmation? 1. An hour which calls to separation; 2. an hour which leads to new connections; 3. an hour which fixes forever the old covenant with the soul's friend." FLOREY, 1863.

4. On l. 18-20. Assyria and Babylon the types of all the spiritual enemies of the church as of individual Christians. Every one has his Assyria and his Babylon. Sin is the destruction of men. Forgiveness of sins is the condition of life, for only where forgiveness of sins is, is there life and blessedness. In Christ we find the forgiveness of sins. He destroys the handwriting. He washes us clean. He is also the good shepherd who leads our souls into green pastures, to the spiritual Carmel.

5. On l. 31, 32. Warning against pride. Babylon was very strong and powerful, rich and splendid. It seemed invincible by nature and by art. Had it not then a certain justification in being proud, at least towards men? No; for no one has to contend only with men. Every one who contends has the Lord either for his friend or his enemy. It is the Lord from whom cometh victory (Prov. xxi. 31). He it is who teacheth our hands to fight (Ps. xviii. 35; cxliv. 1). His strength is made perfect in weakness (2 Cor. xii. 9). He can make the lame (Isa. xxxiii. 23; Mic. iv. 7) and mortally wounded (Jer. xxxvii. 10) so strong that they overmaster the sound (comp. ver. 45). He can make one man put to flight a thousand (Deut. xxxii. 80; Isa. xxx. 17). With him can one dash in pieces a troop and leap over a wall (Ps. xviii. 29). No one accordingly should be proud. The word of the Lord, "I am against thee, thou proud one!" is a terrible word which no one should conjure up against himself.

6. On l. 33, 34. The consolation of the Church in persecution: 1. It suffers violence and injustice. 2. Its redeemer is strong.

7. On li. 5. God the Lord manifests such favor to Israel as to declare Himself her husband (ii. 2; iii. 1). But now that Israel and Judah are in exile, it seems as if they were rejected or widowed women. This, however, is only appearance. Israel's husband does not die. He may well bring a period of chastisement, of purification and trial on His people, but when this period is over, the Lord turns the handle, and smites those through whom He chastised Israel, when they had forgotten that they were not to satisfy their own desire, but only to accomplish the Lord's will on Israel.

8. On li. 6. A time may come when it is well to separate one's self. For although it is said in Prov. xviii. 1; he who separateth himself, seeketh that which pleaseth him and opposeth all that is good—and therefore separation, as the antipodes of churchliness, i. e., of churchly communion and humble subjection to the law of the co-operation of members (1 Cor. xii. 25 sqq.) is to be repudiated, yet there may come moments in the life of the church, when it will be a duty to leave the community and separate one's self. Such a moment is come when the community has become a Babylon. It should, however, be noted that one should not be too ready with such a decision. For even the life of the church is subject to many vacillations. There are periods of decay, obscurations, as it were, comparable to eclipses of the stars, but to these, so long as the foundations only subsist, must always follow a restoration and return to the original brightness. No one is to consider the church a Babylon on account of such a passing state of disease. It is this only when it has withheld the objective divine foundations, the means of grace, the word and sacrament, altogether and permanently in their saving efficacy. Then, when the soul can no longer find in the church the pure and divine bread of life; it is well "to deliver the soul that it perish not in the iniquity of the church." From this separation from the church is, however, to be carefully distinguished the separation within the church, from all that which is opposed to the healthy life of the church, and is therefore to be regarded as a diseased part of the ecclesiastical body. Such separation is the daily duty of the Christian. He has to perform it with respect to his private life in all the manifold relations, indicated to us in Matt. xviii. 17; Rom. xvi. 17; 1 Cor. v. 9 sqq.; 2 Thess. iii. 6; Tit. iii. 10; 2 John 10, 11.—Comp. the article on Sects, by PALMER in HERZOG, R.-Enc., XXI., S. 21, 22.

9. On li. 10. The righteousness which avails before God. 1. Its origin (not our work or merit, but God's grace in Christ); 2. Its fruit, praise of that which the Lord has wrought in us (a) by words, (b) by works.

10. On li. 60. This text may be used at the sending out of missionaries or the departure of emigrants. Occasion may be taken to speak 1. of the gracious help and deliverance, which the Lord has hitherto shown to the departing; 2. they may be admonished to remain united in their distant land with their brethren at home by (a) remembering the Lord, i. e., ever remaining sincerely devoted to the Lord as the common shield of salvation; (b) faithfully serving Jerusalem, i. e., the common mother of us all (Gal. iv. 26), the church, with all our powers in the proper place and measure, and ever keeping her in our hearts.

IV. Conclusion.

HISTORICAL APPENDIX, CONTAINING A BRIEF SURVEY OF THE EVENTS FROM THE BEGINNING OF THE REIGN OF ZEDEKIAH, TO THE DEATH OF JEHOIACHIN (ch. lii.).

By the concluding words of li. 64 (Thus far, etc.) the final editor of the book evidently wished to indicate that the words of Jeremiah cease with ch. li., and that, therefore, what follows is not from him, but some other. We are thus expressly warned by those concluding words against the mistake of attributing chap. lii. to the prophet. Nevertheless the chapter has been considered by D. KIMCHI, ABARBANEL and many others, as a work of Jeremiah. SEB. SCHMIDT, e. g., in opposition to the opinion of ABARBANEL, says that the men of the great synagogue took the history of the destruction of Jerusalem from the Book of Kings and inserted it here, "ne forte erremus in eo, quod supra scriptum est." And afterwards "Contrarium potius stultimus, scripta hæc esse a Jeremia propheta et transumpta in librum Regum, sicut in eum historia Iiskiz ex Jesaja translata est, cum aliqua tamen variatione, ut appareat, utrumque scriptorem habere quod sibi proprium et a Spiritu sancto inspiratum." All orthodox commentators of the older period do not however adopt this view. The strict Lutheran FÖRSTER, e. g., says in his Commentary, which appeared in 1672, "Hucusque fuit prophetia Jeremie. Coput istud ultimum ab alio quodam viro pio et sancto ἐπιστάμωτος quasi loco superadditum fuit vel huc transcriptum ex II. Reg. c. 25."—Among the more modern authors HAEVERNICK adopts the view that Jeremiah wrote the history of Jehoiachin and Zedekiah just as Isaiah wrote that of Hezekiah. He then, as editor of the Book of Kings allotted its natural place to this description in 2 Ki. xxv. (Eint. II., 1, S. 172) while Jer. lii. was added to these by the collectors of the prophecies. He afterwards (II. 2, S. 248) modifies this view, at least declaring vers. 31-34 to be a subsequently added notice, which, however, passed naturally and probably at the same time to 2 Ki. xxv.—KEIL (Eint. II., Aufl., S. 261; Comm. über die proph. Geschichtsbücher des A. T., III. Bd., 1865, S. 378, 9) is of opinion that an extended history of the last times of the kingdom of Judah, composed "perhaps by Jeremiah or Baruch" (in the Eint., etc., it is "either by Jeremiah or by Baruch"), was in existence. The two narratives of Jer. lii. and 2 Ki. xxv. were brief extracts from this. Most commentators, however, are of opinion that the present passage belonged originally to the Book of Kings, and was inserted by a later hand with several lesser and one great modification (the insertion of Jer. lii. 28-30, in the place of 2 Ki. xxv. 22-26). I also adopt this view in substance, for the following reasons: 1. The introduction of the passage (lii. 1, 2) contains the standing formula of the Book of Kings, with which the succession of a new king is usually recorded. This introduction is thus undoubtedly original in the Book of Kings. For whoever composed it, and from whatever source it may have been drawn, it was at any rate, as it now reads, written originally for the Book of Kings, and in Jer. lii. is only a transposition from thence. 2. The rest also is so composed that it cannot be said there is anything contained in it contrary in form or purport to the usual character of the Books of the Kings. 3. There is, therefore, a strong presumption that the narrative also thus introduced was originally written for the Book of Kings, to which it is essential and indispensable, and which, without it, would be so much mutilated, while the Book of Jeremiah receives in it a conclusion however useful, yet essentially foreign. 4. The transference from the Book of Kings is made purposely and with consideration. This is evident from the fact that the brief section, vers. 28-30, was inserted instead of the narrative concerning the fate of the Jews remaining in the country, which is only a brief extract from Jeremiah, chh. xxxix.-xliii., and therefore in the Book of Jeremiah would have been an unnecessary repetition. 5. As to the form of the text the relation is as follows: (a) in vers. 1-5, Jer. lii. has some traces of an older form of the text, not yet purified from roughnesses. Comp. וְהִדְרָה עַד-הַשְּׁלִיחַ, ver. 3, with 2 Ki. xxiv. 20. Likewise the older form נְבֻזַרְדָּן ver. 4, with 2 Ki. xxv. 1. On the other hand יִהְיֶה ib. betrays the hand of an emendator. (b) In vers. 6-11, the text of Jer. lii. is in general, especially as regards completeness and correctness much better; ver. 6 contains the indispensable statement of the month, which is strangely lacking in 2 Ki. xxv. 8; so also Jer. lii. 7 contains the verbs indispensable to the sense, יִכְרְחוּ וַיֵּצְאוּ. Ver. 10 b contains the statement concerning princes of Judah, ver. 11 a similar one concerning the imprisonment of Zedekiah, which are both wanting in 2 Ki. xxv. The text of 2 Ki. xxv. thus appears here to be more than contracted (comp. also אֵתוּ, 2 Ki. xxv. 5 with צִבְרִיקִיּוֹ Jer. lii. 8, whereby the harshness occasioned in 2 Ki. xxv. 7 by a change of subjects is removed). The absence of those essential parts of speech in vers. 8, 4, can be the result only of the transformations which the text has suffered. Thus also the other wants of the text may be explained, and there is no necessity for assuming the common use of a third source. (c) From vers. 12-23 the Book of Kings shows in vers. 8-17 a text variously emended and purged from real or apparent offences. In ver. 8 Nebuchadnezzar, ib. עָמַר for עָמַר, and יְרוּשָׁלַם for בִּי, in ver. 9 כָּל-בֵּית-גְּדוֹל for the more difficult הַגְּדוֹל. In ver. 10 the superfluous כָּל is absent before חוֹלָת; in ver. 11 for the same reason is wanting יְגִדְלוֹת הָעָם; the rare word הָאָכֹן is altered into the more current הֶחֱמוֹן, in ver. 12 we read רָלַת for רָלַת, which does not occur elsewhere; ib. the name Nebuzaradan seemed superfluous; ib. Chethibh for גִּבִּים, not occurring elsewhere; in ver. 14 מְדֻקָּת, and likewise in ver. 15 סִירוֹת, because otherwise these names would be mentioned twice, also in ver. 15 the two neighboring words to the two last mentioned have disappeared; in ver. 16 with perfect justice the statement concerning the twelve oxen is absent; ib. we find the easier לְנֶהֱשֵׁת; in ver. 17 the apparently superfluous וְהַעֲפֹדִים is wanting in the beginning, then all from הָיָה, perhaps because these statements were already to be found in 1 Ki. vii. 15, 16; in ver. 17 אַחַת is wanting after הַכְתָּרָת; ib. שָׁלַשׁ is an evident mistake; after ver. 17 that is entirely wanting which forms Jer. lii. 23, perhaps because its main import had been already expressed in 1 Kings vii. 20. — (d). In verses 24-27 again the text of Jeremiah lii. shows itself to have been emended, but not happily; in ver. 24 הַפְּשָׁנָה is only an apparent improvement; in ver. 25 אֲשֶׁר הָיָה is certainly plainer; ib. שִׁבְעָה is doubtful; the absence of the article before סִפֵּר seems to proceed from ignorance. (e). In the concluding section, vers. 81-84, again the text of the book of Kings betrays the hand of the emendator; in ver. 27 (2 Ki. xxv.) הַמִּשְׁחָה is obscure, but וַיֵּצֵא אֹתוֹ seemed evidently superfluous; instead of the rarer form כָּלֵא stands the more usual כָּלֵא, כָּלֵא כָּלֵא is a simplification; in ver. 29 is a later Aramaic form; in ver. 80 כָּבֵל is wanting as superfluous, for the same reason also עַד יוֹם כוּתוֹ.

From all this it seems to follow that Jer. lii. is certainly a transposition of 2 Ki. xxv. but that in the former passage we have a better text, neither disfigured by needless correction nor by other injuries. Whether the author of the book of Kings is Jeremiah himself, or whether especially at the close of his history he made use of this prophet's writings, I leave undecided. This much, however, is certain, that this chapter neither stood originally in this place, nor is it an extract made by another person from the same source, from which 2 Ki. xxiv. 18-25, 30 was derived. Whatever opinion, however, may be held regarding the sources, Jer. lii. was not drawn therefrom by another person, but transposed from the book of Kings, and yet has preserved the text more pure than the original passage.

The object of the transposition was evidently first to furnish the reader of the prophecies with the necessary historical guidance. The object may also have been prominent to show how completely and exactly the threatenings of the prophet against the stiff-necked people were fulfilled.

1. The capture of the city, together with the circumstances immediately previous and subsequent thereto.

LII. 1-11.

- 1 Zedekiah was one and twenty years old when he began to reign, and he reigned eleven years in Jerusalem. And his mother's name was Hamutal the daughter
- 2 of Jeremiah of Libnah. And he did that which was evil in the eyes of the LORD,
- 3 according to all that Jehoiakim had done. For¹ through the anger of the LORD [For so] it came to pass in Jerusalem and Judah [that Jehovah was angry] till he had cast them out from his presence, that [And] Zedekiah rebelled against the king
- 4 of Babylon. And it came to pass in the ninth year of his reign, in the tenth month,^a in the tenth day of the month, that Nebuchadrezzar king of Babylon came, he and all his army, against Jerusalem, and pitched against it, and built forts [a rampart]^a

5 against it round about. So the city was besieged⁴ unto the eleventh year of king
6 Zedekiah. And in the fourth month, in the ninth day of the month, the famine
7 was sore in the city, so that there was no bread for the people of the land [the 8 common people]. Then the city was broken up [through], and all the men of war 9 fled, and went forth out of the city by night by the way of the gate between the 10 two walls, which was by the king's garden; (now the Chaldeans were by the city 11 round about;) and they went⁵ by the way of [to] the plain. But the army of the 12 Chaldeans pursued after the king, and overtook Zedekiah in the plains of Jericho;
13 and all his army was scattered from him. Then they took the king, and carried 14 him up unto the king of Babylon to Riblah in the land of Hamath; where he gave 15 judgment upon him. And the king of Babylon slew the sons of Zedekiah before 16 his eyes: he slew also all the princes of Judah in Riblah. Then he put out the 17 eyes of Zedekiah; and the king of Babylon bound him in chains [a double 18 chain], and carried him to Babylon, and put him in prison till the day of his 19 death.

¹ Ver. 3.—הִשְׁלִיכוּ, if there be no mistake in the writing, is an abnormal form of the infinitive. Comp. OLSH., § 191, d, f; EWALD, § 238, d. On the neuter meaning of the fem. verb הִיטְרוּ comp. NABEGLER, Gr., § 60, 6, b; Isaiah xl. 20; 2 Kings xxiv. 3.

² Ver. 4.—The differences between the text here and in 2 Kings xxv. 1, 2 are as follows: 1. Instead of הָיָה בְּשִׁנְתָּהּ here הָיָה בְּשִׁנְתָּהּ there. The latter mode of expression (anno domini, i. e., numeri, comp. NABEGLER, Gr., § 65, 2, c) is found in Jer. also in xxviii. 1, Chethibh; xxxii. 1, Chethibh; xli. 2; II. 59. Besides also in III. 28; xxix. 30. 2. 2 Kings has the later form in Heb., Nebuchadnezzar (comp. xxi. 2-7; xxiv. 1; xxxii. 1; xxxv. 11; xxxix. 11; xliii. 10; xlv. 30; xli. 2; I. 17 with xxvii. 6, 20; xxviii. 3; xxxix. 5; Hitzig on xxiv. 1). 3. וַיִּהְיוּ, 2 Kings, instead of וַיִּהְיוּ, which is required by יִכְנֶנּוּ.

³ Ver. 4.—The word רִיבְלָה occurs, besides here and in the parallel passages, only in Ezek. iv. 2; xvii. 17; xxi. 27; xxvi. 8. It is thus a later word. The root רִבֵּן does not occur in Hebrew, but is very common in the Chaldee, Syriac and Samaritan, where it has the meaning, speculari, inspicere, circumspicere, רִיבְלָה is therefore specula, the watch-tower, from which the besieged city may be watched and assailed. With this agrees well Isa. xxiii. 13, where the בְּחוּגֵי of the Chaldeans are spoken of. It is surprising that the word never occurs in the plural, as we should expect, if it designated only the single towers. We may therefore suppose that it signifies the whole line of circumvallation, including the towers, and is thus a potiori, a collective designation. As the Chaldeans were celebrated for their skill in sieges (comp. HERZOG, Real-Enc. IV., § 334), the word may have passed from their language into the Hebrew. Comp. KEIL on 2 Ki. xxv. 1; HARVEY on Ezek. iv. 2, § 49; GRAY, Thes., p. 330.

⁵ Ver. 7.—Instead of וַיִּלְכְּ we find in 2 Ki. the manifestly less correct form, וַיִּלָּךְ.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Vers. 1-3. Zedekiah . . . king of Babylon. These three verses are of the same purport with 2 Ki. xxiv. 18-20, with only two unessential differences. In the latter passage, ver. 20, we find וַיִּהְיוּ לְוִיָּהוּדָה, וַיִּהְיוּ לְוִיָּהוּדָה, and עַד-הִשְׁלִיכוּ for עַד-הִשְׁלִיכוּ, in both cases an easier and more correct reading, of which it is more natural to suppose that it arose out of the other, than the reverse. The present passage then has the presumption of originality in its favor. Comp., moreover, 2 Chron. xxxvi. 11-13.—For through the anger, etc. The reason for Jehovah's anger is punishment, in ver. 2, however, to which the for refers, it is sin, not punishment, which is spoken of. Accordingly the words are not to be taken as causal, but as was shown on xxii. 81 (p. 287) עַל is used here as frequently elsewhere for אֶל or לְ, and עַל-אֶף is the statement of the effect: it came to pass that Jehovah was angered—which may be said of what happened in Jerusalem, as well as against it.

Vers. 4, 5. And it came to pass . . . Zedekiah. These words are found almost exactly the same in 2 Ki. xxv. 1, 2, and in an abridged extract in xxxix. 1. Compare also Ezek. xxiv. 1. For the exposition of the parts reproduced in ch. xxxix., see there the differences between our text and that of the Book of Kings. Comp. the TEXTUAL NOTES.

Vers. 6, 7. And in the fourth month . . . the plain. These opening words, found also in xxxix. 2, are wanting in 2 Kings, although the statement of the day without that of the month, makes no sense, and also the words and went out of the city, though thus the sentence loses its predicate. KEIL (on 2 Ki. xxv. 4) supposes that not only the predicate has fallen out after all the men of war, but also still more before these words, in 2 Ki. and Jer. liii., namely, the words found in xxxix. 8, "and it came to pass, when Zedekiah the king of Judah saw them," because the king (according to 2 Ki. xxv. 6; Jer. lli. 8; xxxix. 5) was among the fugitives, and because the words "and all the men of war," have no proper connection with the previous context and could not form an adverbial sentence. But if KEIL were right, the whole verse xxxix. 8 must have dropped out, since them refers to the persons mentioned in it. We have already shown on ch. xxxix. that vers. 1, 2, 4-10 are only an abridged extract from ch. lli. and that the words quoted above are only a connecting clause between the original and genuine ver. 8, and the following verses derived from ch. lli. These words are therefore of later date than ch. lli., and cannot have been omitted before "and all the men," etc. The previous mention of the king is not necessary, since he is included; the sentence moreover is not adverbial, but a narrative of a by no means unusual construction (comp. EWALD, § 346, b).

Vers. 8-11. But the army . . of his death. The Book of Kings reads "him" instead of Zedekiah. It is plain that the former could be more easily derived from the latter than the reverse.—In the land of Hamath is wanting in 2 Ki. xxv. 6, while it is found ib. ver. 21 (comp. 2 Ki. xxiii. 83).—He gave judgment. 2 Ki.

xxv. 6, has "they gave," etc., on which comp. rems. on xxxix. 5.—The first half of ver. 10 agrees with xxxix. 6, even to the there added words, "in Riblah." In 2 Ki. xxv. 7 it reads, "and they slew the sons," etc., the Chaldeans of ver. 5 being still the subject. The second half of ver. 10 is entirely wanting in 2 Kings. The blinding and binding in chains of king Zedekiah is narrated in both places in the same way, but in 2 Ki. the singulars put out (עָרַר) and bound him (וַיִּאָּסְרוּהוּ) are the more surprising, as the sentence is contained in the plural carried him (וַיִּבְאֲרוּהוּ). 2 Ki. xxv. is entirely silent on the confinement of Zedekiah in Babylon. HIRTZ justly calls attention to the fact that בֵּית-הַפִּקְדוֹת is not simply a prison, this being always otherwise expressed (comp., e. g., ver. 81). Jeremiah, who is not blinded, is put into prison; but Zedekiah, the more guilty, is blinded and put into the house of correction. Comp. SIMSON on Jud. xvi. 21. The LXX. also has ἐς οἰκίαν μολῶντος. Yet it appears that towards the end his confinement was less rigorous, and that an honorable interment was granted him after his death, for this is the purport of the promise made to him through Jeremiah in xxxiv. 1-5.

2. The Destruction of the City and Deportation of the People.

LII. 12-16.

- 12 Now in the fifth month, in the tenth day of the month, which was the nineteenth year of Nebuchadrezzar king of Babylon, came Nebuzar-adan, captain of the guard [of the halberdiers], who served [stood before]¹ the king of Babylon, into Jerusalem.
- 13 And burned the house of the LORD [Jehovah] and the king's house; and all the houses of Jerusalem, and all the houses of the great men [every great house],² burned
- 14 he with fire. And all the army of the Chaldeans, that were with the captain of
- 15 the guard, brake down all the walls of Jerusalem, round about. Then Nebuzar-adan captain of the guard [halberdiers] carried away captive certain of the poor [a part of the lowest] of the people, and the residue of the people that remained in the city, and those that fell away, that fell to the king of Babylon, and the rest of
- 16 the multitude [work-people].³ But Nebuzar adan the captain of the guard left certain of the poor [part of the meanest]⁴ of the land for vinedressers and for husbandmen.⁵

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ Ver. 12.—For לִפְנֵי עָמָר, of which words the former owes its punctuation to the erroneous connection with יְרוּשָׁלַם (hence also עָמָר, 2 Kings reads עָמָר as a correction, and ר' without בֵּי. He ought doubtless to read עָמָר. Comp. xxxv. 10; Jud. xx. 28.

³ Ver. 15.—Instead of יִתְּרֵהֶם, 2 Ki. has יִתְּרֵהֶם. The word אֶמֶן must have seemed obscure even to the authors of the text of 2 Ki. xxv. and Jer. xxxix., the one rendering it as above, the other by הָעָם הַשְּׂאֵרִים. In Prov. viii. 30 אֲכֹן and in Song of Sol. vii. 1 אֲכֹן certainly has the sense of work-man, and accordingly we may take the word here as a collective designation of the חָרָשׁ and כְּסָנָר, whose deportation is spoken of in xxiv. 1 and xxix. 2. Thus HITZIG, GRAF, MEYER. KEIL, on the other hand, appeals to xxxix. 9. But this passage, as well as 2 Ki. xxv. 11, proves only that to both authors the word אֲכֹן appeared strange. Whether they interpreted it correctly is another question. If it should be alleged that it is a word appertaining only to a higher style, we reply that it would not be an easy alteration from הָכֵן.

* Ver. 16.—Instead of כְּרִלֹת 2 Ki. has כְּרִלֵּת. This also betrays the hand of the corrector, since כְּרִלֹת does not occur elsewhere either as plural or singular (EWALD, §165, c). It is the plural of כְּרִל (xl. 7; 2 Ki. xxiv. 14; xxv. 12)—tenuitates, insignificances.

* Ver. 16.—The name Nebuzar-adan appeared superfluous to the author of 2 Ki. xxv., having been mentioned in ver. 12. The word נְבֻזַּי, which does not occur elsewhere, he altered into נְבִיִּם (from נָבָא, sodit, aravit). Comp. remarks on xxxix. 10.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Jers. 12-14. Now in the fifth . . . round about. Instead of the tenth day, 2 Kings (as also Bar. i. 2) mentions the seventh, as the same text also states three cubits instead of the five in ver. 23, and five men instead of the seven in ver. 25. HITZIG, THENIUS, GRAF, KEIL [BLAYNEY, HENDERSON] rightly suppose that these differences arose from the interchange of the letters of the older alphabet used as numerals. Which statements are correct is not ascertainable. THENIUS [comp. also WORDSWORTH] declares the statement here made to be the correct one, because the Jews afterward kept the ninth day as a fast. But on the other hand comp. KEIL on 2 Ki. xxv. 8.

Vers. 15, 16. Then Nebuzar-adan . . . husbandmen.—The poor of the people, which is wanting in 2 Ki., has come here either by mistake from ver. 16, where it also begins the sentence, or it is to express the thought that the poor people did not all remain behind, but were partly carried away. The latter is probably the correct view.—Multitude [work-people]. It is difficult to decide which is the correct rendering. Both suit the sense, for a remnant of work-people might just as well be spoken of as a remnant of the masses of the people (either in antithesis to the warriors or the population of the city). I prefer to take the word in the sense in which it undoubtedly occurs in Prov. viii. 30 [then was I as a workman with him], and Song of Sol. vii. 1.

8. The Carrying away of the sacred Vessels.

LII. 17-23.

- 17 Also the pillars of brass that were in [belonged to] the house of the LORD, and the bases, and the brazen sea that was in the house of the LORD [Jehovah] the 18 Chaldeans brake, and carried all² the brass of them to Babylon. The caldrons [pots] also, and the shovels, and the snuffers, and the bowls, and the spoons, and 19 all the vessels of brass wherewith they ministered, took they away. And the basins,³ and the firepans,⁴ and the bowls, and the caldrons [pots], and the candlesticks, and the spoons, and the cups;⁵ that which was of gold in gold, and that which was of silver in silver [which were entirely of gold or silver]⁶ took the captain of 20 the guard [halberdiers] away. The⁷ two pillars, one⁸ sea, and twelve brazen bulls that were under⁹ the bases, which king Solomon had made to [for] the house 21 of the LORD [Jehovah]; the brass¹⁰ of all these vessels was without weight. And concerning the pillars, the height¹¹ of one pillar was eighteen cubits; and a fillet of twelve cubits did compass it; and the thickness thereof was four fingers; it was
22 hollow.¹² And a chapter of brass was upon it; and the height of one chapter was five cubits, with network¹³ and pomegranates upon the chapter, round about, all 23 of brass. The second pillar also and the pomegranates¹⁴ were like unto these. And there were ninety and six pomegranates on a side; and all the pomegranates upon the network were a hundred round about [round about were a hundred].

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

* Ver. 17.—Instead of לְבֵית אֱשֶׁר we read in 2 Ki. xxv. 13 בֵּית אֱשֶׁר. The latter—which were in the house of Jehovah, the former—which belonged to the house, etc.

* Ver. 17.—In 2 Ki. כל is wanting before נחשתם as in ver. 14 before חכות.

* Ver. 19.—כפים (1 Ki. vii. 50; 2 Ki. xii. 14, כפות, 2 Sam. xvii. 23, כפות) from כף, basin, bowl (Ex. xii. 22; Zechariah xii. 2) not to be confounded with כף, threshold (ver. 24). כפות בכף are expressly mentioned in 2 Kings xii. 14.

* Ver. 19.—כחורות (from חָרַתָּה, to hold, seize, specially used of bringing fire, Isa. xxx. 14; Prov. vi. 27) are vessels for carrying burning substances, whether coals (Lev. xvi. 13) or lighted incense (Num. xvi. 17 sqq.).

* Ver. 19.—כנקיות are mentioned besides only in Ex. xxv. 29; xxxvii. 16; Num. iv. 7, and in all these places among the utensils of the shew-bread-table (comp. rems. on כפות, ver. 18) and as pertaining to libation, (אֲשֶׁר יִשָּׁךְ בָּהֶן). In Ex. xxv. 29 these vessels are expressly designated as to be made of gold.

* Ver. 19.—The double position of וְהָיָה and כָּכָה has the sense of "only" or "wholly" (massive). Comp. NAEGLSB. Gr., § 22 b.—The words וְהָיָה הַכִּיּוֹת וְהָיָה הַכִּיּוֹת are wanting in 2 Kings. It is noteworthy that thus (a) the repetition of כִּיּוֹת and כָּכָה, and (b) the plural כָּפִים, which occurs nowhere else in the sense of "basins" are avoided; (c) that the words following כִּיּוֹת and כָּכָה are also removed.

* Ver. 20.—With respect to the construction of ver. 20 we are to regard the substantives set first absolutely as in the accusative; as to the pillars, etc., their brass was not to be weighed. The verse is to express that it was those large pieces which raised the weight of the brass to such a degree.

* Ver. 20.—Instead of הָאֵדָר the Keri would have read (not in 2 Ki.) merely אֵדָר, probably because both numbers stand before and afterwards without the article. Grammatically both are possible. Comp. NAEGLSB. Gr., § 73, 2 Anm.

* Ver. 20.—The explanation of הָיָה in the sense of "instead" is as forced as the assumption that the text originally read וְהָיָה כָּכָה is arbitrary.

* Ver. 20.—Instead of לְנֹחֶשֶׁת (the suffix by anticipation, comp. NAEGLSB. Gr., § 77, 2; Jer. li. 56 and on xlviii. 44) we find in 2 Ki. xxv. 16 simply לְנֹחֶשֶׁת.

* Ver. 21.—The Keri קוֹכָה, with which the Chethibh in 2 Ki. xxv. 17 and 1 Ki. vii. 14 accords, is unnecessary, for קוֹכָה may be regarded as the accusative of measure (comp. NAEGLSB. Gr., § 70, g): eighteen cubits was a pillar as to height.

* Ver. 21.—On the construction comp. NAEGLSB. Gr., § 97, 2 a and Anm. 1.

* Ver. 24.—לְכַבֵּךְ from לָכַךְ, nectere, plectere inus (comp. כָּכָה Nah. i. 10; Job vii. 13; סִכָּךְ, thicket, Gen. xxii. 13, etc.), is opus reticulatum, network. Comp. 1 Ki. vii. 17 sqq.; 2 Ki. i. 2; 2 Chron. iv. 12, 13; Job xviii. 8.

* Ver. 22.—לְכַנֵּים at the close of ver. 22 is wanting in 2 Ki. xxv. 17, and we find instead עַל-הַלְכַבֵּךְ. This makes the impression that this expression seemed unsuitable to the author of Jer. lli. (it must denote together with the network), both on account of the עַל and because the pomegranates were also named after the network, and that, in order besides the general וְכִלְיָהּ to set forth a special part, he chose in preference the last mentioned, the רַפְּנִים.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Vers. 17-20. Also the pillars . . . weight. Concerning the brazen pillars of Solomon's temple comp. 1 Ki. vii. 15-22; 2 Chron. iii. 16 sqq.; WINER, R.-W.-B., s. v. Jachin und Boaz; HERZOG, R.-Enc. VI. S. 366, 7. [WORDSWORTH, ad loc., and SMITH'S Dict. s. v.].—The כְּנוֹת, bases (comp. 1 Ki. vii. 27 sqq.), were pedestals or stands, four cubits long, four broad and three high, to serve as supports for the ten basins required in washing the flesh of the sacrifices (2 Chron. iv. 6). Comp. KEIL on the Books of Kings.—The brazen sea (comp. 1 Ki. vii. 23-26; 1 Chron. xviii. 8; 2 Chron. iv. 2-6) served for the priests' washing (comp. Exod. xxx. 18 sqq.). WINER, R.-W.-B. s. v.—HERZ., R.-Enc. IX. S. 236 sqq. [Comp. WORDSWORTH and SMITH'S Dict.].—Of the smaller vessels are mentioned סִירֹת, pots for carrying away the ashes from the altar; יָעִים, shovels for removing the ashes; כְּזִפְרוֹת, not to be confounded with כְּזִמְרֹת, a vine-dresser's knife, occurring in three places only besides this: 1 Ki. vii. 50; 2 Ki. xii. 14; 2 Chron. iv. 22, and always with כְּזִרְקִית, of uncertain meaning: Vulg., etc., palteria; LUTHER, etc., knife; GASENIUS, etc., scissors, lamp-scissors, at any rate an instrument so-called a carpendo; כְּזִרְקִית, which is wanting in 2 Ki., probably that it might not occur twice, from יָרַק, sparsit, therefore vas unde spargitur, bowls, mentioned in Exod. xxvii. 8; xxxviii. 8; Num. iv. 14 among the altar-utensils, therefore used for sprinkling the blood of the sacrifices, but comp. also Am. vi. 6; כְּפֹט, likewise of uncertain meaning, LXX. κρεάγχα, flesh-fork, flesh-hook, the moderns—spoons, pans, bowls, on account of their resemblance to the bent hand. Comp. KEIL on Kings. In Exod. xxv. 20 these appear among the utensils of the table of shew-bread, comp. Num. vii. 14, 20, 26, etc. WINER, R.-W.-B. and HERZ., Real-Enc. s. v. Schaubrodtsch. All these vessels were of brass [HENDERSON, copper]. In the following verse the golden and silver vessels are also enumerated, which the Chaldeans carried away. HIRTZIG has unjustly attacked ver. 19 as spurious, for it does not interrupt the connection, since evidently in vers. 18, 19 all the smaller vessels are to be enumerated, the larger ones having been mentioned in ver. 17. These latter could, of course, be only of brass, but the total amount of the brass plundered was so great that it seemed to merit the special emphasis given to it in ver. 20. The golden and silver vessels are not there mentioned, because it was only the brazen ones which were of such immense weight. The pots, sprinkling cups and spoons are mentioned a second time in ver. 19, simply because there were such utensils both of brass and of gold and silver. HIRTZIG'S opinion that all the golden and silver vessels had already been carried away at Jehoiachin's deportation, certainly finds some support in 2 Ki. xxiv. 13 ("all the vessels of gold"). From the circumstance, however, that only golden vessels are spoken of, we may conclude that the cream only was then removed, i. e. the most valuable. The golden vessels of low value as well as all the silver remained for the thorough evacuation made by Nebuzar-adan.—The words and twelve brazen bulls which were under are rightly wanting in 2 Ki. xxv. 16. For they contain a double error: 1. the twelve bulls were not under the bases, but under the sea, according to 1 Ki. vii. 25; 2 Ki. xvi. 17. 2. In 2 Ki. xvi. 17 it is expressly related that Ahaz had already taken away the twelve bulls and replaced them by a substructure of stone. Whither they went is not indeed stated, but no more is it recorded that they were restored to their original position. I therefore, in opposition to KEIL (Comm. on Kings), agree with those who regard the words in question as the arbitrary addition of some one, whose mind was not clear about the "bases," and who had forgotten the passage in 2 Ki. xvi. 17. [Comp. WORDSWORTH].

Vers. 21-23. And the pillars . . . a hundred. Supplementary and more particular description of the pillars.—And the pillars is wanting in 2 Ki. The height is also stated at eighteen cubits in 1 Ki. vii. 15. The description there given is in general the basis of this.—And a fillet, etc., to the end of the verse, is also wanting in 2 Ki.—If the pillars were twelve cubits in circumference, the diameter (comp. WINER, R.-W.-B. s. v. Jachin und Boas) was about four cubits, which gives a perfectly correct proportion. The thickness of the brass was four fingers. Thus the pillars were hollow, as indeed is remarked.—A chapter. This is the capital, coronamentum of the pillar. Comp. 1 Ki. vii. 16; 2 Chron. iv. 12, 13.—Instead of five cubits 2 Ki. xxv. 17 has three. The number five is the correct one according to 1 Ki. vii. 16.—Of one is unnecessary, but not incorrect, since of course it is understood not of a second capital, but the capital of the second pillar. It is evidently based on 1 Ki. vii. 16.—The pomegranates were also an ornamentation on the hem of the priest's ephod, or surplice (Ex. xxviii. 33, 34). A figure of it may be seen in THENIUS, Comm. on Kings, Taf. III. Fig. 2 bb.—Ver. 23 is entirely wanting in 2 Kings. Ninety-six pomegranates on each pillar were placed לְרֵיחַ, i. e. towards the wind, towards the four winds or sides [HENDERSON after HIRTZIG, towards the air, the outside of the capitals]. The expression is found here only. Comp. Ezek. xxxvii. 9. It is clear that this is the meaning from the statement that the entire number of the pomegranates attached to the network was a hundred. There must then have been also a pomegranate at each corner.

4. The Execution of the Representatives of the People and Statement of the Number of the Captives.

LII. 24-30.

- 24 And the captain of the guard [halberdiers] took Seraiah the chief priest, and 25 Zephaniah the second priest, and the three keepers of the door: He took also out of the city a eunuch [court officer], which had the charge [was¹ overseer] of the men of war; and seven men of them that were near the king's person, which were found in the city; and the principal scribe² of the host [the scribe, the prince of the host], who mustered the people of the land; and three-score men of the people
26 of the land, that were found in the midst of the city. So Nebuzar-adan the captain of the guard took them and brought them to the king of Babylon to Riblah.
27 And the king of Babylon smote them, and put them to death in Riblah in the land
28 of Hamath. Thus Judah was carried away captive out of his own land. This is the people whom Nebuchadrezzar carried away captive: in the seventh year three 29 thousand Jews and three and twenty: In the eighteenth year of Nebuchadrezzar he carried away captive from Jerusalem eight hundred and thirty and two per-30 sons: In the three and twentieth year of Nebuchadrezzar Nebuzar-adan the captain of the guard carried away captive of the Jews seven hundred forty and five persons: all the persons were four thousand and six hundred.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ Ver. 25.—In 2 Ki. xxv. we find וְהָיָה for וְהָיָה. The former does not necessarily, as HIRTZIG asserts, signify "which is." וְהָיָה takes the place of the copula generally, without reference to time. Comp. EWALD, § 297 b.

² Ver. 25.—וְהָיָה. In 2 Ki. xxv. וְהָיָה, which I regard as the more correct reading.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Vers. 24-27. And the captain . . . out of his own land. These verses differ from the corresponding verses in 2 Ki. xxv., with the exception of some trifling variations in language, only in the statement of a number (seven instead of five in ver. 25), of which hereafter. It is related that representatives of all classes of the people, priests, officials and simple citizens had to suffer death, evidently in token that Nebuchadnezzar held not only the king but the people guilty of rebellion. At the head of those executed stands the high-priest Seraiah, who is nowhere mentioned in the book of Jeremiah. According to 1 Chron. v. 40 he was the son of Azariah and grandson of Hilkiah; according to Ezr. vii. 1, Ezra was descended from him.—After Seraiah is mentioned Zephaniah, doubtless the same who is mentioned in xxi. 1; xxix. 25, 29; xxxvii. 3 as priest simply and son of Maaseiah. Here he is called the second priest, but in 2 Ki. xxv. second priest only without the article. As according to 2 Ki. xxiii. 4 (where as here three grades of priests are enumerated) there were several second priests, the reading of the Book of Kings is probably the correct one. Comp. OEHLER in HERZOG, R.-Enc. VI. S. 203, 4.—The keepers of the door [or threshold] are also mentioned in 2 Ki. xii. 10; xxii. 4; xxiii. 4; Jer. xxxv. 4. As only three of them are mentioned, we must regard these as the superiors of the four thousand Levitical שְׁמֵרֵי (1 Chron. xxiii. 5). For further details consult OEHLER in HERZ., R.-Enc. VIII. S. 354-6.—In the second category of those executed are mentioned certain inhabitants of Jerusalem, who held offices at court, especially in the war-department. The city here seems to stand in antithesis both to the temple (ver. 24) and to the country (ver. 25 b). The one שֹׁמֵר (court-officer, but possibly at the same time eunuch, comp. rems. on xxix. 2) was not the overseer, but only an overseer, etc. He was therefore one of the generals, perhaps commander of the city garrison.—And seven men. In 2 Ki. xxv. we read five men, whether correctly or incorrectly cannot here be decided as in vers. 12 and 22. The analogy of these cases however favors our text.—That were near the king's person, literally, "that saw the king's face," viz. in the sense of a daily custom, is a designation of high, yea, highest position (Esth. i. 14; comp. Matt. xviii. 10). These were therefore officials of high rank, and as it is not said that they were endued with military functions, they may be regarded as representatives of the civil authorities.—Scribe, the prince of the host. Scribe is not a writer in our sense. The title belongs not only, as GRAF supposes, to the "people of the pen," but is given to the highest officers of State. Comp. 2 Sam. viii. 7; xx. 25; 2 Ki. xii. 11; 1 Chr. xviii. 16; xxvii. 82. And in 2 Chr. xxvi. 11 it is expressly recorded that Uzziah's army went out "by the hand of Jeiel the scribe." This Sopher was not the leader of the host, but chief of the war-department, minister or secretary of war. Comp. SAALSCHÜTZ, Mos. Recht. S. 63.—And threescore men.

These sixty men appear as the third class of persons executed, and representatives of the country population, as is indicated by their number and the remark that they were found in the midst of the city (2 Kings xxv. 19 "in the city"). This remark would be altogether superfluous, if the object was not to set forth that these men did not originally belong to the city.—On Riblah comp. rems. on xxxix. 5.—The words, Thus Judah was carried away captive out of his land, are found in both texts and in both places are appropriate. For in Jeremiah they form the transition to the numbering of the deported, and in 2 Kings they lead to the account of what happened in the country after the deportation. They therefore furnish no data for the solution of the question which of the two recensions is the original. Moreover, there seems to be an allusion in them to i. 8.

Vers. 28-30. This is the people . . . four thousand and six hundred. This section is entirely wanting in 2 Kings. It is difficult to bring it into harmony with the other statements respecting the deportations. The differences are as follows: 1. This section speaks of three deportations, while according to the other testimonies of the Old Testament there were only two (under Jehoiaquim and Zedekiah). 2. The section follows a divergent chronology, stating that the deportations took place in the seventh, eighteenth and twenty-third years of Nebuchadnezzar, while this very chapter (ver. 12) and 2 Ki. xxiv. 12; xxv. 8 name the eighth and nineteenth years of Nebuchadnezzar as the dates of the deportation, but know nothing of any in the twenty-third year of this king. 3. According to this passage three thousand and twenty-three were carried away the first time, eight hundred and thirty-two the second time, seven hundred and forty-five the third time, total four thousand six hundred, which sum is expressly given at the close of ver. 30. According to 2 Ki. xxiv. 14-16, however, eighteen thousand souls were carried away at the first deportation alone. There are no counter-statements with regard to the other numbers, but their smallness is surprising; of this hereafter. On these points we make the following remarks: 1. By the seventh year in ver. 28, we are certainly to understand the seventh year of Nebuchadnezzar, since both the other deportations are dated in years of this monarch. 2. These statements are not necessarily erroneous, but may possibly follow another reckoning of the years, and perhaps the same as Josephus follows (Antiqq. X., 8, 6; C. Ap. I., 21), though evidently only on the basis of this passage. Comp. NIEBUHR, Ass. u. Bab., S. 58 sqq. 3. Ver. 29 mentioning the eighteenth year after ver. 12 has stated the nineteenth as the date of the same fact, shows that we have here another author. 4. The view of EWALD (Gesch. d. V. Isr., III., 1 S. 435) which GRAF also adopts, that in ver. 29 we are to read שָׁנָה עֶשְׂרִית, that accordingly one year before the last capture of Jerusalem three thousand and twenty-three were carried captive from the country (hence הָאָרֶץ), after the capture eight hundred and thirty-two from the city (hence מִירוּשָׁלַם, ver. 29), and finally five years later from the land already somewhat repopulated seven hundred and forty-five, has much in its favor, but is yet not perfectly satisfactory. For the circumstance that the difference between the eighth and nineteenth, and the seventh and eighteenth years of Nebuchadnezzar is the same, does not authorize us to supply a word עֶשְׂרֵה, fallen out after שָׁבַע. Then, too, the deportation of the mass of the people during the war, at a time when the Egyptian army was to be feared (comp. xxxvii. 5), is scarcely probable. Finally the assumption of a deportation five years after the capture of the city is pure hypothesis, for which there is no positive testimony. It is also not to be supposed that five years after the destruction, admitting the return of a few scattered individuals, an almost equally great number could be carried away as after the destruction of the capital. Would not these have rather again betaken themselves to flight? 5. Even if we grant that the strikingly small numbers of the exiles are to be judged from a specific point of view, and therefore do not necessarily imply an error, any more than the number of the years of Nebuchadnezzar's reign, yet the differences between vers. 12 and 28 still remain, with the exceedingly obscure third deportation, as irremovable stones of stumbling, and I therefore agree with NIEBUHR, when he says, "it cannot be a subject of doubt that vers. 28-30 in the fifty-second chapter of Jeremiah are a gloss."

5. The Favorable turn in the Fate of Jehoiachin.

LII. 81-84.

- 31 ¹ And it came to pass in the seven and thirtieth year of the captivity of Jehoiachin king of Judah, in the twelfth month, in the five and twentieth day of the month, that Evil-merodach king of Babylon, in the first year of his reign, lifted up
32 the head of Jehoiachin king of Judah, and brought him forth out of prison, and spake kindly unto him, and set his throne above the throne of the kings that were 33 with him in Babylon, and changed² his prison-garments: and he did continually 34 eat bread before him all the days of his life. And for his diet, there was a continual diet given him of the king of Babylon, every day a portion [the day's requirements] until the day of his death, all the days of his life.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

² Ver. 33.—שָׁנָה is the Hebrew, שָׁנָה (2 Ki. xxv.) the later Aramaic form. Comp. OLSH., § 233, Ann., and § 246, b. Ann.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

To this section there is an almost exactly corresponding one in 2 Ki. xxv. (27-30). The differences are unessential: instead of the twenty-fifth day, 2 Ki. xxv. 31 has the twenty-seventh (comp. ver. 25, where the reverse is the case), so that one is tempted to think that one of the two authors has interchanged these two passages; (comp. also rems. on ver. 12). For other differences comp. the TEXTUAL NOTES.—The expression to lift up the head, is found also in Gen. xl. 13 coll. 19 and 20, and designates the elevation of one who is prostrate. Comp. the expression in another sense in Ex. xxx. 12; Num. i. 2, etc.; Ps. lxxxiii. 3.—In the first year of his reign. It was evidently an act of grace, which Evil-merodach performed on the occasion of his ascending the throne. May not the influence of

Daniel and other highly esteemed Jews at the Babylonian court have operated in favor of the imprisoned king?—Out of prison. Comp. rems. on xxxvii. 4.—Above the throne. This expression does not mean that Jehoiachin received a seat on the same level, but surpassing the others in height, but that his seat stood higher up than the others, i. e., that he could sit nearer to the king. Whether the others were princes constantly or transiently present, may be left undecided. Perhaps both.—His diet, אֲרָחָה (comp. xl. 5), evidently comprehends all that Jehoiachin needed for himself and household, besides the food which he had at the royal table. The accumulation of expressions, indicating that Jehoiachin continued without interruption to the end of his life to enjoy royal honors, shows that this fact gave great satisfaction to the author.—On the chronological relations, comp. NIEBUHR, Ass. u. Babel., S. 87 sqq.; DUNCKER, Gesch. d. Alterth., I., S. 864, 5.

—The ascension of the throne by Evil-merodach occurred in the year B. C., 561. It is not absolutely impossible that Jeremiah was still alive at this time. Supposing that he began his ministry at the age of twenty, he would be then about eighty-six. Comp. the dates in xxiii. 3, and lli. 31. It is also not impossible that he received in Egypt the news of Jehoiachin's exaltation. But this notice includes not only the liberation of the ex-king, but his death (vers. 83, 84). Thus vanishes all probability of Jeremiah's being its author, as well as from the consideration that the notice, if proceeding from Jeremiah, must have been found in another place, and not at the close of this supplement, evidently compiled by a later hand.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. "Docemur hoc capite, quod comminationes divinæ non sint de pelvi fulgura, quodque Deus pro misericordia sua infinita calamitates a se immittas mitigare plerumque solet, si seria interveniat præsentia." FÖRSTER.

2. On vers. 1-3. "From this we see why God sometimes places ungodly rulers over a country, who cast it to destruction. It is done on account of the rulers' and the people's sins, that they may draw down the well merited punishment, as Sirach says. On account of violence, injustice and avarice, a kingdom passes from one nation to another (x. 8). So also says king Solomon. Because of the sins of a nation occur many changes of rulers, but for the sake of the people who are intelligent and reasonable, the State is prolonged (Prov. xxviii. 2)." Wurtemb. Summarien.

3. On ver. 4. "God allows many slight and mild punishments to come as warnings, till at last comes the finishing stroke. This is a witness to the divine long-suffering (Rom. ii. 4)." CRAMER.

4. On ver. 6. "The fact that in this siege compassionate women had to kill and eat their own children (Lam. iv. 10) is a reminder that by bodily hunger God would punish; 1. satiation and disgust towards His holy word and soul-food; 2. the terrible offering up of children to Moloch; 3. the loose discipline of children." CRAMER.

5. On ver. 7. "No fortress can protect the ungodly, even though they had their nest in the clouds." CRAMER.

6. On ver. 8. "An example of faithless, perjured men of war. But as Zedekiah broke his oath to the king at Babylon, he was paid back in the same coin." CRAMER. "His people forsook the poor king Zedekiah on his flight and he was captured, from which we see that great men cannot depend on their body-guard; these flee in time of need, and leave their masters in the lurch. The surest and best protection is when we have the holy angels for our guard . . . This angelic protection is, however, to be obtained and preserved by faith and godliness, but is lost by unbelief and ungodly conduct." Wurtemb. Summ.

7. On vers. 9-11. The punishment of perjury. "Ubi monemur, quod fides hosti, etiam barbaro, qualis hodie Turca, a Christianis data, minime violanda." FÖRSTER.

8. On ver. 9. sqq. "God had shown Zedekiah by Jeremiah a way in which he could escape the calamity. But because he forsook the Lord and would not follow it, the others were only leaky cisterns (Jer. ii. 18). For woe to the rebellious who take counsel without the Lord (Isa. xxx. 1). This is useful for an instance against the holy by works, who reject God's way of escaping the Devil; when they devise other ways for themselves they are caught by the Chaldeans of hell." CRAMER.

9. On ver. 12 sqq. "Holy places, external ceremonies and opus operatum do not avail for hypocrites . . . If God punished His own institution so severely, how shall human institutions remain unpunished?" CRAMER.

10. On ver. 12. "Quale fatum, ne et nostris obtingat templis . . . caveamus, ne profanemus templa ulterius tum externa vel materialia, tum interna vel spiritualia in cordibus nostris, de quibus 1 Cor. iii. 16 sqq.; vi. 19 sqq." FÖRSTER.

11. On ver. 15. "It is another work of mercy that some of Judah were preserved. For God's grace is always to be found in His punishments." CRAMER.

12. On ver. 15. "He who will not serve God and his neighbor at home and in quiet, must learn to do it in a strange land in affliction and distress." CRAMER.

13. On ver. 24 sqq. "As teachers are often to blame for their behaviour that sin gets the upper hand in a community, it is exceedingly just when God brings such for an example into great punitive judgment (1 Sam. ii. 27-34)." STARKE.

14. On ver. 24. "The priests are caught and slain; 1. because they could not believe the truth for themselves; 2. because they led others astray; 3. because they appealed to the temple of the Lord; 4. because they persecuted the true prophets; 5. because they troubled the whole church of God. But he who troubleth shall bear his judgment, whosoever he be (Gal. v. 10)." CRAMER.

15. On ver. 81 sqq. "Sane omnino verisimile videtur judicio Philippi Melancthonis in Chron. part. I fol. 83 Evilmerodachum amplezum esse doctrinam Danielis de Vero Deo, quam et pater publico edicto professus est, eamque ob causam clementiam exercuisse erga regem Jechoniam." FÖRSTER. — "Narrant Hebræi hujusmodi fabulam: Evilmerodach, qui patre suo Nabuchodonosor vivente per septem annos inter bestias, ante regnaverat, postquam ille restitutus in regno est, usque ad mortem patris cum Joakim rege Judæ in vinculis fuit; quo mortuo, quum rursus in regnum succederet, et non suscipiatur a principibus, qui metuebant, ne viveret qui dicebatur extinctus, ut fidem patris mortui faceret, aperuit sepulcrum et cadaver ejus unco et funibus traxit." JEROME on Jer. xiv. 18, 19. JOSEPHUS speaks of it as follows: "Ἀβιλαμαράδαχος εὐθὺς τὸν Ἰεχωνίαν τὸν δευρὸν ἀπέειν ἐν τοῖς ἀναγκαστοῖς φίλοις εἶχε . . . Ὁ γὰρ πατὴρ αὐτοῦ τὴν πίστιν οὐκ ἐφύλαξε τῷ Ἰεχωνίᾳ, παραδόντι μετὰ γυναικῶν καὶ τέκνων καὶ τῆς συγγενείας ὅλης ἐκονοίης ἑαυτὸν ὑπὲρ τῆς πατρίδος, ὥς ἂν μὴ κατασκάφειν ληθθεῖσα τῇ πολιορκίᾳ." (Antiqq., X. 11, 21.)

16. On ver. 81 sqq. "Ceterum potest hoc exemplo, quod Jechonias rex dignitati suæ in exilio Babylonico restitutus, refutari exceptio Judæorum contra vaticinium Jacobi (Gen. xlix. 10) de Messia jamdudum exhibito, postquam per Romanos sceptrum de Juda ablatum, id quod τεκμήριον Messiae jamjam nascituri esse debuit." FÖRSTER.

17. On ver. 31 sqq. "No one should despair in misfortune, for the right hand of the Highest can change all (Ps. lxxvii. 10) and Christ rules even in the midst of His enemies (Ps. cx. 2). For His are the praise, the glory and the power from everlasting to everlasting. Amen." CRAMER.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

1. On vers. 1-11. The truth of the word "What a man soweth, that shall he also reap," exhibited in the example of the Jewish State under Zedekiah.

1. The seed (ver. 2); 2. The crop (a) the siege, (b) the famine, (c) the capture of the city and flight of the king, (d) the punishment of the king and his princes, (e) the fate of the people (ver. 8).

2. On vers. 12-20. The rejection of Judah appears at first sight a contradiction. For Jerusalem is the holy city (Matt. iv. 5; Neh. xi. 1, 18), the city of God (Ps. xlv. 5; xlviii. 2, 9; lxxviii. 8); the temple is the house of Jehovah (Jer. vii. 2, etc.); God's service rests on divine authority (Ex. chh. xxv.-xxvii., xxx., xxxi). But God cannot contradict Himself. We have, therefore, to show "the unity of the divine thoughts in the choice and rejection of Jerusalem." 1. The rejection was a conditional one (vii. 3 sqq). Hence notwithstanding the election the rejection involved nothing contradictory, but was a necessary consequence of the unfulfilled condition.—

2. The election remains (a) objectively notwithstanding the rejection; it is (b) subjectively brought to its realization by the rejection, the latter as a means of discipline operating to produce the disposition, from which alone the fulfilment of this condition can proceed. Comp. remark on xxxii. 41, p. 288.

3. On vers. 24-27. "That great lords sometimes make an example of gross miscreants, promotes righteousness, only it must not be done on the innocent, or with such severity that there is no proportion between the crime and its punishment (Josh. vii. 25)." STARKER.

4. On vers. 31-34. The deliverance of Jehoiachin. 1. It shows us that the Lord can help (a) out of great distress (grievous imprisonment of thirty-seven years), (b) in a glorious manner. 2. It admonishes us (a) to steadfast patience, (b) to believing hope, Ps. xiii. ["It was a prelude and pledge of the liberation and exaltation of the Jewish Nation, when it had been humbled and purified by the discipline of suffering; and of its return to its own land; and a joyful pre-announcement of that far more glorious future restoration which the prophets in the Old Testament, and the Apostles in the New foretell—of Israel to God in Christ; to whom, with the FATHER and HOLY GHOST, be ascribed all honor, glory, dominion, adoration and praise, now and forever. Amen." WORDSWORTH.—S. R. A.].

THE LAMENTATIONS OF JEREMIAH.

INTRODUCTION.

§ 1. NAME, PLACE IN CANON, LITURGICAL USE.

1. In Hebrew MSS. and editions this book is called הַנְּחִיָּה, i. e., How! from the first word in it (as Proverbs and the Books of the Pentateuch are designated by their initial words), which word also begins chs. ii. and iv., and thus appears to be a characteristic of the Book.* The Rabbins called it קִנְיָה, i. e., nenia, dirges, elegia, elegies, lamentations. קִנְיָה is found in the Old Testament in 2 Sam. i. 17; Amos v. 1; viii. 10; Jer. vii. 29; ix. 19; Ezek. ii. 10; xix. 1, 14; xxvi. 17; xxvii. 2. 32; xxviii. 12; xxxii. 2, 16; 2 Chron. xxxv. 25. In Ezek. ii. 10 the plural form קִנְיָה is used, and in 2 Chron. xxxv. 25 קִנְיָה. The Septuagint always translates this word θρήνος, θρήνοι, whence are derived the Latin names Threni, Lamentationes, Lamenta.†

2. Since Josephus, con. Apion, I. 8, states the number of the books of Holy Scripture as twenty-two, and divides them into three classes, the first consisting of the Pentateuch, the second of thirteen prophetic books, and the third of four books which contained ὑμνους εἰς τὸν θεὸν καὶ τοῖς ἀνθρώποις ὑποθήκας τοῦ βίου ["hymns to God and precepts for the conduct of human life"], it is evident that he included the Lamentations, not in the כְּתוּבִים [Hagiographa], but in the prophetic Scriptures, and hence that he appended it to the Prophecies of Jeremiah. The same classification and estimated number of these books are found in the canon of Melito (EUSEB., Eccl. Hist., IV. 26), where the Lamentations are not expressly named, but are evidently reckoned with the Prophetic Books, as they are in the Treatise of Origen on the oldest canon (EUSEB., Hist. Eccl., VI. 25), where it is said Ἱερεμίας σὺν θρήνοις καὶ τῇ ἐπιστολῇ ἐν ἐνὶ Ἱερεμῶν,—so also HILARIUS PICTAV. (Prolog. to the Psalms), RUFINUS (Expos. Symboli Apostol.), the Council of Laodicea, can. 60 (see HERZ. R.-Enc., VIII., p. 199) EPIPHAN., De mens. et pond. cap. 22, 23 (Opp. II., 180, ed. Petav.), the canons of the African Synods of 393 (Can. 36, Mansi III. 924) and 397 (Can. 47, Mansi III. 891), AUGUSTINE (De doct. Christ., II. 8) and by JEROME in the Prolog. Galeat., where likewise the Lamentations are not mentioned, but are evidently appended to the Prophetic Book, for after the enumeration of the twenty-two books he says, "Some would include Ruth and Lamentations in the Hagiographa, and by adding these compute the whole number of books as twenty-four, etc."—Another method of enumeration and classification was gradually adopted by the Jews, the first trace of which we find in Vol. 4 of BEN EZRA, 4, 44, where the ninety-four (this, without doubt, is the correct reading) sacred books are divided into two classes of seventy and twenty-four books. The twenty-four books, manifestly, are the canonical ones. The Talmud also, in the Treatise Baba Bathra Fol., 14 b. enumerates twenty four books, probably in accordance with the number of letters of the Greek alphabet, which was made to correspond with the Hebrew alphabet by adding to the latter the double yod, ם, that was used to express with reverence the name of Jehovah. The Talmud now reckons the Lamentations among the Hagiographa, which it arranges in the following order, Ruth, Psalms, Job, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, Solomon's Song, Lamentations, Daniel, Esther, Ezra (with Nehemiah), Chronicles. The Masorites introduced a third modification, arranging the Hagiographa thus,—Chronicles, Psalms, Job, Proverbs, Ruth, Canticles, Ecclesiastes, Lamentations, Esther, Daniel, Ezra. But only the Spanish manuscripts preserve this order. The German give the order thus,—Psalms, Proverbs, Job, Canticles, Ruth, Lamentations, Ecclesiastes, Esther, Daniel, Ezra, Nehemiah, Chronicles. This is the usual order in our Hebrew editions of the Bible.—In the Septuagint, the various recensions of which differ from each other, another principle of arrangement prevails. This depends generally on the distinction of the books into historical, poetical and prophetic, in which order they succeed each other. But Lamentations is added to the prophetic book of Jeremiah. The Latin versions follow the same order, both the Itala and Vulgate. The Council of Trent has sanctioned this arrangement, in Decr. I., Sessio IV., where the Lamentations, without being mentioned, are reckoned with the Prophetic Book of Jeremiah. Our Protestant Bibles assign the book to the same place.

* [The word is especially proper as indicating the subject and tone of its contents. GERLACH].

3. The Masoretic arrangement of the Hagiographa, in separating from the other books and placing together the five Megilloth [or festival rolls, which were appointed for rehearsal on certain feast and memorial days],—is purely conjectural. For not earlier than the Masorites do we find these five books placed together. The order of the German manuscripts is accommodated to the succession of holy-days. On this account the Song of Solomon comes first, because it was read at Easter; then follows Ruth (Whitsuntide); then the Lamentations. These were read on the ninth of Ab, on which day the Jews commemorated the destruction of both the first and second Temples. (See HERZOG, R.-Enc., VII. p. 254).—As the Israelites have appointed the Lamentations for that great mourning festival, it is also a rule with them that an Israelite, when mourning a death, read no other book than Job and Lamentations. (HERZ., R.-Enc., XVI. p. 364).—In the Romish Church, passages out of the Lamentations are read on the last three days of Holy-week. Three lessons are assigned to each one of the three days; the lessons are, on Maundy-Thursday, I. i. 1–5, II. i. 6–9, III. i. 10–14; on Good Friday, I. ii. 8–11, II. ii. 12–15, III. iii. 1–9; on Saturday, I. iii. 22–30, II. iv. 1–6, III. v. 1–11. Every lesson concludes, by way of response and versicle, with the words, Jerusalem, Jerusalem, convertere ad Dominum Deum tuum, turn to the Lord thy God. (See Officium hebdomadæ sanctæ, Separat-Abdruck aus Dr. REISCHL's Passionale. München, 1857. Die Charwoche in ihren Ceremonien und Gebeten, herausg. mit Gutheissung des bischöfl. Ordinariats, Speier, 1856. NEUMANN, Jeremias von Anatol. II., S. 486). With reference to the musical execution of the Lamentations in Holy-week at Rome, see Die Reisebriefe von FELIX MENDELSSOHN-BARTHOLDY, Leipzig, 1861, S. 166 ff. (Brief an Zeller in Berlin). In the Evangelical Church LUDEGUS and LOSSIUS have arranged passages of the Lamentations for Divine service during the solemnities of Holy-week, the former for the solemnities of the last three days, the latter only for the solemnity of the Sunday in Holy-week. And Nicolaus Selnecker has liturgically arranged the whole of the Lamentations in the German language (in his Kirchen-Gesänge, 1587), not for Holy-week, but for the festival of the Tenth Sunday after Trinity (the destruction of Jerusalem). Further on this subject, see SCHÖBERLEIN, Schatz des liturg. Chor-und-Gemeindegesanges, II., S. 444 ff.

§ 2. CONTENTS AND STRUCTURE.

1. The general subject of the Lamentations is the destruction of Judah and Jerusalem by the Chaldeans. That this book is a prophecy of the destruction of Jerusalem, as Tremellius and others have asserted (see FÖRSTER, Comm. in Thr., p. 5), is an utterly groundless opinion, which we mention only for curiosity's sake.* Similar Songs of lamentation, having for their subject

* [This assertion of utter groundlessness is rather strong. 2 Chron. xxxv. 25 and the declaration of Josephus (Ant. B. X., ch. v. § 1) afford some ground on which to rest the hypothesis, that these Lamentations are the elegy written on the death of Josiah, and that they assumed the form of a prophecy of the utter destruction of the city, which Josiah might have pre-

the death of individual persons, or political catastrophes, occur in the Old Testament. See the citations in § 1, 1. But no lamentation of equal length and so artistically constructed is now extant. The peculiar structure which is common to all these songs shows that they all have one general subject. In Song I., the poet himself is the first speaker, vers. 1-11 b, whilst he introduces to us Zion [Jerusalem] * as an ideal person. He pictures here the sad consequences of the destruction, whilst he indicates the causes of the same (ver. 8). In the second half of the chapter (vers. 11 c.—22) the personified Jerusalem herself speaks, portraying her misfortunes under manifold images, explaining their causes and praying for help and vengeance. In Song II., in the first part of it, the poet himself speaks, (a) ascribing the destruction to the agency of the Lord (vers. 1-9), (b) depicting the consequences of the destruction (vers. 10-12), (c) addressing the object of the destruction, namely, the personified Jerusalem, expressing his grief, his opinion as to the causes of the catastrophe, and exhorting her to prayer (vers. 13-19). To this exhortation Zion, here represented by the wall of Jerusalem [Zion], responds in a prayer breathing the deepest and acutest sorrow (vers. 20-22). In Song III., which evidently forms the climax of the whole, the poet introduces as speaking that man, who in those troublous times had suffered more than all others, and consequently had attained, as it were, to the very summit of the common calamity, for he had suffered not only from the enemy what was common to all, but also from his own people and associates, a thing unheard of save in this particular instance. This sufferer was the Prophet Jeremiah. He does not name him, it is true, and it is evident that he has in his eye, not the person of the prophet merely, but rather the servant of the Lord as a representative of the (Ἰσραὴλ πνευματικὸς) spiritual Israel, yet all the particular features of this Lamentation are borrowed from the history of that prophet (vers. 1-18). This section ends with a cry of despair (ver. 18). But immediately the poet lets a morning twilight, as it were, succeed this night of despair, (vers. 19-21), which through the utterances of united believing Israel soon expands into daylight, beaming with the most radiant consolation (vers. 22-38). In what follows successively, the evening twilight gathers, and then the poem sweeps back into such a night of grief and mourning, that Israel begins to confess his sins (vers. 39-42), but then gives vent to lamentations on account of those sins (vers. 43-47), until finally, in the last and third part, Jeremiah again takes up the word in order to weep out his grief over Zion's misery and sins, (those sins which were likewise the source of his own misfortunes), and to implore the Lord, in beseeching prayer, for protection and for righteous avengement upon his enemies (vers. 48-66). In Song IV., the poem loses more and more of its ideal character. In the beginning indeed we find an ideal and well sustained description of Israel, as if it were the nobility of the nations, and then, further, of the princes of Israel, as the noblest among the noble, and then, appearing in sharper relief by standing out on such a back-ground, a delineation of the sufferings endured by those nobles (vers. 1-11); but in the second half of the chapter the poem becomes more prosaic: the chief guilt is imputed to the prophets and the priests, whose well-deserved punishment is then portrayed in the gloomiest colors (vers. 12-16). Then follows a description, graphic in the highest degree in spite of its brevity, of the events occurring from the extinction of the last gleams of the rays of hope kindled by the Egyptians, till the imprisonment of the king (vers. 17-20). The conclusion is a short address to Edom, which is ironically congratulated at the downfall of Jerusalem, while, at the same time, the punishment of its malicious joy is foretold (vers. 21, 22). In Song V., the style is almost entirely prosaic. For, with the exception of ver. 16 a, no poetical expression is found in the whole chapter, rather only a concrete graphic picture of the naked vented by a thorough reformation, but which his partial reformation delayed for a brief time, only to make it the more tremendous when it did come. Therefore, if we assume that the Lamentations are the elegy which Jeremiah wrote on the death of Josiah, and especially if we assume that Jeremiah foresaw the inefficiency of Josiah's policy (see STANLEY'S Jewish Church), it would not seem strange that an elegy, written by Jeremiah, the prophet of the destruction, should be a prophecy of the destruction of the city, which now, on account of Josiah's death, was hastening all the more rapidly to its fearful conclusion. Nor is it in itself incredible, that the future should be presented in vision to God's prophet as distinctly as a picture of the historic past. While we accept Isaiah xl.-lxvi. as the production of the prophet who wrote the earlier portions of that book, we would speak only with respect of the opinion of those who see in the Lamentations a descriptive prediction of what was to come to pass, while we reject the opinion itself as, on the whole, untenable.—W. H. H.]

reality. The alphabetical acrostic is entirely wanting in this chapter. The whole chapter is intended as a prayer; for it begins and ends with words of petition (vers. 1, 19-22). What lies between is only a narration of the principal afflictions, which had befallen those who had been carried to Babylon and those who had fled to exile in Egypt (vers. 2-18). The concluding prayer expresses the hope that the Lord, who cannot Himself change, nor altogether reject His people, will bring them back again to Himself and to their ancient splendor (vers. 19-22).

2. As regards its external structure, the composition of this book, both as a whole and in its several parts, is so artistic, that anything like it can hardly be found in any other book of Holy Scripture. First of all it is significant, that there are five Songs. For the uneven number has this advantage, that the middle part of the whole Poem is represented by a whole number, and does not fall between two numbers, as it would in case there were an even number of songs [i. e., the middle part of the whole poem is represented by one Song, and is not composed of parts of two songs]. By this means the prominence of the middle Song and, in connection with that, an ascent and a descent, a crescendo and decrescendo movement, with a clearly marked climax, is made possible. Thus it is manifest that the third chapter constitutes the climax. And this is truly and really so in two respects, both as to matter and form. As to the first, we have already shown that the first two chapters bear an ideal and highly poetical character. They constitute only the front-steps to the third chapter, which, externally, as the middle of the five songs and by its internal character, conducts us into the very middle of the night into which Israel sank, and then of the day which rose over Israel. For are not the frightful sorrows which the Prophet Jeremiah, the servant of God and representative of the spiritual Israel, had endured, and which rose at last to that terrible exclamation—My strength and my hope is perished from Jehovah (iii. 18), the expressions of the highest outward and inward temptation which can befall a true servant of the Lord? Here it should be observed that in iii. 1-17, there is no reference to God except as the author of those sorrows which are represented, on that account, as Divine temptations; while the name of God is not even mentioned till at the end of ver. 18, where, as the last word, with startling vehemence, the name “ЈЕHOVAH” is pronounced. Here then we see the servant of the Lord, in the deepest night of his misery, on the brink of despair. But where exigency is greatest, help is nearest. The poet could lay up in his heart everything that he had against God, but he could not shut God Himself out of his heart. On the contrary it was proved, that after he had given the fullest expression to what he had in his heart against God, God Himself was deeply rooted therein. The night is succeeded by the dawn of morning, as represented in vers. 19-21. With ver. 22, breaks the full day. This ushers in with full effulgence the light of Heavenly consolation. Suffering now is seen to be the proof of God's love. In this love, that suffering finds its explanation, its limit, and its remedy. As the pyramid of Mont Blanc, seen at sunset from Chamouny, its summit gleaming with supernal splendors, whilst below, the mountain has already disappeared wrapped in deepest darkness (See GÖTTE's Letters from Switzerland, Nov. 4. 1779; Aug. 12, 1840), so, out of the profound night of despair and misery, this middle part of the third song and of the whole book towers upward, radiant with light. From this culmination point, the poet again sets out upon his downward track. Evening twilight follows the bright day (vers. 40-42) and passes into a night dark with misery (vers. 43-47). From the beginning of the section, so full of hope and encouragement (ver. 22), the poet speaks in the plural number, as if he would make it most emphatically apparent, that this was common property. He continues to speak in the plural number till after the beginning of the third and last part of the Song, when the night has begun again. Then once more (ver. 48), the poet speaks in the singular number. But he no longer speaks of those highest temptations, which were the subject of vers. 1-18, but of those inferior ones, which men inflict upon us. He treats of them also much more briefly; and from ver. 55 to the end of the chapter, finds relief in a prayer for help and avengement.—It is evident that this chapter consists of three parts. The first part includes vers. 1-21; the second, vers. 22-42; the third, vers. 43-66. The second part represents the culmination point of the whole book. It constitutes the point of separation between the crescendo and decrescendo movement. The latter continues in chapter fourth, in which the ideal and poetical sensibly subside, until at last in chapter fifth the style changes into plain prose.—With this artistic arrangement of the matter, the external form or structure corresponds. Every one of the five Songs has 22 verses, according to the number of letters in the Hebrew alphabet, only in the third Song every verse is divided into three members, hence it has 66 (masoretic) verses. The first four Songs are acrostics. In the first two Songs the verses consist of three distiches. It has been usual to recognize four distiches in i. 7 and ii. 9, but improperly: for there is no fixed measure for the length of each member of the distich; and there are, therefore, in the places referred to, only three distiches, some lines of which are composed of a greater number of syllables than the others have. The third chapter shows by its external dress that it is the middle and climax of the whole. The three distiches of each verse (corresponding to three Masoretic verses successively) begin with the same alphabetical letter. The middle part, namely iii. 19-42, is still further distinguished, as the dome crowning the whole building, as follows: (1). Every verse-triad constitutes a finished whole with respect to sense [is one complete sentence]. (2). In vers. 25-39, each distich begins with the same word, or with a similar word (see Intr. to chap. iii.). (3). While in vers. 1-18, the name of God is mentioned only once, and then with peculiar emphasis at the end of ver. 18, in vers. 19-42 we read the names of God repeatedly, and so arranged that in vers. 22, 24, 25, 26 we have יהוה in vers. 31, 36, 37 אֱלֹהֵי alternating with אֱלֹהֵי in vers. 35, 38, in ver. 40 again יהוה and at last in ver. 41 אֱלֹהֵי. Observe here, particularly, that אֱלֹהֵי occurs in the Lamentations only in the two places named above, and אֱלֹהֵי occurs only once, in the beginning of the decrecendo movement, ver. 58, whilst in chapter first it is used three times, vers. 14, 15 (twice), and in chapter second seven times, vers. 1, 2, 5, 7, 18, 19, 20. Chapter fourth is indeed an acrostic, but the decline of the poetical afflatus is indicated externally by the verses being composed of only two distiches. The solemn names of God אֱלֹהֵי and אֱלֹהֵי occur no more, on the other hand יהוה occurs three times, vers. 11, 16, 20. The fifth chapter indicates its relation to the four preceding ones only by the number of verses (22). The acrostic dress entirely disappears. The style has become prose. Yet the name of God יהוה is found three times in the words of prayer, vers. 1, 19, 21.

We have here only one other matter to remark upon, the question why in chapters ii., iii. and iv. פ is placed before ע. This is usually explained as a copyist's mistake. In fact some Codd. in KENNICOTT and DE ROSSI have these verses in their usual places. The Peschito also gives these verses in their proper alphabetical order. The Septuagint places the letters in their proper order in the margin, but leaves the verses themselves to follow each other in the order of the original. But this supposition of an error of transcriber is refuted, (1) by the fact that it is repeated three times, (2) by the impossibility of supposing that in chap. iii. three verses could have been transposed by mistake, (3) by the interruption of the sense which would result in chapters iii. and iv. [if the present order were changed]. If some Codd. and Versions have the letters in their right order, this is evidence of revision and correction. Others (as RIEGLER) explain this irregularity as merely arbitrary, others again (BERTHOLDT) as the result of forgetfulness on the part of the author. GROTIUS holds the singular opinion that the order in chapters ii., iii., iv. may be that of the Chaldaic alphabet, and therefore that Jeremiah in chap. i. "speaks as a Hebrew, in the following chapters as a subject of the Chaldeans." THENIUS would explain the alphabetical difference by a diversity of authors, but the unity of the plan, already proved above, and the unity of the language used, which will be proved in § 3 (to which also belongs the threefold אֱלֹהֵי at the beginning of chaps. ii., iii., iv.) contradict this most decidedly. EWALD is (even still in his Second Edition, p. 326) of the opinion that the ע in chapter i. "might have been transferred to its own place by later hands." But this would be a manifest interruption of the connection: for ver. 16 is directly connected in the closest manner with ver. 15 by עַל כֵּן therefore, [עַל-אֵלֶּה, for these things?], whilst ver. 18 [17?] begins a new thought. The liberty which the older poets especially allowed themselves in pursuing the alphabetical order (see Ps. ix., x., xxv., xxxvii., cxlv., and KEIL in HAEVERNICK'S Introduction to Old Testament, III., p. 50) are manifold [See BARNES' Introduction to Job, pp. 44, 45]. Whether they were influenced in this by a then prevailing diversity of method in respect to the succession of the letters, is not yet by any means sufficiently ascertained, but is nevertheless the most likely explanation of that liberty. See DELITZSCH on Ps. cxlv., p. 769.*

§ 3. AUTHOR AND TIME OF COMPOSITION.

1. That the Prophet Jeremiah was the author of this book, not only is an old tradition, but has been maintained by the majority of commentators up to the present time. Yet there is no canonical [Scriptural?] testimony for it. For neither in the later books of the Old Testament, nor in the New Testament, is Jeremiah ever named as the author of Lamentations. There is not in the above named parts of the Holy Scriptures a single quotation from the Lamentations. The passage in James i. 12, which is appealed to, has only a very general resemblance to Lam. iii. 26; and as regards Zech. i. 6, the expression יְהוָה הָיָה כַּאֲשֶׁר זָכַר [Jehovah hath done like as He purposed] is not specific enough, and if it is a quotation could refer to Jer. li. 12, as well as to Lam. ii. 17. But the Alexandrian translation has preceding i. 1, these words, Kai ἐγένετο μετὰ τὸ αἰχμαλωτισθῆναι τὸν Ἰσραὴλ καὶ Ἱερουσαλὴμ ἐρημωθῆναι, ἐκάθισεν Ἱερεμίας κλαίων καὶ ἐθρήνησε τὸν θρῆνον τούτων ἐπὶ Ἱερουσαλὴμ καὶ εἶπε. ["And it came to pass, after Israel had been carried away captive, and Jerusalem was become desolate, that Jeremiah sat weeping, and lamented with this lamentation over Jerusalem, and said."] The Vulgate also has these words, except that in place of the simple καὶ εἶπε [and he said], it has the words, et amaro animo suspirans et ejulans dixit ["and with a sorrowful mind, sighing and moaning, he said"] (DOUAY). The Arabic gives exactly the words of the Septuagint. The Targum Jonathan begins with the words, Dixit Jeremias propheta et sacerdos magnus [Jeremiah the prophet and chief priest (? יְרֵמְיָהוּ רַבֵּן) said]. Josephus in the Antiq. Jud. L., x. c. 5, § 1, after he has spoken of the death and burial of King Josiah, says, Ἱερεμίας δ' ὁ προφήτης ἐπικήδειον αὐτοῦ συνέταξε μέλος θρηνητικόν, ὃ καὶ μέχρι νῦν διαμένει ["and Jeremiah the prophet composed an elegy to lament him which is extant till this time also"] (WHISTON'S Josephus).† THENIUS is of the opinion that this asserts only the existence of the elegy on the death of Josiah composed by Jeremiah, and has no reference at all to the Lamentations. But I believe that THENIUS here is in error. For the words of Josephus cannot be translated the (solemn) elegy on Josiah, because in that case it must have been called τὸ ἐπικήδειον αὐτοῦ [the elegy on him]. We can only translate thus,—Jeremiah composed as an elegy on him a lamentation song, which is still extant. To call it τὸ ἐπικήδειον (the elegy) would imply that the poem then existing really belonged to the species "elegy," that is to say, it possessed all the peculiarities of such a poem and was manifestly the solemn [elegy] on the deceased king Josiah that the customs of the times demanded.‡ But the absence of the article marks the still

* GRELACH: Intr. pp. 9, 10: "The general remark 'that the Poet strictly confined himself to the external form, only so long as the thought accommodated itself to it without artificiality' (KEIL, Ex. l., S. 378; b. HAVERNICK, III. 58), does not suffice, . . . for the evident ease with which the Poet elsewhere manages the Form, [shows] that another arrangement of the alphabet would have had no difficulties for him. And how little the observations which NEUMANN (S. 490, 508) makes in the way of explanation, contain an explanation in reality, may be shown by his remark on li. 16, where he says, 'Let us only reflect on the difference between מֶלֶךְ mouth, and עַיִן eye, and we here at least comprehend the transposition, where the mouth is the exulting mouth of God's enemies, the eye—God's watchful eye over the life of His people.' That could only be the real meaning if the following עַיִן-verse treated of God's eye watching for the protection of His people; on the very contrary, it does treat of the execution of punishment. But in view of the unsuccessful results of the special and repeated attempts to throw light on the darkness of this anomaly, the author must close this part of his preliminary discussion with a non liquet."

† [The literal translation is, "Jeremiah the prophet composed an elegy on him, a lamentation song, which is extant now." The words "a lamentation song," so obviously superfluous, suggest the question, whether the words καὶ συνέταξε, or words of similar import, may not once have preceded μέλος θρηνητικόν, and been dropped out on a presumption of error by those who took for granted that all Jeremiah wrote still survived? This would suit what immediately follows, which consists of an account of Jeremiah's writings.—W. H. H.]

‡ [THENIUS: Josephus "only said, that Jeremiah had composed the (solemn) elegy [funeral-poem] on Josiah, and that this was still extant in his (Josephus') time; how and where, whether in writing or in the mouth of the people [by oral tradition] he does not say, and least of all does he say that he finds that particular dirge (the singular number should not be unobserved) in the תְּהִינָה [Book of Lamentations]; had he believed this, since he adhered almost exclusively to the version of the LXX., he would have surely added to διαμένει [is extant] the words ἐν τοῖς θρήνοις [in the Lamentations]." The strongest point in this argument is, not the interpolation of the definite article, to which Dr. NAGELSBACH justly takes exception, but the fact that Josephus not only fails to say that this dirge is extant in the Book of Lamentations, but speaks of it only in the singular number as "a song of lamentation" (μέλος θρηνητικόν). We can account for this only, by supposing that he regarded the five songs as essentially one, and that having already characterized it as a lamentation song, he could extant μέλος θρηνητικὸν [song of lamentation] as not necessarily belonging to the species "elegy," but only as a μέλος [song] which had served as an elegy. This admirably suits the Lamentations, which indeed contain not a single syllable referring to a dead king. Add to this, that Josephus in the same chapter, after he had related the death and burial of Josiah, seizes the opportunity to give a short notice of the prophets Jeremiah and Ezekiel, and of their writings. For after the words quoted, he proceeds thus, "This prophet also predicted, and left [those predictions] in writing, the calamity that was coming upon the city, and truly as well that destruction which has in our days come upon us, as the Babylonish captivity. But not only he foretold such things, but the prophet Ezekiel, who first wrote and left behind him two books concerning these things." However we understand the somewhat obscure words concerning the writings of Ezekiel, this much at least is evident, that Josephus intends to give here a brief notice of the writings of the prophets Jeremiah and Ezekiel. And so he says, Jeremiah has left behind him two writings, a lamentation song and prophecies, Ezekiel has likewise left behind him prophecies, and truly in two books. THENIUS says, if Josephus had meant our Lamentations by that μέλος θρηνητικὸν [lamentation song], then he would have written ἐν τοῖς θρήνοις [in the Lamentations]. But I maintain on the contrary, that if Josephus meant the θρήνοι [Lamentations] by the μέλ. θρην. [lamentation song], the addition ἐν τοῖς θρήνοις [in the Lamentations] was not necessary [see note, p. 6.—W. H. H.], but if he intended to say what THENIUS makes him say, then he would have written οὐκ ἐν τοῖς θρήνοις [not in the Lamentations]. For since Josephus in this place speaks, not only of the elegy on Josiah's death, but likewise of the writings of Jeremiah generally, and since in his times our Lamentations were already regarded as a writing of Jeremiah's, as we know by the superscription of the Septuagint, he should, not to be entirely unintelligible, expressly declare that he did not mean by this μέλος θρηνητικὸν [lamentation song] which Jeremiah had composed on the death of Josiah, the θρήνοι [Book of Lamentations]. Since he has not done this, every one who knows that there are two writings in the canon which are referred back to Jeremiah as their author, must understand the words of Josephus as intended to designate those two writings extant in the canon. According to this, therefore, Josephus regarded Jeremiah as the author of the Lamentations, in which he, as Jerome did (Comment., Zech. vii. 11), recognized the elegy on Josiah mentioned in 2 Chron. xxxv. 25. Among the moderns, USHER, J. D. MICHAELIS (on LOWTH de sacr. poes. Hebr. Not. 97, pp. 445 sqq.), and DATHE (prophetæ maj., ed. 1) shared this opinion, but both the latter receded from it (see N. Or. Bibl. I., 106, and DATHE proph. maj., ed. 2). The Talmud also regards Jeremiah as the author of Lamentations (Baba batr., Fol. 15, Col. 1), Jeremias scripsit librum suum et librum regum et threnos [Jeremiah wrote his own book and the book of Kings and the Lamentations]. This is the opinion also of the church fathers, all of them, (see ORIGEN in EUSEB. hist. eccl., iv. 25, JEROME in PROLOG. galeat., and on Zech. xii. 11) and of later theologians. The learned and whimsical HERMAN VON DER HAARDT, in a Programme in which he announced a commentary on Lamentations (Helmstädt, 1712), was the first to deny the authorship of Jeremiah ascribing the book to Daniel, Shadrach, Meshach, Abednego, and the king Joachim, assuming that each one of them had written one chapter. Later, the unknown author of an Essay in the Tübingen Theol. Quart., 1819, Part 1,—afterwards, though only in the way of conjecture, AUGUSTI, in his Intr. to the Old Test. Scrip., p. 227,—and again CONZ in BENIGEL'S Archiv, IV. pp. 161, 162, 422 sqq.,—express themselves as against the authorship of Jeremiah. KALKAR also in his commentary (Hafnia, 1836) thinks it suspicious that the Book so long retained its place among the Hagiographa and that the Greek version of it differs so much from that of the prophetic book, although he will not allow that those circumstances are decisive, as in fact they are not. EWALD, who in the first edition of the Poetical Books of the Old Testament (1839, V. 1, pp. 139 ff.) in no way impugned the traditional opinion, has since (GESCH. Isr. IV. § 22 ff.; see JAHRB. für bibl. Wissenschaft, VII. § 151; Poet. Bücher, 2te. Aufl. I. 77. 2te. Häft., p. 321 ff.) expressed his opinion to this effect, that 'Jeremiah's authorship, with nothing to prove it, may be regarded as impossible on the ground of the language alone.' He believes that the not add that this Song was found (ἐν τοῖς θρήνοις) in the Songs of Lamentation, without seeming to specify one single Song of the five as separately and particularly intended. THENIUS in his quotation of Josephus omits the word θρηνητικὸν (16th ed., Leipzig, 1866, p. 116), and seems to have wholly overlooked it.—W. H. H.]

author was probably one of Jeremiah's disciples, "BARUCH or some other." BUNSEN also [before EWALD] ascribes the authorship to BARUCH (Gott in der Geschichte, I. S. 426). THENIUS announces the opinion in his commentary (10^{te}. Lief. des kurzgef. exeg. Hdb. z. A. T., 1855, § 3 der Vorbem., S. 117,) that chapters ii. and iv. are indeed by Jeremiah, but the other parts proceeded from other authors. He combats the argument drawn from tradition, and whilst he infers from the difference between the proſium of the Septuagint and that of the Vulgate, that there was a Hebrew original, he also infers from the absence of the same in the Hebrew Codd. that the Jews doubted its genuineness, and thus he accounts for the transposition of the Lamentations to the Ketubim [or Hagiographa]. He contends further, that the traditional opinion is not confirmed by the subject-matter, spirit-tone and language, or by the character of unity in the Book itself.* He finds it highly unlikely that Jeremiah should have treated of the same subject five times.† He says further, "It requires only a very ordinary degree of æsthetical sensibility to distinguish the difference between Odes ii., iv., which are really fine, unconstrainedly animated, methodical and natural in arrangement and succession of ideas, and remarkable for their simplicity, and the dissimilar and weaker Songs, i., iii., which, whatever excellence they have in other respects, are hampered with the external form, in many ways artificial, here and there heaping up images and confusing them together and losing themselves in reminiscences of the past." To this he adds, that i., iii., v., among other things, record circumstances in which Jeremiah had no part. Finally the fact, that in ii., iv., the verses beginning with ℣ precede those beginning with ℣ is only explicable by assuming a diversity of authors. Agreeably to these sentiments, THENIUS ascribed chapters ii., iv., to Jeremiah, as already remarked, but is of the opinion that chapter i. was composed "some time after the destruction of Jerusalem, by one who had remained in the land, and who at least was acquainted with chap. ii.;" and that chap. iii. was composed, also by one remaining in the land, shortly before the last deportation. He regards Song V., finally, as "the entirely disconnected poetry of a man there [in the land] who was probably a leader of a crowd of nobles, who having refused to join the expedition to Egypt, wandered about everywhere seeking a safer place of refuge."‡ These arguments of THENIUS have no matter-of-fact foundation, and cannot therefore be convincing.

As for me, formerly I was so convinced that Jeremiah was the author, as to declare this conviction in the article "Lamentations of Jeremiah," in HERZOG's Real Encyclopædia, and even in various places in my exposition of Jeremiah. But my conviction has been shaken on more accurate examination by the following matters of fact. 1. The tradition originates from the testimony of the Alexandrian translation. But on what does this testimony itself rest? We are compelled to ask this question, for the authority of that translation is by itself an entirely insufficient foundation. It is possible that the Alexandrian translator had predecessors in his opinion. But no evidence of that nature has come to us.§ It is further possible that he, or his

* [GERLACH: "The grounds of EWALD's opinions [as to the authorship] are only philological; but how venturesome it is to attempt to decide on such grounds alone, is shown by a comparison between THENIUS and EWALD; the former of whom, on philological grounds—those very grounds the perception of which may belong only to 'an æsthetical sensibility thoroughly practised'—imputes chapters i., iii., v. to another author than the author of chapters ii. and iv., which he leaves to Jeremiah; whilst EWALD, and truly in our opinion with entire correctness, remarks, that 'all these five songs, in the structure of their language, and in their rhetorical and poetical characteristics, as well as in thought and doctrine, and also in their historical allusions and descriptions, have a similarity so complete, that every competent judge will ascribe them to only one Poet.' (Bibl. Jahrb., VII. S. 151. Comp. Dichter d. A. B., 3d Aufl., S. 325 f.)."]

† [GERLACH: "Against the authorship of all five Songs by Jeremiah, THENIUS again raises a general objection in the question, whether it were probable that Jeremiah had treated one and the same subject five times. But if, according to his own declaration, the treatment of the same subject twice over has 'nothing strange in it considering the extraordinary character of the event lamented,'—then this objection to the five Songs appears all the more trivial when it is found on examination, that each Song treats of the common subject from a different point of view. * * * But this objection is entirely destroyed by the acknowledgment, arrived at from most different stand-points, of the 'internal, organic connection' (KNEI) of all five Songs, of which statement EWALD especially has made great use (Bibl. Jahrb., VII. S. 152; Gött. gel. Anz., 1863, S. 834 f.; Dichter des A. B., 3d Aufl., S. 323)."] GERLACH adds in a note, that with the proof of this "internal, organic connection" between the five Songs, the various attempts to assign the composition of the Songs to different times, or to bring them into different arrangements, must fall to the ground.—W. H. H.]

‡ [GERLACH, with reference to THENIUS' theory concerning Song V., says, "It is difficult seriously to discuss the possibility of such conjectures in order to prove them: THENIUS has not even attempted the proof and has thus spared those who come after him the trouble of refutation."]

§ [The evidence may not be satisfactory to Dr. NAGELSBACH, but he should not say so absolutely that there is "no evi-predecessors, or both, derived that opinion from the book itself. For it is easy to suppose that the prophet, who had himself lived to see Jerusalem's fall, should write upon it an appropriate dirge. This was more likely to be supposed since this prophet had formerly been acknowledged as a composer of 'dirges' (2 Chron. xxxv. 25). Moreover, how could a tearful song over Jerusalem's downfall fail to be expected from that prophet who had said, "Oh, that my head were waters, and mine eye a fountain of tears, that I might weep day and night for the slain of the daughter of my people!" (viii. 23). Add to this, that in chapter iii. the poet seems to identify himself with the prophet, and that the undeniably obvious and sympathetic harmony with the prophetic writings of Jeremiah seems to confirm that identity. The probability, therefore, that Jeremiah may have written a book of this description, cannot be denied. But how stands it with the evidence which the book itself, in ch. iii., seems to give in regard to its author, and how with the harmony in the way of thought and language? As for the internal evidence of ch. iii., in the first and third parts of that chapter the prophet Jeremiah certainly speaks. But the question occurs, whether he speaks as the author, or whether the author makes him speak? Either is in itself possible. For since the author in i. 11 makes the personified Zion speak, he may likewise in ch. iii. make the prophet Jeremiah, as the representative of the Ἰσραὴλ πνευματικός [the spiritual Israel], speak. But, on the other hand, since in ch. ii. the author is the speaker and there speaks of himself in vers. 11, 13, so in iii. 1-28, 48-66, the author may be the speaker, and according to the purport of the contents, he is speaking of himself. But here two things are to be taken into account. The first is this, that ch. iii. (see the exposition) constitutes the middle and climax of the whole book. Here the artistic construction reaches its highest pinnacle, and the prophet speaking in the first and last of the three parts, forms with his mournful lamentations the background for the bright and consolatory section contained in vers. 22-42. Is it now likely that Jeremiah would thus have made his own person the middle-point of the poem and would have done this with so much art? To me this seems not likely, even though it is assumed that the prophet speaks here in the name of the whole Jehovah-faithful Israel. Jeremiah, who was so modest and humble, would at the most have let his personal sufferings appear, if at all, only as an element or constituent part of the suffering which the faithful Israel had to suffer in common. But it does not seem like him thus to place his own person in the foreground as he does in that section which begins with "I am the man," iii. 1. In regard to the artistic construction, I have already in the Introduction to his Prophecies (§ 3), confessed that Jeremiah's style is not deficient in art. See for example his second discourse, chs. iii.-vi. But this refinement of art, this acrostic, this adroit periodic versification, these ingenious transitions in iii. 19-21, 39-42, this crescendo and decrescendo movement resting upon dence." The bare fact of the existence of the words referred to in the Septuagint, a translation on the whole so faithful, and made by Jews who almost superstitiously venerated the written word and scrupulously adhered to Hebrew originals, is some evidence, constituting a probability at least, that the Septuagint copied these words from Hebrew MSS. Then again the grammatical structure of the sentence suits the assumption that it is a translation of a Hebrew original. The general agreement of the Vulgate with the Septuagint and yet the difference between the two, would indicate that the Vulgate is not a mere copy of the Septuagint, but obtained the words from an independent source. Even THENIUS is satisfied with the evidence that these words must have had a Hebrew original, and feels it incumbent upon him to explain why they are not found in our existing Hebrew Bibles. GERLACH: "Whether the Vulgate derived that introduction from the LXX., the [additional] words being added or having fallen out of the text of the LXX. [since the Vulgate was written], or whether both, independently of each other, reproduced a note found in their manuscripts, is of no importance, since the grammatical construction of the words in either case refers to a Hebrew original, which preceded both. In this, to be presumed Hebrew original, we have to recognize the oldest tradition concerning the author. But that this [superscription] was not accepted by the editors of our received text, cannot be explained with THENIUS by the assumption, 'that it was not regarded as satisfactory, that those editors were doubtful at least whether Jeremiah had composed the first song,—for that immediately follows after καὶ εἶπε [and he said].' Since this superscription could have no other object than to connect the Lamentations with a preceding writing (see the καὶ ἐγένετο κ. τ. λ. [and it came to pass, etc.]), and that writing could only be the prophecies of Jeremiah, after which a part of the Jews placed them, then the absence of the superscription in those manuscripts which place the Lamentations among the Hagiographa, is self-explained and nothing less than proper."—W. H. H.]

* [Had he done so he would have violated no rule of good taste or propriety. He could, moreover, without charge or egotism, direct attention to himself, because he was the prophet of Jehovah and the representative of pious Israel and in his sufferings a representative of the Prophet of all prophets and the Head of Israel. But, in fact, there is not a word in his sufferings a representative of the Prophet of all prophets and the Head of Israel. But, in fact, there is not a word in the whole chapter, that any good man might not have written of himself without a breach of humility, and in "the brightly-shining comfort-section" (vers. 22-42) Jeremiah hardly alludes to himself at all. That part is not in the first person, but in the third person, and is not personal to the prophet, but passes beautifully and modestly into general truths of universal application.—W. H. H.]

the five-fold division of the whole poem—truly all this seems not like Jeremiah. In his writings nothing similar to this is found.* Would any one ascribe the most perfect product, in regard to the external artistic structure, of the Old Testament Scriptures, to that same prophet whose style is elsewhere characterized as sermo incultus et pæne subrusticus, if indeed one pauses to recognize his style at all, and does not rather direct his attention to those rerum celestium mysteria which are concealed under the sacramentis literarum? Nevertheless, I freely grant that neither the psychological, nor the rhetorical argument can, by itself alone, claim to be decisive.

But another argument must be added to these, namely, Secondly, The prevailing character of the language in the Lamentations. This differs very considerably from that of the prophetic book. Although the author of Lamentations has much in common with that prophet, not only in general as a Hebrew writer, but also in particular by a designed reference to the writings of Jeremiah, yet on the other hand, he has so much that is peculiar to himself, and so much that Jeremiah has not at all, or has only in a different form, that it is difficult to believe in the identity of the two. I have spared myself no trouble to compare every word of the Lamentations (with the exception of such as are constantly recurring, as אֵשׁ הָיָה, etc., without which Hebrew cannot be written) with the writings of Jeremiah. I have availed myself for this purpose of the Concordance of FUEST, and have found the same correct and to be depended upon, with the exception of what is given in respect to the word אֲרָנִי. The following is the result of this painfully laborious comparison, wherein I refer in every instance for authentication to the exposition of the passages in which the words occur.

[NOTE.—The bearing of the argument to be derived from the verbal differences, between the Prophecies of Jeremiah and the Book of Lamentations, is critically examined in the Appendix to this Introduction. The writer of this note, unwilling to insert his dissent from the very learned and conscientious author of this Introduction in the text of these pages, and unable to condense the reasons for his dissent in notes at the bottom of the pages, would here refer the reader to the Appendix, for a general summary of arguments in confirmation of the opinion that Jeremiah was the author of the Lamentations.—W. CHAPTER I. Ver. 1. The phrases עַם בְּנוֹתֵינוּ and רַבְּתֵינוּ occur only here. The singular שָׂרָה as an appellative, only here. כְּרִינָה is not foreign to Jeremiah's times, but is never used by him. הָיָה לָכֵס, never in Jeremiah.—Ver. 2. לְחִי never in Jeremiah. אֶן כִּנְחָם, only in this chapter, vers. 2, 9, 16, 17, 21, and in Eccles. iv. 1 (although the Piel of the verb נָחַם occurs in Jer. xvi. 7; xxxi. 13).—Ver. 3. עָנִי five times in Lamentations. Jeremiah uses neither it nor the root עָנָה. See iii. 33: v. 11. For מִרְבַּב Jeremiah says רַב or עָלָה. עֲנָה, (Jeremiah says כְּנִיחָה), כְּעָרִים, never in Jeremiah.—Ver. 4. אָכַל never in Jeremiah. כּוֹיָגֵר, which occurs in Lamentations six times, and always in the sense of a time or place of a festival, is found twice in Jeremiah, but both times in the general sense of tempus fixum. The expressions פִּי שׁוֹנֵם (see vers. 13, 16; iii. 11), the termination יָן, the verbs אָנַח (see vers. 8, 11) and נָגַה (four times in Lamentations) never in Jeremiah.—Ver. 5. הִלַּךְ שָׁבוּ is peculiar to this place. The sing. צַר, which occurs five times in Lamentations, is never in Jeremiah. He uses only the plural.—Ver. 6. נָצַח בֵּן for forsaken only here. אֵיל הָדָר (masc.), כִּרְעָה (Jeremiah always כִּרְעִית) never with Jeremiah. יָרַךְ Jeremiah uses only with suffixes.—Ver. 7. כְּרוֹדִים only here, iii. 19, and Is. lviii. 7. בְּחֹכֶד (see vers. 10, 11; ii. 4) never in Jeremiah. He uses

* [Shall we doubt whether Shakspeare wrote Tarquin and Lucrece, and Venus and Adonis, because in all his plays there is nothing similar to the very artificial construction of these Spenserian poems? Can we expect the same style, the manifestations of precisely the same qualities of genius in a formal stately poem, like those mentioned, and in the free unembarrassed composition of the stage play? Shall we expect to find no new traits of genius and evidences of versatility of talent, when the orator-prophet, who has electrified Israel by his impromptu bursts of eloquence, called forth by passing events and pressing emergencies, sits down to the careful composition of a lyrical dirge, to be constructed in accordance with pre-determined artistic rules? It is possible that one might read Tarquin and Lucrece, and say that its author was incapable of writing Shakspeare's plays. Another might read the prophecies of Jeremiah and say, their author was incapable of producing the Lamentations. Both would be mistaken.—W. H. H.]

only חֲכָדָה $\dot{a}\pi. \lambda\epsilon\gamma$.—Ver. 8. חָטָא (see iii. 39) never in Jeremiah. He uses only חָטָאָה. נִיחָה (only here), חָטָאָה never in Jeremiah. אָחֹר (see ver. 13) occurs in Jeremiah only with הָלַךְ or נָכַח.—Ver. 9. טָכָאָה, טָכָאָה never in Jeremiah.—Ver. 10. כִּחְכָד never in Jeremiah (see ver. 7).—Ver. 11. אָנַח (see ver. 4), כִּחְכָד (see ver. 7), אָכַל, הָשִׁיב נַפְשׁ, נָכַח (see ver. 12; iii. 63; iv. 16; v. 1), never in Jeremiah.—Ver. 12. עֲבָרִי דֶרֶךְ (see ii. 15), יוֹם חֲרוֹן אַפִּי (Is. xiii. 13) never in Jeremiah. See ii. 1. עוֹלֵל (see ver. 22; ii. 20; iii. 51) Jeremiah uses only once in the sense of racemari. Once also in Hithp. xxxviii. 19.—Ver. 13. דָּוָה, רָשָׁת (see v. 17) never in Jer.—Ver. 14. אָנַח $\dot{a}\pi. \lambda\epsilon\gamma$. הִשְׁתַּחֲוֶה Hithp. only here. אֲרִנִּי in Jeremiah never alone, but always joined with יְהוָה; in Lamentations fourteen times, and always alone.—Ver. 15. כָּנַח, קָרָא מוֹעֵד, קָרָא נָתַל never in Jeremiah. דֶּרֶךְ נָתַל only here.—Ver. 16. בִּכְיָה only here. כָּנַח, see ver. 2. כָּשִׁיב נַפְשִׁי, see ver. 11. שׁוֹמֵמִים, see ver. 4.—Ver. 17. אֵין כָּנַח, see ver. 2. נָדָה (see ver. 8) never in Jeremiah.—Ver. 18. מָרָה קָרָה never in Jeremiah.—Ver. 19. רָפָה, Piel, נָע never in Jeremiah.—Ver. 20. עָר, see ver. 5. חֲמָרִי (see ii. 11), נִהַפֵּךְ לִפְי never in Jeremiah.—Ver. 21. נָאָח, see ver. 4. כָּנַח, see ver. 2.—Ver. 22. בָּאָה רָעָה לִפְנֵי פִי never in Jeremiah.

CHAPTER II. Ver. 1. יוֹם אֵין הָרִים $\dot{a}\pi. \lambda\epsilon\gamma$. (see i. 12; ii. 21, 22) never in Jeremiah.—Ver. 2. בָּלַע, Piel, never in Jeremiah, in this chapter five times. Instead of לֹא חָמַל (see ver. 17) Jeremiah says לֹא נָחַם only here.—Ver. 3. Jeremiah uses only the Niphal of נָדָה. אָחֹר, הָשִׁיב אָחֹר, see i. 8. יָפִין, Jeremiah uses only once, and then not in a figurative sense. Jeremiah never says אָכַל כָּבִיב, he uses in this connection always אָהַל בַּת צִיּוֹן.—Ver. 4. נָצַח Niph. never in Jeremiah. כִּחְכָד, see i. 7, 10, 11. אָהַל בַּת צִיּוֹן only here.—Ver. 5. וּבָלַע, see ver. 2. תִּאֲנִיחָה, תִּאֲנִיחָה from Is. xxi. 2.—Ver. 6. מוֹעֵד, see i. 4. שָׁפָה Piel only here. שָׁפָה in Jeremiah only in the passage xvii. 21-27.—Ver. 7. זָנַח never in Jeremiah; in Lamentations three times, ii. 7; iii. 17, 31. אֲרִנִּי, see i. 14. נָאָר in no form in Jeremiah. הִכְנִיר, Hiph. never in Jeremiah, he once only uses the Pual (xiii. 19).—Ver. 8. בָּלַע, see ver. 2. Jeremiah does not use the Hiph. of אָכַל. חָל never in Jeremiah.—Ver. 10. עָפָר never in Jeremiah.—Ver. 11. דִּמְעוֹת never in Jeremiah; he uses only דִּמְעָה. חֲמָרִי, see i. 20. כָּבִיב, liver, never in Jeremiah. עֲטָף (three times in Lamentations and only in ch. ii, namely, vers. 11, 12, 19) never in Jeremiah.—Ver. 12. הִתְעַפֵּף, see ver. 11. Hithp. הִשְׁתַּפֵּף never in Jeremiah.—Ver. 13. רָפָה Piel, שָׁוָה and בַּת יְרוּשָׁלַם (the last in Lamentations again ver. 15) never in Jeremiah. Jeremiah never constructs רָפָה with לֹא.—Ver. 14. Jeremiah never uses the verb חָהַד alone, nor הָוָה שׁוּא. The latter is an expression occurring in Ezekiel. Also תִּמְלֵל, for which Jeremiah says תִּפְלָה (xxiii. 13).—Jeremiah never uses עָל with נָלָה (see again iv. 22). כִּשְׁאוֹת (chosen with reference to Jer. xxiii. 33-40) only here. Jeremiah uses שׁוּא only in the formula לְשׁוּאֵי (probably framed with reference to Jer. xxvii. 10, 15) is $\dot{a}\pi. \lambda\epsilon\gamma$.—Ver. 15. Jeremiah never says כָּפַץ בָּפִים, nor עֲבָרִי דֶרֶךְ (see i. 12), nor הִנֵּעַ רָאשׁ. For the last Jeremiah says הִנֵּיר בְּרָאשׁ. בַּת יְרוּשָׁלַם, see ver. 13. For נָהַפֵּךְ in this sense Jeremiah uses נָכַח, vi. 12.—Ver. 5. עָלָא, הִינֵחַ, Pual only here. נָדַךְ in the sense of driving, hunting, never in Jeremiah.—Ver. 7. כָּבַל never in Jeremiah.—Ver. 8. פָּרַק never in Jeremiah.—Ver. 9. חָרַב never in Jeremiah.—Ver. 10. נָלַעְפָה, הִנֵּחַ, כָּבַר, never in Jeremiah.—Ver. 11. עָנָה, see iii. 33.—Ver. 12. הָרָה, הָרָה, never in Jeremiah.—Ver. 13. נָחִיךְ, ἀπ. λεγ.—Ver. 14. נָנִיחָה, see iii. 14.—Ver. 17. רִיחַ, see i. 13.—Ver. 18. ש. relat., see ii. 15. הָלַק שְׁוֹעֵלִים Piel, never in Jeremiah, who always expresses these ideas in other words.—Ver. 19. לָרַר never in Jeremiah.—Ver. 20. אָרַךְ never in Jeremiah.—Ver. 21. חָרַשׁ never in Jeremiah.—Ver. 22. עָר־קָאֵר never in Jeremiah.

I will lay no stress on the ἀπας λεγόμενα, which are included for the sake of completeness in the above catalogue. But besides these, there remains so great a number of words, expressions and constructions foreign to the usual language of Jeremiah, that I know not how the conclusion can be escaped, that Jeremiah could not have written the Lamentations. Or how may it be explained, that Jeremiah never uses עָלָא never alone by itself, as a name of God, and yet that the latter occurs fourteen times in the Lamentations; that Jeremiah never uses הִבֵּשׁ never עָנָה or its root עָנָה, never שְׁוֹעֵלִים, never נָנִיחָה, נָחִיךְ, חָרַב, כָּבַר, נָלַעְפָה, נָשָׂא פָנִים, never לָמו, never the ש. relat., never בָּקָרְבַּ without a suffix, whilst all these expressions occur more or less frequently in the Lamentations? And, be it observed, these expressions are not of so specific a sort that their omission in the prophetic book, and their employment in the Lamentations, would be explicable from the nature of the subject treated of, but they belong for a great part, if I may say so, to the home-costume of the writer, which he always wears, of which he avails himself more or less unconsciously and undesignedly.

Thirdly. The words נָבִיאָךְ חָזוּ לָךְ שְׁמָא וְתַמָּי, ii. 14, are beyond doubt a quotation from Ezekiel xii. 24; xiii. 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 14, 15, 23; xxi. 28, 34; xxii. 28; for only in those places, and nowhere else in the Old Testament, does the phrase חָזוּ שְׁמָא in connection with תַּמָּל occur. The phrase כְּלִילַת יָפִי, ii. 15, is also decidedly Ezekiel's, for it is found only in Ezek. xxvii. 3; comp.

xxviii. 12, and nowhere else.* That the Lamentations may be the source from which Ezekiel obtained these phrases, no one can believe who has read Ezekiel in the places referred to with attention. For in those places (especially in chapter xliii.) everything is so peculiar and so impressed, in construction and expression,—as where he uses תָּפַל, —with the distinct individuality of Ezekiel, that a borrowing of the words is not to be thought of. I say the words, for that Ezekiel had in mind the substance of Jer. xxiii., cannot be doubted. If then in Lam. ii. 14, 15, we have quotations from Ezekiel, what is the inference with reference to the authorship of our Book by Jeremiah? In the prophetic book, even in the latest parts of it, we find no trace of the adoption of Ezekiel's phraseology.† If we detect this here, it must be conceded that Jeremiah might have received already some parts of Ezekiel's Book before the whole was finished. Were the Jeremiac origin of the Lamentations established in other respects, then perhaps we could allow this particular matter to pass without question. But since the differences in language strongly shake that traditional opinion, we are obliged to say that a quotation from Ezekiel in the Lamentations argues rather against the opinion that Jeremiah wrote the Lamentations, than for it. See further below, under 2d general head of this section.

We are therefore compelled to decide that the tradition which has the Septuagint for its first representative rests on no solid foundation, and is in opposition especially to the philological characteristics of the book. But who then did write the Lamentations? We can take it for granted that the author must have been an eye-witness of the incidents related in his book. For he speaks with such warmth of feeling, with such clear insight and accurate knowledge of the events he narrates, that it is evident that he does not speak of matters learned at a distance and through others, but of those of which he has a direct personal knowledge and experience. Especially the last two chapters, which have a more prosaic character exactly reflecting the things as they actually were, are copious in details which seem to us to be copied from life. In chapter fourth the author, alluding to the humiliating sufferings of the people, in order to heighten the effect, describes the Israelites generally as the nobility of the nations, and then especially singles out the nobility of Israel, and contrasts their former with their present condition. Since he thus extols the nobility of his people, with manifest predilection, yes, enthusiasm (see iv. 7, comp. i. 6, and remarks on those places), and since in this connection he says nothing at all of the culpability of those high in rank, which Jeremiah makes so eminently conspicuous (Jer. ii. 26; v. 5, 25-28; xxiii. 1, 2; xxxiv. 19; xxxvii.; xxxviii.; xlv. 17), but on the contrary, very decidedly blames the prophets and priests, as the causers of the misfortune (ii. 14; iv. 13-15), all this seems to indicate that our author belongs to the order of שָׂרִים [the princes, or nobles] ‡ In this opinion we are strengthened when we read the description

* [Dr. Naegelsach credits himself in the Preface with the important discovery that Lam. ii. 14 is a quotation from Ezekiel. The fact that this is a new discovery is suspicious. May he not have mistaken a mere coincidence in the use of language for a citation of one author from another? Our suspicion grows into certainty when we find that a quotation from Ezekiel in this passage involves the necessity of an absurd and impossible translation of the word תָּפַל,—"Thy prophets saw for thee falsehood and white-wash!" As regards the other words involved in these supposed quotations in ii. 14, 15, there is nothing so unique or remarkable in them, but that they might have occurred to any two different writers. But even if they were phrases of striking peculiarity, both writers might have borrowed them from the popular dialect of the day. The American people gave to English literature in our last war many words and phrases that have since appeared simultaneously in our best writers. So the Jewish people, fearfully awakened from the delusions into which their false prophets had betrayed them, may have cried out in their passion שָׁוָה שָׁוָה, and lamented over their ruined city as כָּלִילֵת יָפִי; and Ezekiel and Jeremiah, even on the assumption that the latter had not seen or heard the prophecies that were uttered in Chebar, may both have adopted the phrases that were passing from mouth to mouth. We ought not to forget, either, that both prophets were inspired by the same Spirit, and hence coincidences in thought and expression were to be expected. Our object in these remarks is simply to show, that the repetition in the Lamentations of words and phrases in Ezekiel, does not presuppose an acquaintance with Ezekiel's prophecies. But in point of fact Ezekiel's prophecies contained in chapters xii. xlii. xli. xlii. were in all probability known to the Jews in Palestine almost as soon as published in Chaldea. See notes on ii. 14, 15.—W. H. H.]

† [We do find great resemblances in phraseology between the two; and if every remarkable expression occurring in two authors, must be in one of them a quotation from the other, either Jeremiah quotes Ezekiel, or Ezekiel Jeremiah, very often. Observe, for instance, the peculiar use of גִּלְגָּל in the sense of captivity, and the use of symbolical names, especially פְּקִיד. Jer. i. 21; Ezek. xxlii. 23.—W. H. H.]

‡ [This is not complimentary to the author. The book itself furnishes evidence that its author could not be blinded by

iv. 17-20, where the author so vividly and intelligently describes, as only an eye witness could, the king's flight and his capture. He must therefore have been one of the king's companions and belonged to his court. But he seems himself to have escaped capture. Else he had shared the fate of the other princes captured with the king, who according to Jer. lii. 10, were put to death together at Riblah. Since he was not captured, neither could he have been transported, but must have joined himself to the company of those remaining in the land who afterwards fled to Egypt. Hence v. 9, 10 relate to his personal experience.

2. As regards the Time of Composition, chapter second at least must have been written after the book of Ezekiel was known: for vers. 14, 15 of that chapter presuppose Ezekiel xii., xiii., xxi., xxii., xxvii., consequently the first part of his writings (i.-xxxii) at least. These verses could not have been added at a later period, for they were necessary to the completeness of the alphabet from the first. Still less could the whole of the second chapter have been composed at a later period, for the whole work, based from beginning to end on its five-fold construction, was in fact made out of one casting. But when the first copy of Ezekiel's writings may have reached Egypt, it is impossible to ascertain. We can only say this much, that the latest date mentioned in Ezekiel's writings is the 27th year of Jehoniah's captivity (Ezek. xxix. 17). This refers us to the year 571 or 570 B. C., and consequently to a period about which time, according to the greatest probability, Jeremiah's death occurred. For though we were obliged to show [in the Commentary on Jeremiah, lii. 31-34] that it was not absolutely impossible for Jeremiah to have lived till the year 561, B. C., yet this is only the extremest imaginable possibility. Much more likely is it that he lived only till about the year 570. See Intr. to Jeremiah, pp. ix., xii. But Ezekiel, even if he received his last revelation in the year 571-570, must after that have consumed some time in finishing the composition of his book, and more time still must have elapsed before a copy of his writings could come from Chebar to Egypt.* Besides, is it credible that Jeremiah, in his old age and while suffering every affliction, wrote a book so artistic in its construction, and so full of sprightliness, as the Book of Lamentations is? It can as little be inferred from iii. 4, that the author was old, as it can from iii. 27, that he was young. But the freshness and vivacity with which the book is written, and the labor which it has cost, make it improbable that it was written by an aged man in the last stage of his vital powers.

3. That the five songs are the work of one and the same author, is evident from the following facts and considerations: (1.) The unity of the plan, proved above. (2.) The thrice repeated initial word אֶתְּחִיל, in i. 1; ii. 1; iv. 1. For it would be indeed remarkable in the highest degree, if different writers had begun their songs with precisely the same word. (3.) The similarity of the language. Although verbal peculiarities occur, which distinguish the songs from each other, yet a common language prevails in all. In regard to the first point, the phrase כִּנְחֻם אֶן occurs four times (i. 2, 9, 17, 21) and רַחֵק כִּנְחֻם once (i. 6) in the first chapter, and in no other: נִנְחָה three times (i. 4, 8, 11) and substantive אֲנִיחָה once (i. 22), and in no other chapter; מַחְכֵּר (מַחְכֹּר) three times in the first (vers. 7, 10, 11), once in the second chapter (ver. 4); כָּלֵעַ five times in the second chapter (vers. 2, 5 bis, 8, 16), and exclusively there; the same is true of עֲטֹף, which occurs three times, although in different forms, in ch. ii. (vers. 11, 12, 19); and יוֹם אֶף occurs three times in ch. ii. (vers. 1, 21, 22), and only there. Each of the following words occurs twice in ch. iii., גֵּר (vers. 7, 9), רֹאשׁ (vers. 5, 19), אֹחֵל (vers. 21, 24, comp. vers.

the prejudices of rank, nor meanly capable of exempting his own rank from just censure. The internal evidence is in favor of the opinion that he was himself a prophet and a priest, and intimately associated with the nobility of the land, if not himself a noble.—W. H. H.]

* [It is here assumed that Ezekiel's prophecies were not published till all of them, or a large portion of them, had been carefully collated in book-form and that then they were formally circulated. The modern process of writing, printing, and publishing, seems to be in the writer's mind. In fact, probably, each prophecy, whether first spoken or written, was instantly and rapidly communicated to all the Jews. It would travel, with marching armies and numerous caravans, to Palestine, and thence by various channels to Egypt, not only in written form, but repeated orally and accurately by those, who in that age of few books and fewer readers, were able readily and exactly to memorize all that their prophets and poets composed. It may be proper here again to refer to the fact that Ezek. i.-xxiii. was certainly complete before the destruction of Jerusalem, and may have been finished a year, or longer, before that event.—W. H. H.]

18, 26), חֲכָרִים (vers. 22, 32) כָּכָךְ (vers. 43, 44), עָנִית, and עֲנִיתָה (vers. 36, 59). In ch. iv. לָמוֹ occurs twice (vers. 10, 15). In ch. v. no similar repetition of characteristic expressions occurs. I believe that these more frequent repetitions in the first chapters are due to the more lavish expenditure of art, for which those chapters are remarkable. Not that these repetitions are themselves indications of art; they are rather the involuntary consequence of that constraint which an artificial style imposes upon the writer. As the Poet becomes better accustomed to the artificial form in ch. iii., these repetitions decrease in number.* To the same cause we must ascribe the peculiarity that the Divine name אֱלֹהֵי occurs only in the first three chapters. Up to the culmination point, which we recognize in the middle of ch. iii. (vers. 19–40), we find this Divine name, which belongs rather to grave and solemn discourse, thirteen times, and afterwards in the decrecendo passage it occurs only once (iii. 58).† Apart from these repetitions in one and the same chapter, which prove nothing against the identity of the author, many characteristic expressions are repeated in several chapters, a fact which testifies that one and the same style, or habit of speaking, prevails throughout the whole Book. The following expressions thus occur. נָגַה, i. 4, 5, 12, and iii. 32, 33. עָנִי, i. 3, 7, 9, and iii. 1, 19. עָנָה, deprimere, iii. 33, and v. 11. נָחַה, ii. 7, and iii. 17, 31. נָגַיְנָה, iii. 14, 63, and v. 14. לֹא חָכַל, ii. 2, 17, 21, and iii. 43. רָאשׁ כָּל-חַיּוֹת, ii. 19, and iv. 1. טוֹב (happy), iii. 26, and iv. 9. צָר (sing.), i. 5, 7, 10, and iv. 12. הִכִּיתִּי, i. 11, 12; iii. 63; iv. 16; and v. 1. גָּלָה עַל, ii. 14, and iv. 22. רָדָה, i. 13, and v. 17. שֵׁ, relat., ii. 15, 16; iv. 9; and v. 18. כּוֹעֵד (place or time of a festivity), i. 4, 15, and ii. 6, 7, 22. שָׁכַם, i. 4, 13, 16, and iii. 11. מְרִידִים, i. 7, and iii. 19. חָטָא, i. 8, and iii. 39. עֲכָרִי דָדָךְ, i. 12, and ii. 15. עוֹלֵל (עוֹלֵל), i. 12, 22; ii. 20, and iii. 51. חֲכָרְכִי, i. 20, and ii. 11. שׁוּב אַחֲרֵי, i. 8, and ii. 3. מְחַכֵּר (מְחַכֵּר), i. 7, 10, 11, and ii. 4. פָּצָה, ii. 16, and iii. 46. הִפְנוּתָה, ii. 18, and iii. 49. לָחִי, i. 2, and iii. 30. עָפַר, ii. 10, and iii. 29. נִשְׂא לִבִּי, ii. 19, and iii. 41. I think that this comparison, which contains only those instances that are most apparent to the eye, strengthens the principal argument for the identity of the author of the several songs, which argument consists in the unity of the plan on which they are constructed.

§ 4. LITERATURE.

We have the Patristical Commentaries of THEODORET and EPHRAEM SYRUS.—JEROME has not explained this Book. The short Tractatus in Jeremiae Lamentationes, which is found under his name in the editions of his works, and which is nothing but a mystical interpretation of the alphabet, was composed, according to GHISLER, SIXTUS SENENSIS and BELLARMINE (see GHISLER, p. 5), by RHABANUS MAURUS, according to BALLARSUS and others (see VALLARS, Tom. V. p. 1011), by the venerable BEDE.—The book of Lamentations was held in high esteem

* [We must wholly dissent from any such explanation of these repetitions. To do so, were to transform some of the most beautiful and impressive passages in these poems into blemishes, that betray the carelessness or the want of skill of the sacred writer. There are few instances in which the reasons for the repetition are not apparent: none in which we cannot imagine that they were intended for rhetorical or poetical effect. The constantly recurring theme in the first song, there is no comfort, or she has no comforter, is one of the master strokes of a great poet. This emphasizes again and again the theme of the whole poem. This is the very acme of the distress of the daughter of Jerusalem, who having forsaken her God, now sitteth solitary, herself forsaken both of God and men, she hath no comforter! So in the second song, the day of His wrath, and the frequent recurrence of the words anger and wrath serve to keep in view the one great thought of this particular song, that God Himself had appeared as an enemy and an avenger. Not only was Jerusalem as a forsaken woman without a comforter, God had turned against her. He had destroyed His own Zion where He dwelt among His people, and all that they suffered, they suffered at His hand, and we are not for a moment allowed to forget that we are reading of what God does in the day of His wrath. The repetitions in the first chapter of that tremulous word נִאֲנָן, till we seem to hear the broken sighs of priests and people, yea, and of the forsaken sufferer herself; and in the second chapter, of the short expressive word בָּלַעַי, till we understand that nothing has escaped the desolations of Heaven's wrath, that everything is literally and utterly swallowed up or consumed, are instances of that masterly art by which a great poet impresses an idea on the mind by a single word, repeated again and again, with increasing emphasis, where a writer of inferior ability would weaken the force by dividing it among many words. But without multiplying instances, it may be well here to make a general observation which will apply to all these repetitions, and that is that the language of violent passion, and especially of grief, is always broken up into short words, and indulges in the frequent repetition of them.—W. H. IL.]

by the Fathers. GREGORY NAZIANZEN says of it (in his Orat. prima de pace, according to GHISLER, p. 4), "As often as I take this book into my hands, and am engaged in reading those Lamentations (whenever I do read it, I desire to be modest in the enjoyment of prosperity), my voice choked with emotion is lost, my eyes are filled with tears, and I seem to see the very calamity he describes and lament with him in his lamentations." The alphabetical acrostic furnished rich material for allegorical interpretation. Thus CASSIODORUS (explic. Ps. xxiv., in GHISLER, p. 3), says, "Jeremiah bemoaned the captivity of Jerusalem in a quadruple alphabetical Lamentation, indicating to us, by the sacrament of letters, the mysteries of celestial things."—With respect to Rabbinical Commentators, we refer to those mentioned on the Prophet Jeremiah, to whom we must add ABEN EZRA.—There is a Hebrew Commentary by M. The translation is one of the first into English directly from the Hebrew, and is characterized by great simplicity and force, and an agreeable musical rhythm. The notes are curious, but of little exegetical value, and abruptly terminate with the sixth verse of the second chapter, as if the author tired of them, for he closes with this singular remark: “And further large commenting I shall not need. JOHN OWEN, Vicar of Thruxington, and rural Dean, Leicestershire, has added many notes of his own, and sometimes gives us a new translation from the Hebrew. ADDITIONAL REMARKS ON THE QUESTION OF AUTHORSHIP.

BY W. H. H.

The commonly received opinion that Jeremiah was the author of the Lamentations is sustained by the following considerations:

1. The presumptive probability that Jeremiah was the author is strong. Dr. NÆGELSBACH concedes its force (see p. 9).

Jeremiah survived the fall of the city long enough to have written this book. The authentic records of his history close with his residence among the Jewish fugitives in Tahpanhes, Egypt (Jer. xliii. 8). Whether we accept the early Christian tradition that "the Jews at Tahpanhes, irritated by his rebukes, at last stoned him to death" (SMITH'S Bib. Dict.), or the report that he was "put to death by king Hophra" (MILMAN'S Hist. of the Jews); or adopt the more likely belief of the Jews, "that on the conquest of Egypt by Nebuchadnezzar, he with Baruch made his escape to Babylon or Judea and died in peace," having lived to add the last words appended to his prophecies, Jer. lii. 31-34 (see SMITH'S Bib. Dict., art. "Jeremiah," STANLEY'S Jewish Church, Series 2d, p. 620),—it is at least certain, that Jeremiah survived the destruction of Jerusalem long enough to have written the Lamentations, which include historical facts not complete till after the death of Gedaliah and the flight to Egypt. Surviving, it is next to incredible, that he, the prophet of the destruction, should not be the author of this poem of lamentation over the great event and issue of his prophetic career. Who can read first his prophetic book and then this description of the city and the people after the destruction of the former, and not say,—if Jeremiah still lived, Jeremiah and no other was the painter of this picture, in which all the conspicuous figures are what his former writings would lead us to expect, which presents an exact fulfilment of all he predicted, and which so corresponds with the doctrine, facts and previsions, contained in the prophetic book, that when we turn from one to the other, it is difficult to say which picture is most like the reality,—which is the mirror that most accurately reflects the downfall of the State and the dispersion of the people! "The poems belong unmistakably to the last days of the kingdom, or the commencement of the exile. They are written by one who speaks, with the vividness and intensity of an eye-witness, of the misery which he bewails. It might almost be enough to ask, who else then living could have written with that union of strong passionate feeling and entire submission to Jehovah, which characterizes both the Lamentations and the Prophecy of Jeremiah?" (SMITH'S Bib. Dict. art. Lament.). Who can believe that Jeremiah, after continuing to speak and write for God through a long life-time, so suddenly dropped the pen and remained silent and suffered a total eclipse from the splendor of an unknown author, to whose identity neither Scripture nor tradition give us the slightest clue?

2. The presumption that Jeremiah wrote the Lamentations is confirmed by the most decisive testimony of tradition.

Few historic facts are sustained by a tradition so ancient, so long undisputed and so generally received. The truthfulness of this tradition was never, we may say, seriously questioned till the middle of this century, when EWALD gave his verdict against it. Up to that time, with the exception of an anonymous writer in 1819, and the whimsical VON DER HAARDT in 1712, it was universally accepted by Jews and Christians. We trace it back through the Vulgate, the Syriac and the Septuagint versions, to the probable evidence of Hebrew MSS. earlier than the oldest of those versions (see note p. 8). The existence of such Hebrew MSS. is entirely probable. It is easier to account for the loss of what once were the connecting words between the Prophecies of Jeremiah and the Lamentations, by the transfer of the latter to the Hagiographa, than it is to explain the insertion of the words in the Septuagint and their reproduction, with additions and changes, in the Vulgate, if they never existed in Hebrew originals. It is impossible to suppose that the Septuagint translators inserted in the text a mere presumption of their own, "derived from the book itself," as Dr. NÆGELSBACH suggests. If it could be proved that they did not find these words in Hebrew MSS., we must believe that they received them through written or oral tradition, that had descended to them from earlier ages and was, in their times, universally accepted and undisputed. It is not credible that such a tradition could have been founded in error. When and how could an error, in reference to the authorship of this book, have come into universal acceptance previous to the translation by the Seventy? It is asserted that other writings, of unknown authorship, were attributed by the Jews to Jeremiah (SMITH'S Bib. Dict.; STANLEY'S Jewish Ch.). But there is no evidence of their having attributed to him a canonical book, that had always been esteemed canonical, and had never been lost sight of or forgotten. There is reason to believe that this book was highly valued by the exiled Jews, and was in their possession on their return from captivity (SMITH'S Bib. Dict., art. Lam.). From that time to the time of the translation of the LXX., the Jews, cured of idolatry, cherished their sacred Scriptures and especially revered the memory and the words of the prophet Jeremiah. During this long period, we can fix upon no point of time, when the true history of this extraordinary book could have been lost, when the brilliant name of its real author could have lapsed into oblivion, or when the fable could have been fabricated, that was destined to be universally accepted as a historic truth, that Jeremiah was that author.

3. The facts related or referred to in the book render it certain that Jeremiah wrote the book.

We have already ascertained that he lived long enough after the events alluded to had happened, to have written about them. We have also intimated that the topics discussed or suggested in the Lamentations are exactly what we would expect to find in a writing of Jeremiah's, composed after the destruction of Jerusalem. To this we now add, that the assumption that the Lamentations were written by one, who had been both a spectator of the events described and a participator in those events, points directly to Jeremiah as the probable author of the book. This assumption, indeed, is not inevitable; for not all graphic descriptions of events are written by those who participated in them: what eye-witness, for example, could bring the reader more immediately into the presence of actors and scenes far remote from the writer, than DEAN STANLEY, who has given us his eloquent version of the same incidents in Jewish history? But granting the assumption in the present instance, who could have been a more authentic writer of the facts contained in the Book of Lamentations, than the prophet Jeremiah? Or what great event is described in that Book, that was not witnessed and participated in by the prophet Jeremiah? Dr. NÆGELSBACH suggests only one possible exception; he would infer, from the description of the flight from Jerusalem and the pursuit and capture of the king and the princes, that the author of Lamentations was a companion of the king and one of the princes of the court. To this we answer; 1st. There is no intimation that even one of those princes escaped the slaughter at Riblah: "and the king of Babylon slew the sons of Zedekiah before his eyes: he slew also all the princes of Judah in Riblah." 2d. There is absolutely nothing, in the brief allusion in the Lamentations to the flight and capture of the king, that indicates that it was written by a companion of the king. The only possible reference to this tragical incident is contained in two verses, iv. 19, 20.* The 19th verse,—"Our persecutors are swifter than the eagles of the heaven; they pursued us upon the mountains, they laid wait for us in the wilderness,"—is in no sense personal to the writer, nor is its application to be restricted to the king and his army; but is spoken with reference to the whole people, as the preceding verses show, and refers to the rapid pursuit of all fugitives from the city, whether they endeavored, like the king, to find safety in the mountains of Jericho or the wilderness of Judea, or in any other mountains or wildernesses in the vicinity of the doomed city. The first member of ver. 20,—"the breath of our nostrils, the anointed of the LORD, was taken in their pits,"—simply states the fact of the king's capture, without any incidental detail, such as would indicate a description of the event by an eye-witness; and the second member of this verse,—"of whom we said, Under his shadow we shall live among the heathen,"—is the language of the people generally, not of the companions of the king only, for the desire of the nation doubtless was, that their king should escape to some place of security, even among the heathen, whither they might follow him, and where they might gather around him and perpetuate their monarchy and nationality. There is, then, nothing in these two verses to embarrass the conclusion that Jeremiah wrote the Lamentations.

Having shown that there is nothing in this Book involving the personal experience and observation of the author, that renders it impossible for Jeremiah to have been that author, we come now to the fact, that there is much in this Book which belongs peculiarly and exclusively to the personal history of that prophet. This is especially true of the third chapter or song. Here we clearly have the prophet Jeremiah speaking to us. Dr. NÆGELSBACH himself is compelled to acknowledge this. But he says that the writer of the Book personifies the prophet and puts these words into his mouth. Who can believe this? Who could justify the sudden intrusion of a new speaker into such a finished composition, without a hint, either preceding or following his soliloquy, as to his name, rank, or official position? Who would imagine that any intelligent author would attempt such an abrupt assumption of another man's personality? Who can believe in the possibility of such a complete identification between an author and a character dramatically introduced into his poem? Either Jeremiah wrote the whole poem, or he wrote no part of it. If he wrote the whole, the 3d chapter, beginning with the words "I am the man that hath seen affliction," is natural, lucid and appropriate. If Jeremiah did not write the poem, this third chapter is certainly intended to deceive us into the belief that he did. Otherwise, it is an anomaly and solecism in literature, that no reputable writer could be guilty of. The argument that a modest man would not make himself the central object in his own poem, is of no force; especially when we remember that the poet is also the prophet of Jehovah, and not only on that account a representative man, but a living prophecy in his own life, as Hosea was. Besides, the argument may be offset by another consideration, that a poet, as skilful as the author of Lamentations was, would not leave us to guess who the central figure of his poem is, by the mere accidental coincidences of historical details. Indeed, we find in this absence of his name and titles the best evidence, that the modest Jeremiah was himself the author; for if another had written the Book, he would have had every inducement to tell us, that the great and holy prophet Jeremiah was the speaker in this 3d Song. The whole argument for modesty, however, is greatly overstrained, and receives no support from the free and frank way in which Jeremiah speaks of himself in his prophecies.

4. Characteristics and similarities of style add still further evidences to the fact that Jeremiah wrote the Lamentations.

Arguments derived from style are precarious. The investigations into the authorship of Junius admonish us that the most astute critics may be deceived, and that it is possible for an author to excel himself in one single production beyond the recognition of his most intimate and sagacious friends. In the present instance, we encounter the difficulty of determining what are the general characteristics of Jeremiah's style. Till the critics decide this point, the question whether the Lamentations harmonize with his style must be demurred. "JEROME complained of a certain rusticity in Jeremiah's style," an idea that NÆGELSBACH seems to accept (See p. 12. Sermo incultus et pene subrusticus.)* LOWTH confesses that he can discover no vestige of this rusticity, he thinks that in several of his prophecies he "approaches very near the sublimity of Isaiah," he regards Ezekiel as "much inferior to Jeremiah in elegance" (Sacred Poetry of the Hebrews, GREGORY's translation, II., pp. 88, 89). LOWTH also compares him to Simonides; and SEB. SCHMIDT compares him to Cicero (SMITH, Bib. Dic., Art., Jeremiah). Bishop WORDSWORTH, speaking of him as "peculiarly the prophet of the affections," calls him "the Euripides—and more than the Euripides—of the Hebrew canon" (Introduction to Jeremiah, p. xv.).—There is again a conflict of opinion in regard to the merits of the Lamentations as a work of art and taste. EWALD speaks of it slightly as possessing some merit. NOYES almost reproduces EWALD's language, when he says, "The Lamentations are, indeed, possessed of considerable merit in their way, but still betray an unpoetic period and degenerated taste" (Introduction to Psalms, p. 48). On the other hand, NÆGELSBACH accords the highest place to the Book as a work of art, and regards its production as far above and beyond the ability of the uncultured and almost rustic Jeremiah. He is certainly right in his appreciation of the style of the Lamentations, and many of the best judges of style agree with him. "Never was there a more rich and elegant variety of beautiful images and adjuncts, arranged together within so small a compass, nor more happily chosen and applied" (LOWTH, De Sac. Poes. Heb. Prælect. XXII. KITTO, Cyc. Bib. Lit.). "Never did city suffer a more miserable fate, never was ruined city lamented in language so exquisitely pathetic. Jerusalem is, as it were personified, and bewailed with the passionate sorrow of private and domestic attachment: while the more general pictures of the famine, the common misery of every rank, and age, and sex, all the desolation, the carnage, the violation, the dragging away into captivity, the remembrance of former glories, of the gorgeous ceremonies, and the glad festivals, the awful sense of the Divine wrath heightening the present calamities, are successively drawn with all the life and reality of an eye-witness. They combine the truth of history with the deepest pathos of poetry" (MILMAN, Hist. of Jews, vol. I. B. viii. p. 260). Before we leave this matter of the general characteristics of the style of Jeremiah's prophecies and of the style of the Lamentations, we would repeat an assertion already made, that there must be, in the nature of the case, great diversity between "the oratorical prose" (as Bishop WORDSWORTH calls it) of the one* and the rhythmical lyrical poetry of the other.

The acrostic structure of the Lamentations is regarded as a peculiarity of style that Jeremiah would not have adopted. "DE WETTE maintains (Comment. über die Psalm. p. 56) that this acrostic form of writing was the outgrowth of a feeble and degenerate age, dwelling on the outer structure of poetry when the soul had departed. His judgment as to the origin and character of the alphabetic form is shared by EWALD (Poet. Büch., I., p. 140). It is hard, however, to reconcile this estimate with the impression made on us by such Psalms as the 25th and 34th; and EWALD himself, in his translation of the Alphabetic Psalms and the Lamentations, has shown how compatible such a structure is with the highest energy and beauty" (SMITH'S Bib. Dict., art. Lament., n. g.). The modern acrostic—the spelling out of words or sentences in the initial letters of rhymed verses—is justly regarded as a species of literary trifling, pleasing only to a fanciful, finical or puerile taste. If the alphabetical acrostic of the Hebrews is also to be regarded as belonging merely to the curiosities of literature, the chief or whole merit of the production consisting in the acrostic itself, or derived from the difficulties to be overcome, an exhibition of literary acrobatism—poetry on an alphabetical tight-rope,—then we may condemn it as an evidence of vitiated taste, and should regard it as beneath the dignity of any inspired writer, and especially of such a glorious and venerable prophet as Jeremiah was. But we find on examination, that these alphabetical Hebrew poems have great merit, aside from their acrostic form, which they retain when stripped of that form, as they are in our modern translations. This and the fact that this form was ever adopted by inspired writers, lead us to the conclusion that the Hebrew alphabetical acrostic must have served a far higher purpose than our modern acrostics do. It is not impossible that it may have belonged to the highest art of ancient Hebrew poetry, though we, now, may not be able to appreciate all the excellencies an ancient Hebrew might have discerned in this species of writing.†

* "There remains a single class of poets among the Jews—a class peculiar to that people—the prophets. The most of them delivered their predictions in poetry. It is not poetry, nor is it oratory. It is sublime vision. The event seen passing before the mental eye of the prophet is revealed in lofty rhythm, in glowing imagery. It is eloquent in the highest sense, and stands near the line where oratory and poetry meet. It will be observed that the most impassioned strains of the greatest orators become rhythmical, and have a solemn march which resembles vision. We see it in all their greatest efforts" (Pres. Quart. Rev., Jan. 1861, Art. IV., Hebrew Lang. and Poetry, p. 463).

† GERLACH: "That the alphabetical arrangement may be regarded as inappropriate to Jeremiah, when his soul was filled with sorrow, can only be maintained by regarding the metrical style of poetry as generally inconsistent with deep grief, which no one presumes to do. Here the argument finally depends on the question as to the signification of this alphabetical arrangement. DE WETTE (Comm. Psalms, p. 58), declares it 'a rhythmical artifice, a product of the later and degenerated taste' (E. BRUNS in HERZOG'S Encyc. V., p. 906. Speierlei), and EWALD (Poet. Büch. I., S. 139. 3 Auf. I., S. 201) esteems it a sign of 'declining art,' against what SOMMER (bibl. Abhandl., S. 94) says for the higher age of this form of poetry (as HIRTZ also, at least he does not deny the Davidical authorship of Ps. ix. and x. on account of the alphabetical structure). But if it were proved that such an artificial construction were, on general grounds, unworthy of the prophet, then 'with equal propriety we would condemn the Songs, Befehl du deine Wege, by P. GERHARDT, and Wie schön leucht uns der Morgenstern, by NICOLAI, since there is an artificialness in the beginning of the verses, such as we could not expect in poets so pre-eminent and vigorous' (HENGSTENBERG, Pt. 2, S. 93); and even THENIUS allows (S. 190) that this were hypocritical. So Without doubt it had mnemonic advantages and also served the purpose of an artificial vinculum for thoughts and sentences having no close logical connection. But we cannot accept the opinion that these were its only or even its chief recommendations.* Jeremiah might have been influenced by the first reason in adopting this style in the Lamentations: but the other could hardly have influenced him, for the Lamentations are not composed of thoughts and sentences loosely connected, as has been too often asserted, needing to be strung together by this alphabetical artifice; on the contrary there is a very close logical connection and a consecutive flow of thought in these poems, and that this is not always apparent is owing to this very alphabetical structure, which sometimes breaks up and interrupts the sense, and is in this respect an actual hinderance to the natural and proper connection of sentiment and expression. It is, therefore, impossible that Jeremiah chose it for the purpose of supplying by artificial means the lack of logical connection in the subject matter of his poem. He must have been influenced by other considerations. What were they? We can, we think, specify three reasons, any one of which would justify his adoption of this style, and all of which probably combined in determining the external structure of this exquisite poem. 1. The assistance afforded by this alphabetical structure in maintaining the rhythmical parallelism of the poem. The parallelism of the Lamentations, as may be seen at a glance, is not the usual parallelism of thought and sentiment, so characteristic of Hebrew poetry: but it is strictly the parallelism of rhythm (see NOYES, Introduction to Psalms, pp. 43-46). "The simply rhythmical parallelism holds the most prominent place in the Lamentations of Jeremiah. Here the parallelism of thoughts is to be reckoned almost among the exceptions, and when it does occur, it is, for the most part, the subordinate parallelism of a member by itself; in general, the rhythm alone predominates, and that too with a regularity which is rare among Hebrew poets, producing here a suitable effect, namely, monotony of complaint" (NOYES, ib., p. 45). This rhythm consists in dividing each verse into three members in chap. i., ii., iii., into two members in chap. iv., and in making each verse of chapter v. consist of one member, and in balancing each member with a cæsura, "which coincides with the sense and the accent," though "we are sometimes under the necessity of abandoning the accents, because they follow the sense, while the rhythm is independent of the sense" (NOYES). This peculiar construction gives to the Hebrew original "that conciseness and brevity" which, as HENDERSON remarks (Introduction, p. 277), it is impossible to exhibit in a translation. But rhythmical parallelism, as NOYES observes, "is too loose a form to retain an exuberant matter without passing over into the prosaic style." This is to be guarded against. In the absence of the parallelism of thoughts and sentiments, how shall the writer distinguish his poetry from mere prose composition, in which rhythm often occurs without constituting poetry? To meet this difficulty, the advantage of the artificial restraint of the alphabetical structure is obvious. At equal periods, both writer and reader are reminded, in the absence of parallel thoughts, that the rhythmical parallelism is ended, and is to begin anew. Thus the writer is checked and curbed, and saved from the fault of an inelegant redundancy of expression, while the reader is instructed to observe the proper inflections and to expect some new change of thought or expression. If the original was written without points, as doubtless it was, we can readily apprehend how almost necessary some such artificial help to correct writing and reading, as this alphabetical strucmuch the stranger is the contradiction into which he falls when he asserts (S. 124), that the expansion of the alphabetical structure in ch. iii., is 'an artificiality, to which only a less spiritual poet could confine himself, and which alone by itself repels the thought that Jeremiah could have composed this poem.' Very far from necessarily indicating a peculiarly artificial style, 'the alphabetical structure rather belongs to the means of giving to poetical writing the character of connectedness which is necessary to it' (HENDERSON, ib. loc.), and has for its object 'to give to such songs, as do not allow of being rounded-off and finished by the internal development of the thoughts, the character of a complete composition by means of passing through the whole alphabet—the symbol of completeness' (KEIL in HAEVERNICK, Einl. III. 8, 48, vgl., 514)."

* LOWTH: "The acrostic or alphabetical poetry of the Hebrews was certainly intended to assist the memory, and was confined altogether to those compositions which consisted of detached maxims or sentiments without any express order or connection" (GREGORY'S Trans. II., Lect. 22, p. 134). GERLACH with dogmatic positiveness denies that the object of this form was "of the external sort, to assist the recollection of the learners, as HUET, LOWTH, and lately TRENIUS assume." It could not fail, however, to facilitate the memorizing of the poems thus written; and in an age when the recitation of poems from memory was the prevailing fashion, and in lyrical poems the recitations were sung, rather than pronounced, to the accompaniment of music, the alphabetical structure possessed advantages that the greatest poets would not despise. GERLACH is also at fault, when, like LOWTH, he would confine the use of the alphabetical structure to the connection of detached sentences or thoughts only loosely related to each other.

ture afforded, may have been. It is not impossible that the poem, as originally written, could not have been intelligibly read, without great difficulty, but for this artificial and alphabetical arrangement. 2. This artificial structure gives to the Poem an expression of unity and completeness. The five songs, each of twenty-two verses, four of them alphabetically arranged, the middle one repeating the alphabet three times, the last one, not alphabetical, but short, rapid and metrical, compose a symmetrical whole, that would be vitiated by any structural change whatever. Even through the eye, this external form, when clearly written, must have conveyed to the mind a conviction that the five Songs composed one poem. The visual effect was an aid to the intellectual apprehension of the design and spiritual purport of the poem. It is one, and only one.* The architectural idea suggested by NÆGELSBACH is thus perfected, a temple rising to the crowning dome supported by the well proportioned columns that rest on a common foundation. Or we may imagine our poem a Jacob's ladder, each golden round of which is denoted by a letter; as this ladder rises from earth to heaven, the separate steps, at first wide apart, grow closer together, and then their distinctive marks are lost to sight and we can only see that the top of the ladder is overshadowed with the glory of God amidst the clouds of incense of prayer and adoration. These illustrations, if deemed over fanciful, may yet serve to show how the alphabetical structure of the poem assists our conception of it as a whole, binds together its separate parts and gives it the expression of unity and completeness. 3. The alphabetical structure was a mechanical assistance to the writer, helping him to curb and control his own emotions and check the ebullitions of violent and turbulent grief. This is the view taken by the author of the article on Lamentations in Dr. WM. SMITH'S Dictionary of the Bible. He says, "the choice of a structure so artificial as that which has been described above, may at first sight appear inconsistent with the deep intense sorrow of which it claims to be the utterance. Some wilder, less-measured rhythm would seem to us to have been a fitter form of expression. It would belong, however, to a very shallow and hasty criticism to pass this judgment. A man true to the gift he has received will welcome the discipline of self-imposed rules for deep sorrow as well as for other strong emotions. In proportion as he is afraid of being carried away by the strong current of feeling, will he be anxious to make the laws more difficult, the discipline more effectual. Something of this kind is traceable in the fact that so many of the master-minds of European literature have chosen, as the fit vehicle for their deepest, tenderest, most impassioned thoughts, the complicated structure of the sonnet; also in DANTE'S selection of the terza rima for his vision of the unseen world. What the sonnet was to Petrarch and to Milton, that the alphabetic verse system was to the writers of Jeremiah's time, the most difficult among the recognized forms of poetry, and yet one in which (assuming the earlier date of some of the [alphabetical] Psalms . . .) some of the noblest thoughts of that poetry had been uttered. We need not wonder that he should have employed it as fitter than any other for the purpose for which he used it." Bishop WORDSWORTH gives the same reason why Jeremiah adopted this form. "Like persons of strong emotions, he trembles at the power of his own passions, and resorts to mechanical helps, which may employ his attention, and may save him from being overcome by his feelings, and swept away by the strong tide and current of the violent impetuosity of his passions. As an Alpine traveller, skirting the sharp edge of a precipice, is not unthankful for the wooden hand-rail which runs along it, and by which he supports his steps if his eyes become dizzy at the sight of the dark deep gulf and the foaming cataract below him, so Jeremiah does not disdain to lean on artificial supports in the most vehement outbursts of his emotions. His Lamentations amid the ruins of Jerusalem are the most impassioned utterances of Hebrew poetry; and the alphabetical arrangement of the stanzas, which at first sight may seem to be a rigid mechanical device, was doubtless designed, not only as a help to the memory of his Hebrew fellow-countrymen, who would recite them in their captivity and dispersion, but also to be a stay and support to himself in his own vehement agitations" (Introduction to Jeremiah, p. xv.).

The vigor and vivacity of style have been urged as a reason why Jeremiah could not, in his old age, have composed the Lamentations. These we are told reveal a young man. The expression in iii 27 is appealed to as a plausible evidence that the writer was young. This sage observation, however, "It is good for a man that he bear the yoke in his youth," is certainly the grave, mature reflection of an old man. The young are not apt to appreciate the benefits of affliction. It is the old man of long experience and long observation, who looking backward, as it is the habit of old men to do, discerns the wholesome discipline there was in the sorrows and trials of earlier years. In this very verse, therefore, as in the whole book, we recognize the tone and spirit of an aged man;—of a man who has, in fact, left hope in regard to the things of this world behind him, and exchanged it for a sublime faith in the fulfilment of Divine purposes and promises in a future that lies beyond the terminus of his own individual life-time,—such faith as bought the field in Anathoth, when the prophet was fully persuaded that he himself would derive no benefit from it.—But it is not certain that Jeremiah had arrived at an extreme old age when the Book of Lamentations was written. In the thirteenth year of Josiah, he speaks of himself as "a child." He may have been then as young as was Samuel, when he was called to the prophetic office, in which case Jeremiah would have been not more than fifty-three years of age when Jerusalem was destroyed. But had he been twenty years old in the thirteenth year of Josiah, he would have been just over sixty at the destruction of Jerusalem, and in the very prime of intellectual and moral vigor.—But granting the possibility that he might have been seventy or eighty years of age, or even older, it should not surprise us, that he, the prophet of God, writing by inspiration of the Spirit of God, should produce a book which is confessedly written with a mental force unabated and a versatility of genius unimpaired. Nor would it be "by any means a singular instance of a richer and mellowed imagination at the close of life, than during its morning or its meridian. This for example was remarkably the case with the magnificent BURKE." The writer just quoted, speaking of the Book of Ecclesiastes and its aged author, says: "Solomon, at the close of his life here hived up the wisdom of past years for our instruction. * * The setting of the sun of the great Master of wisdom, whom God Himself made chief of learned men, threatened indeed to be enveloped with dark clouds, but its rays broke nobly forth before it passed below the horizon, and upon those clouds are painted the rich hues of mingled imagination and philosophy" (Pres. Quart. Review, Jan. 1861, Art. IV., p. 462). Jeremiah, too, at the close of life, compressed the spirit and the teachings of all his prophecies into one wondrous poem, excelling all he had before written in the vigor of its conception, and force, beauty and pathos of its expression. His life and his ministry had been like a stormy day. But that day was not abruptly ended, as was threatened, in the dark night of Jerusalem's destruction. For him there remained a protracted evening twilight, comparatively calm and tranquil, though sorrowful always and perturbed with some fitful returns of stormy experiences, as the animosities of Egyptians and Israelites against him, provoked by his prophecies in Tahpanhes, indicate (see Jer. xliii., xlv.): and in these chastened hours, before his life finally dissolved in tears, his genius gathered into one harmonious composition, the spirit and truth of his eloquent prophecies, to remain for ever the crown and glory of his ministry in the church of God.

We have shown that there is nothing in the style of the Lamentations incompatible with the belief that Jeremiah was their author. We are now to exhibit the evidences of certain similarities of style between Jeremiah's Prophecies and the Lamentations, which confirm our belief that both Books were the production of one author. 1. The individual temperament of Jeremiah, as evinced in his acknowledged writings, was precisely that of the elegiac poet of the Lamentations; occupied with the present and actual, rather than given to discursive flights into the regions of the distant and possible; sensitive, quick in susceptibility; ready to express his emotions and never concealing them, revealing "unreservedly the secret recesses and inmost working of his own heart" (WORDSWORTH); passionate in his grief, and prone to linger among the causes of his sorrow and brood over them and harp upon them; and tender-hearted towards others and sympathetic, throwing himself "unhesitatingly into the condition of those to whom he speaks" (WORDSWORTH). 2. The religious characteristics of Jeremiah reappear in the Lamentations. The same disposition to hold both God and the people firm to covenant engagements: the habit of tracing suffering to sin: the quick discernment of punishment, past or coming, on Jew and Gentile. What has been said of Jeremiah with reference to his prophecies, may be affirmed of the author of the Lamentations: "the Religion, the Monarchy and the other Institutions of his country, seem to be absorbed and concentrated in him; and his own individuality is lost in sympathy with them. His prophetic sternness is a consequence of the intensity of his zeal for the glory of the God of Israel, and of his love for the People of the Lord" (WORDSWORTH, Intr. Jer., p. xv.). 3. The following general "marks of style" have been indicated (see SMITH'S Bib. Dict., art. Jeremiah) as characteristic of his prophetic writings, all of which are manifest, some of them very distinctly, in his Lamentations. Reminiscences and reproductions of what earlier prophets had written. Influences on his mind of the newly discovered law, and especially of the Book of Deuteronomy. A tendency to reproduce himself—to repeat in nearly the same words the great truths which affected his own heart, and which he wished to impress on the hearts of others. Analogies drawn "not from the region of the great and terrible, but from the most homely and familiar incidents (xiii. 1-11; xviii. 1-10)." 4. It is a striking peculiarity of Jeremiah, which we find repeated in the Lamentations, that the future deliverance of Israel is set forth under the form of the destruction of their enemies. Thus elegies, i., iii. and iv., end with predictions of the punishment of hostile nations, where we would expect an announcement of deliverance and salvation for Israel. Turn now to the prophecies of Jeremiah and read his predictions against Egypt (xvi.), Philistia (xlvii.), Moab (xlviii.), Ammon, Edom, Syria, Kedar, Hazor, Elim (xlix.), and Babylon (l., li.). Do we not recognize the same prophetic spirit, and the same peculiar, characteristic recognition of the heathen nations in their "typical character, as representatives of various kinds of enmity against the church of Christ" (WORDSWORTH, Intr. Jer., p. xiii.), so that their humiliation or destruction is tantamount to the glory and deliverance of the people of God? 5. Incidental evidences of the identity of the author of Jeremiah's prophecies and of the Lamentations, in many minute points of resemblance.—"As in the Prophecies of Jeremiah, so here, the causes of the exile of the people, and of the destruction of Jerusalem and the Temple, are represented to be the vices and crimes of the covenant people (compare i. 5, 8, 14, 22; iii. 39, 42; iv. 6, 22; v. 16, with Jer. xiii. 22, 26; xiv. 7; xvi. 10-12; xvii. 1-3), their guilty reliance on false prophets and profligate priests (comp. ii. 14; iv. 13-15, with Jer. ii. 7, 8; v. 31; xiv. 13: xxiii. 11-40; xxvii. etc.), their false confidence of security in Jerusalem (comp. iv. 12, with Jer. vii. 4-15), their vain hope of the assistance of weak and perfidious allies (comp. i. 2, 19; iv. 17, with Jer. ii. 18, 36; xxx. 14; xxxvii. 5-10), HAEV. Einl., S. 515" (KEIL, Einleitung in A. T., § 127, p. 379).—"In both" (the prophecies of Jeremiah and the Lamentations) "we meet once and again, with the picture of the 'virgin daughter of Zion,' sitting down in her shame and misery (Lam. i. 15; ii. 13; Jer. xiv. 17). In both there is the same vehement outpouring of sorrow. The prophet's eyes flow down with tears (Lam. i. 16; ii. 11; iii. 48, 49; Jer. ix. 1; xiii. 17; xiv. 17). There is the same haunting feeling of being surrounded with fears and terrors on every side (Lam. ii. 22; Jer. vi. 25; xvi. 5). In both the worst of all the evils is the iniquity of the prophets and priests (Lam. ii. 14; iv. 13; Jer. v. 30, 31; xiv. 13, 14). The sufferer appeals for vengeance to the righteous Judge (Lam. iii. 64-66; Jer. xi. 20). He bids the rival nations that exulted in the fall of Jerusalem prepare for a like desolation (Lam. iv. 21; Jer. xlix. 12)" (SMITH'S Bib. Dict., art. Lamentations).—Besides undeniable repetitions, there are many similarities of thought and structure. There are passages in the Lamentations that seem Jeremiah-like, echoes and suggestions of his prophecies, though we cannot always connect them with any particular utterance of that Prophet. Sometimes, again, the one distinctly and promptly suggests and recalls the others. For example. In Lam. i. 20, "Behold, O LORD, for I am in distress; my bowels are troubled; mine heart is turned within me," and in Lam. ii. 11, "my bowels are troubled within me, my liver is poured upon the earth," we recognize the man of whom it has been said—with reference to Jer. iv. 19, "My bowels, my bowels! I am pained at my very heart; my heart maketh a noise in me"—"through the chambers of his innermost heart there is a shudder" (EWALD, quoted by STANLEY). Lam. ii. 14, aside from its verbal similarities, could only have been written by the author of Jer. xxiii. 36-38. The same clarion voice that rung out the cry as if from the ramparts of Babylon in Jer. li. 12, is heard resounding from the broken walls of Jerusalem in Lam. ii. 17. He who arrested himself on the very verge of a criminal despair, when he wrote Lam. iii. 18 (see the Commentary), surely had in his mind the words he had before written in Jer. iv. 10 and xx. 7.

And the author of Lam. iii. 10,—“He was unto me as a bear lying in wait, and as a lion in secret places,”—was only in imagination transferring to himself that perilous position, in which he had with grief and horror contemplated “the struggles of the expiring kingdom of Judah, like those of a hunted animal,—now flying, now standing at bay, between two huge beasts of prey, which, whilst their main object is to devour each other, turn aside from time to time to snatch at the smaller victim that has crossed their midway path.”

5. Last of all, and most conclusive as a rebutting argument to Dr. NAEGELSBACH's assertion, we have the striking verbal analogies between these two books. But now we come into direct collision with Dr. NAEGELSBACH's assertion, that the language is not the language of Jeremiah.

It would be a stronger argument to say that Jeremiah did not write Lamentations, because it introduces a great many thoughts and ideas not contained in his prophecies, than it is to urge the appearance of new words, or of old words in new combinations, not found in his prophecies. For it is notorious that men of letters have greater command of language than of thoughts, greater versatility in expressing the same thought in different words, than of infusing original ideas into old words. But Dr. NAEGELSBACH has succeeded in making his argument very imposing and formidable in appearance at least, by spreading out upon his pages a long list of assumed variations in language between Jeremiah's prophecies and the Lamentations. Only ten verses in the whole book have escaped his acute criticism, the results of which are all displayed to full advantage. While the patient labor evinced by this minute catalogue is to be commended, the reader will feel that Dr. NAEGELSBACH might have spared him the almost equal labor of entering into all the details of the work of investigation, by classifying its results under a few general heads. Had he done so, his pages would have presented to the eye at least, a less startling array of facts and instances,—but he himself might have discovered, in the process of generalization, that those facts and instances are more apparent to the eye than they are to the understanding. In reviewing this catalogue we ought, first of all, to remember that great differences in style and language, between two such books as the prophecies of Jeremiah and the Lamentations, even if the productions of one author, were to be expected; and then, secondly, we should inquire, whether the differences that do exist are such as are compatible, according to the rules of a just criticism, with their being the productions of one author. With regard to the first point, we should observe, that the prophecies, for the most part, have somewhat of the character of unpremeditated, extemporaneous effusions, designed to produce an immediate effect on the hearts and consciences of the king, the princes, priests, prophets and people. Therefore they were expressed in the common colloquial words, idioms and phrases of daily life. These prophetic deliverances often assumed the forms and diction of poetry. But it was the poetry of the orator, rather than of the writer. Eloquence always is poetical. This is especially true of oriental eloquence. But its poetry is the expression of impassioned thoughts in language imaginative and ornate, spontaneously and unconsciously falling into harmonious cadences, that with us who speak the English language grow into rhythmical periods, but with the Hebrews passed into parallelisms and regularly constructed sentences, divided by cesuras and accents into parts corresponding more or less accurately in length. Such is the poetry we find in the prophecies of Jeremiah; touching our hearts by their pathos, as in the weeping Rachel, refusing to be comforted, or in the plaintive cry, Is there no balm in Gilead, no physician there? or in the outburst of his own grief, when he exclaims, “Oh, that my head were waters, and mine eyes a fountain of tears, that I might weep day and night for the slain of the daughter of my people;” again delighting us with beautiful imagery, as by the heath in the desert, the wayfaring man, the athlete wearied by the footmen before he contends with the horses; or overwhelming us with the grandeur and sublimity of his conceptions, as in chapter fourth, where he depicts “the tokens attesting the forthcoming of the Lord to vengeance. Chaos comes again over the earth. Darkness covers the heavens. The everlasting mountains tremble. Man disappears from below and the birds fly from the darkened air. Cities become ruins, and the fruitful places wildernesses, before the advancing anger of the Lord. Byron's Darkness is a faint copy of this picture,—it is an inventory of horrible circumstances, which seem to have been laboriously culled and painfully massed up. Jeremiah performs his task with two or three strokes; but they are strokes of lightning” (GILFILLAN: Bards of the Bible).

Jeremiah's Prophecies contain much real poetry, not only such in virtue of intensity of feeling and vividness of illustrative description, but in virtue of the parallelisms and alternating sentences, which mark Hebrew poetry as distinctly as rhythm and rhyme do English poetry. Even unpoetic translators have felt compelled to give it the external garb of poetry, by marking its periods with lines, though some, like our own lamented Dr. J. ADDISON ALEXANDER, have ineffectually protested against ever arraying Hebrew in these modern vestments. But, after all, the poetry of Jeremiah's Prophecies is the production of a Hebrew orator, rather than of a Hebrew writer. The fourth chapter, for instance, from which the description of the coming judgment is taken, was a fervent address to the people, designed to stir them up to repentance. It was a sermon, an exhortation, a prophetic message from God to His Church. Its poetical features were incidental to its impassioned style. The same remarks will apply to all the poetical portions of the Book; and much of the Book is undeniably simply prose, historical or ethical. Throughout he seeks, not poetical, but oratorical effect. He speaks, not as the poet, but as the preacher. Unlike the Prophecies, the Lamentations are in the strictest sense a poem. This poem was composed in circumstances very different from those in which the Prophecies were produced, and for a very different purpose. The prophet-preacher and orator had fulfilled his unsuccessful mission and retired in a measure from public view. He was in exile with that portion of his countrymen who had fled to Egypt. Here he, who had passed the whole of the former part of his life amidst the excitements and agitations of events more critical and important than any that had occurred in the history of the Jews since they entered on possession of the promised land, now in his old age experienced comparative quiet and leisure. There were, it is true, sorrow and suffering enough around him. The fifth chapter of the Lamentations affords hints of these, and the first chapter tells us how "the pursuers overtook them in the straits." Yet life in that Egyptian exile was stagnation compared with the turbulent history of the prophet's former years. The venerable and broken-hearted man had time now for careful composition. He improved the melancholy hours in the production of a lyrical poem, in which his object was, not as in his prophecies, to produce some immediate effect upon his countrymen, but to publish to the world such a description of God's judgments on Israel, as should redound to the glory of God and convey lessons of wisdom and piety to the Church in all time to come. Everything in this poem shows premeditation and pains-taking in the execution, such as we might expect of the prophet in the circumstances in which he was placed. He imposed upon himself the most artificial rules then practised by the writers of poetry, either by his own preference, or to adapt his poem to the prevailing tastes of the Hebrew people. The initial letters of the verses were to be alphabetically arranged, and in the middle chapter or song the alphabet was to be thrice repeated by giving the same initial letter to every clause of each verse; each verse of the first three chapters was to consist of three periods, or members, the fourth chapter of two, and the fifth of one, agreeing externally with what Dr. NAEGELSBACH has described, in musical terms, as a crescendo and decrescendo movement; and each period or member of a verse was to be composed of two parts, clearly marked, both to the mind and ear, by a pause. These were the rules or laws of composition adopted. Yet these artificial restraints were to be so managed that they should not interrupt the continuity of thought, prevent harmony of expression, or destroy the unity that should characterize the five songs as the component parts of one perfect poem. To fulfil all these requirements, a careful choice of words and phrases was imperative. Deliberation was necessary at every step. And the Poet must go beyond the resources of his accustomed dialect and habit of speaking and writing, and cull from the whole Hebrew language the words, idioms and expressions that best suited his purpose. The result inevitably was the occurrence in this poem of a phraseology that is nowhere else found, either in the prophecies of the same author, or in any other single Book of the Holy Bible. How could it be otherwise? We think, therefore, that it ought to be assumed and granted, as a foregone conclusion, that the Lamentations, even if written by Jeremiah, should contain words, phrases, and turns of thought expressed by a novel use of words, nowhere produced in his book of prophecies. Granting this, we are next to ask, whether the verbal differences between the prophecies of Jeremiah and the Lamentations are of such a character as to compel us to the decision that they could not be the productions of the same author? For a full answer to this question, we must refer to the remarks made upon these verbal differences, as they occur, in the following commentary. But a sufficient answer is contained in the statement, that all these differences may be explained, consistently with the presumption that Jeremiah is the author of this book, by a due consideration of the following rules, or laws of construction. In the application of these rules, frequent reference will be made to the poems of SHAKSPEARE compared with his plays. The choice of these poems for this purpose is induced by the fact that Mrs. CLARK'S Concordance to Shakspeare's Plays enables us to detect what is new and peculiar in his poems as compared with his plays. Time has not allowed a full examination of these poems. Only some thirty verses of the two larger poems, "Venus and Adonis," and "Tarquin and Lucrece," have been subjected to a rapid investigation. We should not expect as many verbal discrepancies between the plays and poems of SHAKSPEARE, as may exist between the Prophecies and Lamentations of Jeremiah, for two reasons. The plays of our English poet are so voluminous that they might be expected to exhaust even his vocabulary, while the prophecies of Jeremiah could not possibly call into use all the words and expressions at the command of a writer or speaker of even ordinary fluency. And again, there is less difference between the blank verse of SHAKSPEARE'S plays and the rhymed verse of his poetry, than there is between the poetry of the Prophecies and that of the Lamentations. SHAKSPEARE had occasion to employ over and over again in his dramas the very words that must be repeated in his poems: while Jeremiah would need for his Lamentations a diction to a great extent unlike that in which his Prophecies were composed. Yet in the very first stanza of Venus and Adonis, consisting of six lines, there are four instances of words or expressions that do not occur in the plays of the dramatist, purple-colored face, weeping morn, hied, sick-thoughted, and two that occur only once in his plays, rose-cheeked and bold-faced. In the first stanza of Tarquin and Lucrece, consisting of seven lines, there are three instances of words not found in the plays, trustless, lust-breathing, and lightless. With such facts as these before us, we ought to be prepared for great novelties in the style and language of the Lamentations. And yet we will find that what Dr. NÆGELSBACH has so elaborately spread out before us as novelties, may be classified under the following six heads.

(1). New combinations of words familiar to the writer and occurring with more or less frequency in his Prophecies. These seldom involve real differences in language and style, and it is unfair to cite them as such. They are in nearly every instance similarities in the habit of the writer's phraseology, that prove his identity. When we find in Venus and Adonis expressions like these, loaded satiety, time-beguiling, ashy pale, blue veined, thick-sighed, or, in Tarquin and Lucrece, silver melting dew, high-pitched, all too timeless, death-boding, do we doubt whether SHAKSPEARE wrote these poems, because these particular combinations of familiar words do not occur in his plays? The very first specifications of NÆGELSBACH are of this character, עַם רַבָּתִי and בְּנוֹיָם רַבָּתִי, i. 1. These are, in fact, indications of Jeremiah's authorship. For the writer who used the expression in Jer. li. 13, רַבַּת אוֹצֵרֶת, full of treasures, would be very likely to say עַם רַבָּתִי, full of people; and the writer, who was accustomed to the use of רַב in the sense of great (Jer. xli. 1; xxxii. 19), would be very likely to follow the phrase עַם רַבָּתִי with this other phrase, involving a poetical play upon the word and a pleasant repetition of sound to the ear, רַבָּתִי בְּנוֹיָם, great among the nations. To specify יָרִיב, i. 3, as a peculiarity of style, is a species of literary trifling unworthy of the name of argument. Any writer might connect so common a preposition with a familiar noun. If Jeremiah did it only once, so Isaiah in all his writings uses this expression once, and only once (xxiv. 22). Besides, יָרִיב occurs twenty-one times, scattered throughout the Bible from Genesis to Zechariah. הִלֵּךְ שָׂכָר, i. 5, involves a peculiarity of construction as likely to be perpetrated by the writer of Jer. xxii. 22 and xxx. 16, who says יִלְכִי שָׂכָר, as by any one else. Many of the specifications given by Dr. NÆGELSBACH fall under this first head, and are, in fact, strong evidences of Jeremiah's authorship.

(2). A word not occurring in Jeremiah's prophecies (perhaps not in any other Scriptures), simply because the idea it represents does not occur. Thus in i. 1, שָׂרָה, princess, is the only place in the whole Bible where a princess is distinctly indicated. Hence the word occurs only here. Is it fair to put this down as an indication of style? In fact, however, we claim the evidence of this very word in behalf of the traditional theory. For the word in the plural, שָׁרִית, princesses, was familiar to Jeremiah in the other Scriptures. If he never used it in his prophecies, it was because he had no occasion to do so: but he does use the verb from which it is derived and other derivatives from it; and so often does the word שָׁר, for a prince, ruler, chieftain, or distinguished person, occur in his prophecies, that we should expect the feminine form of that word, שָׁרָה, would be most likely to occur to the mind of the author of those prophecies, when, for the first time, he desired to speak of a princess.—The word כְּרִינָה, province, i. 1, does not occur in the prophecies, because Jeremiah had no occasion to use it in that book. In Venus and Adonis we read for the first time in SHAKSPEARE of a dive dapper, a much more uncommon word in English literature than כְּרִינָה is in Hebrew.—The word לָחִי, cheek, i. 2, Jeremiah had no occasion to use in his prophecies. When for the first time he would speak of the cheek, what word should he use, but the only one used by the inspired Scriptures with which he was familiar? See Deut. xviii. 3; 1 Kings xxii. 24; (2 Chron. xviii. 23); Job xvi. 10; Cant. i. 10; v. 13; Is. i. 6; Mic. iv. 14. (The word occurs in thirteen other places, where it seems to mean the jaw.) This word, therefore, gives all the testimony that can be extracted from it, in favor of Jeremiah, and not against him.

(3). Forcible expressions that occur in other Scriptures extant in Jeremiah's times, which he, therefore, would not be unlikely to repeat; sometimes indeed they may be intended as quotations.—אֵין כִּנְחָם, there is no comforter, i. 2. See Eccl. iv. 1. If Solomon years before had used the expression and given it currency in the Hebrew language, is it strange that Jeremiah repeated it? Or if Solomon was allowed to use it only once in the whole book of Ecclesiastes, without risking his title to the authorship of that book, may not Jeremiah be permitted to use it in only one chapter of all his writings? Or, if there is any thing in the argument at all, ought we not to conclude that the author of the first chapter of Lamentations could not have written the other chapters, because this unique expression occurs five times in the first chapter and not at all in the others?—הָיְתָה לִבְכֹּם, became tributary, i. 1. This phrase was familiar to Jeremiah in Gen. xlix. 15; Josh. xvi. 10; Deut. xx. 11, besides many similar expressions in the old Scriptures.

(4). Words so familiar to the common dialect of Jeremiah's times, that their use by him can occasion no surprise, though they do not occur in his prophecies.—We find in the Venus and Adonis words like the following, which do not occur in SHAKSPEARE's plays: saddle bow, toy as a verb, stalled up (he uses the noun stall often, the verb stall only once, but stall up never, a point our German critics would make very emphatic, if discussing the authorship of this poem), unripe, overswayed, overruled in the sense of ruling over another, uncontrolled in the sense of unconquered, dishevelled, spright, souring, disliking as an adjective, etc. Yet who that is acquainted with the literature of the times in which the great dramatist lived, discovers any thing remarkable in his use of these words? Neither should it surprise us that Jeremiah has nappeden not to use many current words in his prophecies, which he has chosen to use in the Lamentations. For example, עָנָה, of which we shall speak again. עֲבָרָה, i. 3, which occurs in Ex. twelve, in Lev. five, in Num. thirteen, in 1 Chron. eight, in 2 Chron. three, and in Ez. two times, and once in Gen., in Deut. and in Is. So בָּנוּחַ, i. 3, is found in Gen. viii. 9; Deut. xxviii. 65; Ruth iii. 1; 1 Chron. vi. 16; Is. xxxiv. 14.

(5). Slight grammatical variations, licenses allowed every poet; the use of a verb in a tense in which it does not happen to occur in the prophecies; the use of nouns as adjectives, or vice versa; and similar peculiarities.—i. 3, קִנְיָה instead of בְּנִיחָה; ver. 4, the ending יִן—; ii. 13, רָפָא construed with לָ; ver. 14, חָזָה without שָׂא; iii. 6, Hiph. of כָּבַד, etc. As well might we question the authorship of Venus and Adonis, because SHAKSPEARE, often as he uses the verb hie, never in his plays has the preterite hied; nor 'miss for misbehaviour; nor the participle distilling, though he has distil four times, distilled ten, distillative and distilment each once; nor the adjective sappy: nor the participle souring: or the authorship of Tarquin and Lucrece, because in the plays the adjectives made out of nouns, trustless, lightless, bateless, do not occur; nor does the verb stows, though the participle stowed occurs three times; nor the verb cypher, though the noun does; nor the noun blur, though the verb does; nor do the participles parling, pawning. We must remember, too, that the inflections of Hebrew words, the changes produced by affixes and suffixes, and the omission or retention of vowel consonants, give a greater variety of grammatical forms than our English words can possibly undergo.

(6). The exactions of poetry, and especially of the very artificial structure of this poem.—Though the Lamentations may not be strictly rhythmical, yet the sentences are carefully balanced. There is, too, an evident regard to melody in the choice of words. עֲבָדָה and כְּנוּחַ in i. 3, each occurring at the cesura, and both harmonizing with other words in the verse, show that the phraseology was influenced by regard to melodiousness. In spite of the loss of the correct pronunciation of Hebrew, there can be no reasonable doubt of this. Thus we might account for שְׂוִיטָה, iii. 11, by the pleasing alliteration. The necessities of the alphabetical construction sometimes affected the choice of words, as we seem to see in the repetition of vav conversive in iii. 16–18, and of נָדָר in vers. 7 and 9. This may account for the abrupt introduction of the bear, לֵב, in ver. 10, where the lion would have been quite sufficient, if the acrostic had not invited the bear to come too.

If, now, keeping these rules in mind, the following catalogue is carefully examined, there will be found in it little to weaken our confidence in the traditional opinion that Jeremiah wrote the Lamentations, and some things that will strengthen that belief.

When our fervent popular preacher leaves the pulpit, whence he had been accustomed to address the masses on the passing events of the day, or from which he poured forth instruction, warning, invective and exhortation adapted to produce immediate effects; and comes, as it were, to recite before a listening world a dirge on the fall of Jerusalem, that has been carefully prepared, according to the most artificial rules of poetry, known and practised in his day,—we expect to see him, not in his “home-costume,” but dressed for the occasion,—we expect, nay we demand, that his poem shall exhibit in its phraseology, as well as in its thoughts, the results of a careful premeditated selection of words and phrases, that may often lie beyond the habit of his customary “unconscious and undesigned” way of speaking and writing. Judged by this rule, even the long list of variations enumerated above, were they all found to be actual evidences of a difference of style, should not appal us or drive us to the conclusion that Jeremiah could not have been the author of Lamentations. But in point of fact, the long catalogue given above contains comparatively few evidences of even verbal differences between the prophecies of Jeremiah and the Book of Lamentations; and none that may not be explained consistently with the theory that Jeremiah wrote Lamentations. Take out of that catalogue all the ἀπαξ λεγόμενα (and Jeremiah’s prophecies will show such a list of these, as may raise the question whether their occurrence is not a characteristic of his style?); all the repetitions of the same word or phrase, as there is no comforter; all the words for which no synonym or equivalent occurs in the prophecies, and where of course the introduction of new words was inevitable, as princess, province, cheek; all the combinations of common words into new expressions that any writer of ordinary ability is constantly producing, and that do not really amount to peculiarities of diction, as full of people, great among the nations; and all slight grammatical changes that cannot be regarded as novelties in a writer who uses the same grammatical forms in other words, as the changes effected on words used in the prophecies by number, gender, mood, tense, or the particles attached to them, or the prepositions with which they are construed; remove all these from the catalogue, which ought to be thus sifted before we can reach the truthful result of our analysis, and we shall find little left on which to rest an argument against the authorship of Jeremiah. What the residuum would be, may be discovered in the twenty-four instances (see p. 13) on which Dr. NAEGELSBACH has taken his last stand, and which he evidently regards as constituting the strongest evidences in the whole Book that Jeremiah did not write it. These words then claim special attention. If it can be shown that they are not incompatible with the fact of Jeremiah’s authorship, it is not likely that any other words or phrases in the whole catalogue are. עֲלִיךָ appears only twice and then in close connection in Lam. iii. 35, 38. In both instances it seems to designate God (though some, as BLAYNEY, give it a different sense in ver. 35); but it is applied to God as a descriptive title, rather than as a name. God is spoken of as the High One, He is not addressed as such. That the author of Lamentations does not call upon God by this title, by which He is designated in Deut. xxxii. 8, and in many of the Psalms, might be claimed as a coincidence between this book and the prophecies of Jeremiah. But the argument that Jeremiah would not be likely to apply to God a word he himself uses (xxii. 2; xxxvi. 10), and which is so constantly associated with God in the old Scriptures (see Gen. xiv. 18, 19, 20, 22; Num. xxiv. 16), and which Jeremiah the pious priest and prophet, must have so often used in the liturgical Psalms (vii. 18; ix. 3; xxi. 8; xlvii. 5, etc.) is too feeble to withstand the first assault. The citation of the next word אֱלֹהֵי, without any allusion to the question of its genuineness, does not seem entirely ingenuous. Certain it is that many MSS., some early editions and some of the older versions have יְהוָה instead of אֱלֹהֵי in every one of the fourteen places referred to in the Lamentations. The evidence in favor of this reading is so strong that in every instance BLAYNEY translates Jehovah, and BOOTHROYD, in his critical Hebrew Bible, marks אֱלֹהֵי as a probable corruption. If we consider the reluctance with which the Jews would regard the connection of the name of Jehovah with the judgments befalling themselves, we can imagine that doubts as to the יְהוָה and suggestions of אֱלֹהֵי, may have passed in the course of transcription from the margin into the text. But on the supposition that אֱלֹהֵי may be the true reading, it is not impossible to reconcile this with Jeremiah's authorship. Though Jeremiah may have preferred to connect with אֱלֹהֵי the name of יְהוָה, yet in this poem the artificial style (see Rule 6, p. 31) requiring short terse sentences may have forbidden his usual habit. Yet for the sake of variety of expression, or affected by that indefinable taste that guides the poet and which we may not be able always to detect in reading a foreign language, especially one the original pronunciation of which is lost, Jeremiah may have preferred to write אֱלֹהֵי alone, instead of יְהוָה alone. The likelihood that the choice of this word was influenced by the arbitrary rules of his poem may be inferred from the fact that the word always takes an important accent. Or again, Jeremiah may have been reluctant to connect the covenant name of God, the name associated with promise, grace and favor, with the fierce and destructive judgments that destroyed His own people and His own Temple. The remarks of WORDSWORTH on the use of this name in the prophecies give us a sufficient reason, if one is needed, why Jeremiah should depart from his usual custom and omit יְהוָה after אֱלֹהֵי: "The prophet appears thus to intimate in the Lamentations, that now, in her captivity and humiliation, Jerusalem felt the lordship of Jehovah, the God of Israel; but by reason of her sins, no longer felt that lordship to be exercised by Him as JEHOVAH, i. e. as the God of His covenanted people, to protect them" (note on Lam. i. 14). The other words need not detain us long. אֱלֹהֵי occurs five times. Each time it is emphatic, and three times it is intended to intensify the meaning of רָצָה, i. 11, 12; v. 1. It is well chosen for this purpose, nor do the prophecies of Jeremiah suggest a word that both in form and sense would have been equally effective in these places. The word itself must have been familiar to Jeremiah and according to Rule 4, p. 30, cannot be regarded as a peculiarity of style. It occurs in Genesis three times, Exodus two, Numbers three, 1 Samuel four, 1 Kings three, 2 Kings once, 1 Chronicles once, Job three times, Psalms seventeen, Proverbs once, Isaiah fifteen times, Amos once, Habakkuk five times, and Jonah three. עָנִי and the verb from which it is derived עָנָה. This is not exactly accurate. Jeremiah uses the verb עָנָה in its usual meaning of answering frequently, vii. 13, 27; xi. 5; xiv. 7; xxiii. 35, 37; xxx. 3; xxv. 17; xli. 4; xlii. 20: and the derivatives from it in that sense, עָנָה fourteen times, עָנָה eleven times. He also uses עָנָה in the intensive sense of shouting, xxv. 30; xi. 14. But what is more to our purpose is, that once at least he uses the derivation עָנָה, poor, miserable, xxii. 16, from עָנָה in the sense of being bowed down, oppressed. He thus at least recognizes the root of עָנָה, and if in only one single verse of his prophecies we find עָנָה, miserable, shall we be surprised that in only one part of his writings we find עָנָה, affliction? Besides, this word also, according to Rule 4, p. 30, cannot be regarded as a test of authorship. See Gen. xvi. 11; xxix. 32; xxxi. 42; xli. 52; Ex. iii. 7, 17; iv. 31; Deut. xvi. 3; xxvi. 7; Isa. xlviii. 10, and other books of the older Scriptures. שִׁיבֹם. This word may be regarded as quite characteristic of Jeremiah; for he uses it in so many of its forms: in Kal pret. ii. 12; fut. xviii. 16; xix. 8; xlix. 17; l. 13; in Niphal pret. iv. 9; xii. 11; part. xxxiii. 10; in Hiphil pret. x. 25; fut. xlix. 20. Why then may he not also use it in Kal participle (see Rule 5, p. 31), especially since he had before him the examples of 2 Sam. xiii. 20; Isa. xlix. 8, 19; liv. 1; lxi. 4 bis, and since his cotemporary Ezekiel twice used this participial form, xxxvi. 3, 4? (See Rule 4, p. 30). יָנַח. Jeremiah uses the derivative יָנִיחַ viii. 18; xx. 18; xxxi. 13; xlv. 3; and was familiar with the verb (Rule 4, p. 30) in Isa. li. 23; Job xix. 2 and his cotemporary Zephaniah iii. 18. אָנַח. See Joel i. 18; Ex. ii. 23; Prov. xxix. 2, which passages may have been in his mind (see Rule 3, p. 30). See the word also (Rule 4, p. 30) in Isa. xxiv. 7; Ez. ix. 4; xxi. 11 bis, 12. וָנַח is used three times, the first time as the initial word of ii. 7, when the mind of the writer would be going out in search of a suitable word, and not following the unconscious flow of thought and expression; see Rule 6, p. 31. Having used it once, it would readily occur to him again, when the sense suited; and it may be observed that the second time it is used, it stands as an initial word, iii. 17, just where an unusual word would be expected, although the initial letter of its root is not there required. How familiar it was to the dialect of his times (Rule 4, p. 30) may be judged from Hosea viii. 3, 5 and its occurrence in many Psalms and in the Chronicles. חָטָא here again we have a word first appearing as an initial, i. 8, and once repeated, iii. 39, to which the remarks made on last word will apply. It might be said that חָטָא, which is used in the prophecies, would have afforded the proper initial letter. חָטָא may have been preferred for its brevity, and as a matter of taste on account of חָטָא immediately following. Its frequent occurrence in the Pentateuch and its use by Amos and Isaiah would meet the requirements of Rule 4. As there is an acknowledged mistake in the K'thib iii. 39, it is not impossible that the correct reading there is חָטָא instead of the accepted K'thi. בִּחְכֶּר. Jeremiah in his prophecies uses בִּחְכֶּר only three times and then in an abstract sense, iii. 19; xii. 10; xxv. 34. The use of בִּחְכֶּר in Joel iv. 5; Cant. v. 16; Hos. ix. 6, 16, seems to designate that word as better chosen for the idea meant to be expressed. See Rule 4 above. בָּלַע, here again we have a word first occurring as an initial ii. 2, where the Poet is deliberately choosing the best and most forcible word for his purpose and not writing unconstrainedly. The Prophet once uses the verb in the Kal, li. 34. May he not then use it in the Piel, when that form is better suited to his purpose, especially since Habakkuk and Isaiah and older writers set him the example?

לֹא חָמַל, ii. 2, 17. Because Jeremiah once said לֹא נָחַם, xx. 16, and once לֹא נִחַמְתִּי, iv. 28, are we to assume that he could not twice say לֹא חָמַל? The argument is not only worthless, it is truthless, for Jeremiah does say, xiii. 14, לֹא אֶחְמֹל, and xxi. 7, לֹא יֶחְמַל, besides often using the word חָמַל. We claim this phrase, therefore, as distinctively characteristic of Jeremiah. וַיִּרְקֵי עָפָר, ii. 10. Could not Jeremiah repeat a word made classical in Job ii. 12, וַיִּרְקֵי עָפָר, and write עַל-רֹאשָׁם? See Rule 3, p. 30. But it so happens that Jeremiah in his prophecies has no occasion to use an equivalent word, he does not speak of the dust, and therefore according to Rule 2, p. 29, this is no indication of his habit of speech. עָטַף. This word occurs only in Genesis, Job, Psalms, Isaiah, Jonah and Lam. The Niphal form is found only in Lam. ii. 11, the Kal. part. plural, in Gen. xxx. 42, Lam. ii. 19, the Hithpael in Jon. ii. 8, Lam. ii. 12. We can imagine no valid reason why Jeremiah might not have used it. חָזַק, which occurs twice in ii. 14, is not found in the prophecies of Jeremiah, but its derivative חָזַק is, Jer. xiv. 14, xxiii. 16. It is used by Isaiah often, by Amos, Micah, Habakkuk and Ezekiel, and is also found in the Pentateuch, in Job, Psalms and Proverbs. See Rule 4, p. 30. פָּצָה occurs twice, ii. 16, iii. 46, both times as an initial word. See Rule 6, p. 31, and with the same connecting words. If the word does not occur in the prophecies of Jeremiah, neither is the same idea exactly expressed. Hence they contain no equivalent for this expression of opening the mouth against one. See Rule 2, p. 29. We have the same words in Ps. xxii. 14. פָּחַץ with פָּה is used Gen. iv. 11; Deut. xi. 6; Num. xvi. 30. See the word also in Jud. xi. 35, 36; Job xxxv. 16; Isa. x. 14; Ez. ii. 8; Ps. lxvi. 14; cxliv. 10, 11. Rule 4, p. 30. חָשֶׁךְ. Jeremiah in his prophecies seems to have had occasion to use a substantive for darkness only three times; and each time he used a different one, xiii. 16, עֲרֵפֶל; xxiii. 12, אַפְלָה; ii. 31, כְּאֶפְלָה. It cannot be said, therefore, that any one of these words was characteristic of his style, but on the contrary, the choice of a new word, so far as the evidence goes, is characteristic of his style. Besides, he uses the verb חָשַׁךְ, and was familiar with the noun in the sacred Scriptures. See Rule 4. Nor is it improbable, as NAEGELSBACH himself suggests, that the words חָשַׁךְ וְלֹא אִוֵּר, in Am. v. 18, 20; Job xii. 25, were in his mind. See Rule 3, p. 30. גָּנִינָה. Jeremiah did not use this word in the prophecies, because he had no occasion to do so. In that book there is no equivalent for it. See Rule 2, p. 29. He found the word ready for him when he wanted it, in Job, Psalms, Isaiah and Habakkuk. See Rule 4. יָחַל. See again Rule 4.

נִשְׂאָ פָנִים. This phrase is frequent elsewhere, as Dr. NAEGELSBACH allows. See Rule 4. And observe, moreover, how the use of the expression is induced by the poetry. The initial word of the verse, iv. 16, is פָּנִי, this is repeated in the second member to mark the parallelism. The whole construction of the verse is verbally artful, and should we grant that the phrase is not idiomatic with Jeremiah, we could still account for his use of it in this particular passage. לְכֹל. This is simply a rare form that might be adopted by Jeremiah, as well as another. See Gen. ix. 26, 27; Isa. xlv. 15; liii. 8; Ps. xxviii. 8. שְׁ rel. The use of this prefix is characteristic of Ecclesiastes and the Canticles, yet if Solomon was the author of those books, and also of the Proverbs and the seventy second Psalm, he could at pleasure drop this peculiarity. Why then may not Jeremiah be allowed to use the abbreviated relative four times in the Lamentations, without impeaching his title to its authorship? "The occurrence of אֲשֶׁר in Judg. v. 27 casts no suspicion on the genuineness of that verse, though שְׁ is used elsewhere in the Song of Deborah, ver. 7. Nor, on the other hand, does a single שְׁ, where אֲשֶׁר is the prevailing form, discredit Gen. vi. 3, or Job xix. 29" (LANGE's Song of Sol. Intro. § 1, Dr. GREEN's note). The constant tendency to rhythm, at least the terseness of style, is sufficient for the adoption of a form here, which the less compressed poetry of the Prophecies did not require. The abbreviations 'gan and 'miss both occurring near the beginning of Venus and Adonis, constitute no ground on which to rest an argument with reference to the author of that poem. See Rule 6, p. 31. Finally, בְּקֶרֶב without a suffix. This happens once in the Lamentations, iii. 45. The same thing happens elsewhere in the Old Testament sixty-one times, in Genesis, Exodus, Numbers, Deuteronomy, Joshua, Judges, 1 Samuel, 1 Kings, Psalms, Proverbs, Isaiah, Joel, Amos, Micah and Habakkuk; and Jeremiah himself is once imprudent enough to use בְּקֶרֶב, vi. 1, without a suffix.—The conclusion to which we are forced, after this too patient examination is, that the phraseology of the Lamentations is beyond all doubt compatible with the tradition that Jeremiah the Prophet was their author.

On the other hand, there are striking verbal analogies between the book of the Prophecies of Jeremiah and the Book of Lamentations, sufficient of themselves to convince us, that the two Books are the productions of one author. What has been remarked of Jeremiah's writings generally is found to be true of the Lamentations also,—“his language abounds in Aramaic forms, loses sight of the fine grammatical distinctions of the earlier Hebrews, includes many words not found in its vocabulary (EICHHORN, Eintl. in das A. T., III. 121),” (SMITH's Bib. Dict., art. Jeremiah). CARL FRIEDRICH KEIL, in his Introduction to the Old Testament, gives us the following specimens, by way of example, of characteristic words and phrases common to both books. “כְּגִינָה, ii. 22, compare with כְּגִינֹר כְּסָבִיב, Jer. vi. 25; xx. 3, 10; xlv. 5; xlix. 29; the frequent use of שָׁבַר בֵּת-עַמִּי and שָׁבַר, ii. 11, 13; iii. 47, 48; iv. 10, compared with Jer. iv. 6, 20; vi. 1, 14;

viii. 11, 21; xiv. 17; xxx. 12, etc.; יָרַד מִים, or יָרַד מִמָּעַה i. 16; ii. 11, 18; iii. 48, 49, compared with Jer. viii. 23; ix. 17; xiii. 17; xiv. 17. Compare in full such passages as iii. 14, and Jer. xx. 7; iii. 15, and Jer. ix. 14; xxiii. 15; iii. 47, and Jer. xlviii. 43; iii. 52, and Jer. xvi. 16; iv. 21, and Jer. xxv. 15, 27; and i. 8, 9, and Jer. xiii. 21, 26. Besides, only a few peculiar words occur as נִשְׁקָר, i. 14; יָעִיב, ii. 1; שָׁתָם, iii. 8; כָּפַשׁ, iii. 16; צָפַר, iv. 8; תַּאֲלֹחַ, and מְנַת־לֵב, iii. 65; and peculiar forms of words, as מִשְׁבֶּת, i. 7; כְּרוּחִים, ii. 14; פִּינָה, ii. 18; iii. 49, etc." (Einleit., § 127, S. 379). We need only refer to Dr. NAEGELSBACH's own Commentary for abounding evidences of coincidences in the use of language in the two books. He makes incessant reference to Jeremiah for the explanation of words and phrases. He often, too with a generous and honorable frankness that we respect and admire, acknowledges that peculiar words and phrases found in Lamentations, occur also in Jeremiah, and sometimes in no other Hebrew writer. Since, then it is conceded that much of the language of this book is characteristic of the writings of Jeremiah, and since we have shown above, that words and phrases used in this Book, and not found in Jeremiah's Prophecies, are not so numerous and of such a character as to render it incredible that Jeremiah wrote this Book, it is not necessary to delay the reader longer, but leave the further development of this argument to the following Commentary.

Paterson, N. J., Nov. 1870.

LAMENTATIONS OF JEREMIAH.

CHAPTER I.

LAMENTATION OF THE DAUGHTER OF ZION OVER THE RUIN OF JERUSALEM AND JUDAH [OR RATHER,
THE LAMENTATION OF THE DAUGHTER OF JERUSALEM OVER THE DESTRUCTION OF THE CITY, THE NATION AND THE TEMPLE.—W. H. H.].

[The song is naturally divided into two parts of equal length. Vers. 1-11 describe the wretched condition of the city. Vers. 12-22 are, more strictly, the lamentation over this condition. In both sections the speaker is the ideal person of the genius or daughter of the city, who twice, vers. 9, 11, interrupts the description of the first section, which is given in the third person, with an outcry of pain uttered in the first person.—W. H. H.]

I. VERS. 1-11.

- ⌘ VER. 1. How sitteth solitary
 The city that was full of people!
 She is become as a widow!
 She that was great among the nations,
 A Princess over the Provinces,—
 Is become tributary.
- ⌘ VER. 2. Bitterly she weepeth in the night,
 And her tears are [constantly] upon her cheeks.
 She hath no comforter
 From among all her lovers:
 All her friends have dealt treacherously with her,
 They have become her enemies.
- ⌘ VER. 3. Judah is gone into exile,
 From oppression and from heavy bondage.
 She dwelleth among the heathen:
 She hath not found rest:
 All her pursuers have overtaken her Amidst her straits.
- ⌘ VER. 4. The ways to Zion are mournful
 Because none come to her appointed services.
 All her gates are destroyed.
 Her priests sigh:
 Her virgins are sorrowful:
 And she, herself,—is in bitterness!
- ⌘ VER. 5. Her adversaries are exalted,
 Her enemies prosper.
 For Jehovah hath afflicted her
 For the greatness of her sins.
 Her young children are gone captives
 Before the adversary.

- 1 VER. 6. And departed from the daughter of Zion
 Is all her beauty.
 Her princes have become like harts
 That find no pasture,
 And go, without strength,
 Before the pursuer.
- 2 VER. 7. Jerusalem remembers, in the days of her tribulation and of her wanderings,
 All her pleasant things that she had in the days of old.
 When her people fall by the hand of the adversary
 And there is no helper for her,—
 Her adversaries behold her—
 They mock at her Sabbaths!
- 3 VER. 8. Jerusalem has grievously sinned;
 Therefore is she become vile.
 All, who honoured her, despise her,
 For they see her nakedness.
 Yea, she herself sigheth
 And turneth backward.
- 4 VER. 9. Her filthiness is on her skirts.
 She considered not her end,
 Therefore she came down wonderfully
 She has no comforter.
 Behold, O Jehovah, my affliction,
 For the enemy magnifieth himself.
- 5 VER. 10. His hand has the oppressor stretched out
 Over all her precious things:
 For she saw heathen
 Come into her sanctuary:
 Of whom Thou didst command
 ‘That they come not into Thy congregation.’
- 6 VER. 11. All her people sigh,
 Seeking for bread;
 They give their precious things for food
 To sustain life.
 See, Jehovah, and consider How wretched I am become!

ANALYSIS.

The logical construction is preserved, although rendered difficult by the constraint of the alphabetical arrangement of the verses. From ver. 1 to the last clause of ver. 11, the poet speaks. [Rather the poet puts this language into the mouth of a third person, who is revealed to us in vers. 9, 11, and still more plainly in the whole of the second part, vers. 12-22, as the ideal representative of the ruined city.—W. H. H.] Vers. 1, 2 present to us the ideal person of Jerusalem, sharply defining the contrast between what she was and what she is now. Ver. 3 personifies in like manner the tribe of Judah. Vers. 4-6 depict the present condition of Jerusalem in ruins, in the midst of which description the ideal person in her grief is introduced; and also, by way of contrast, her successful foe: the forsaken roads of the city, the broken gates, the mourning priests and virgins, the exiled people, and especially the nobles plunged from splendor into the deepest misery, are the separate features which compose this picture. [The especial subject of this description is not the city, strictly speaking, but Zion, the crown and glory of the city. Around the ideal daughter of Zion all the accessories of the picture are drawn. Jerusalem, herself, is the immediate subject of the following verses.—W. H. H.] Ver. 7 relates again to the ideal Jerusalem and informs us how she remembers with pain her former estate, whilst now suffering bitter mockery from her foes. Vers. 8, 9 declare the cause of the judgment, already indicated in ver. 5, namely, the heinous sin of Israel: in consequence of which sin, heathen, ver. 10, had intruded into the sanctuary of Zion, which was forbidden in the law. Finally, ver. 11, to the last clause, describes the distressing famine of the besieged people. From the last clause of ver. 11 to the end of the chapter, the Poet lets Zion herself speak, as she had already done parenthetically in ver. 9.

VERB. 1, 2.

- 1 How doth the city sit solitary, that was full of people! how is she become as a widow! She that was great among the nations, and princess among the provinces, 2 how is she become tributary! She weepeth sore in the night, and her tears are on her cheeks; among all her lovers she hath none to comfort her: all her friends have dealt treacherously with her, they are become her enemies.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 1.—בָּרָדָּ, subst., solitariness, is to be regarded as in the accusative. See iii. 23; Lev. xlii. 46; Jer. xv. 17; xlix. 31, לְבָרָדָּ, Num. xxlii. 9; Mic. vii. 14.—רַבָּתִי. The רַבָּ is archaic. See OLSEN, §123, d. [In שָׂרָתִי also. The paragogic י was, originally, perhaps, a mark of the genitive, as the corresponding letter in Arabic. Occurs in poetry and in compound names, as אֶלְנִי-צֶדֶק, מְלִכִי-צֶדֶק, HENDERSON.] The archaic י, not infrequent in Jeremiah, x. 17 (K'tib); xlii. 23; xlix. 16; li. 13. Yet this particular word occurs only here.—רַבָּ, great, in the qualitative sense, not merely multus, but also magnus, potens, great, powerful, occurs often; Ps. xlviii. 3; Is. lxiii. 1; liii. 12; Jer. xli. 1. See מְנַחֵם, et sim., and רַבָּה, the metropolis of the Ammonites. The phrase רַבָּ רַבָּ occurs only here. [See Intr., Add. Rem. (1), p. 29.]—The כַּ after שָׂרָתִי indicates the object over which the Princess rules. See FUERST. [BLATNEY, BOOTHROYD, translate over, instead of among.]—שָׂרָה is synonymous with רַבָּה, e.g., שָׂר מְנַחֵם, Gen. xxxvii. 36; xxxix. 1, et al., and כְּרִימִים, שָׂר, Dan. i. 7, 9, et al. are synonymous with רַבָּ רַבָּ and רַבָּ כִּי. The sing. שָׂרָה excepting as the proper name Sarah, occurs only here. Plural in Judges v. 29; Is. xlix. 23; 1 Kings xi. 3; Ezech. i. 18, shows that it is an old word and in earlier times peculiar to poetry. [See Intr., Add. Rem. (2), p. 29.]—כִּי, province, satrapy, in sing. occurs only in books of Ezra (ii. 1), Nehemiah (i. 3; vii. 6; xi. 3), Ecclesiastes (v. 7), Daniel (viii. 2; xi. 24), and especially Esther (i. 1, 22; iii. 12, 14, etc.). In plu. in Esth. i. 3; viii. 9; ix. 3, 4, 16; Ezech. xix. 8; 1 Kings xx. 14, 15, 17, 19 [not 2 Kings xx. 19, a mistake of FUERST copied by NABGELS-BACH], Eccles. ii. 8. Its use in Ezekiel and Kings shows that it was not unknown in the time of Jeremiah. [See Intr., Add. Rem. (2), p. 30.]—כִּסֵּם. W. ROBERTSON, Key to Heb. Bib., derives from כָּסַם, to melt, dissolve, “a consuming of strength, virium dissolutio et confectio.” FUERST, from same verb taken in a secondary signification, to split, divide, separate, sunder, hence metaph. to number, measure, distribute. The only evidence of such a secondary signification of the verb is in the derivatives themselves, כָּסַם and כִּסְּהָ. The old quaint idea seems better. “כִּסֵּם from כָּסַם, because it doth melt and dissolve, as it were, the substance of those who are forced to be tributaries.” GESSENIUS says this is not “tolerable,” and derives from כָּסַם to number. But there is a word already from that root, כָּכַס, meaning tribute in the strict sense, while כִּסֵּם means any sort of tribute-service or bond-service (see crit. notes below), having a sense that cannot be extracted from a verb signifying to number.—W. H. H.]

Ver. 2.—בָּכָה. The infinitive construct before a finite verb expresses intensity, after it continuity. She weepeth sore or sorely, BROUGHTON, E. V., BLATNEY, BOOTHROYD, HENDERSON, or bitterly, NOYES, not continual'y, as old ENG. VERS., DIODATI, FRENCH VERS., WORDSWORTH, and NABGELS-BACH.—W. H. H.]—לֹחִי never occurs in Jeremiah. [See Intr., Add. Rem. (2), p. 30.]—Jeremiah uses the Piel בָּכַח, xvi. 7; xxxi. 13; but not the phrase בָּכַח אֵין, occurring in this chapter four times, and elsewhere only in Eccl. iv. 1. [See Intr., Add. Rem. (3), p. 30.]—Jeremiah uses אֶהְיֶה אֶלֶיךָ xx. 4, 6; xxix. 23; v. 8; vii. 5, etc.; בָּכַר iii. 8, 11, 20; v. 11; xli. 6, etc.; אָבִי, frequently, vi. 25; xv. 11; xviii. 17, etc.—לֹא יָבִיטִי occurs elsewhere only in Ps. cxxxix. 22.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Ver. 1. How, אֵיכָה. The second and fourth chapters also begin with this word. It is used by Jeremiah (viii. 8; xlviii. 17), and not seldom in Deuteronomy (i. 12; vii. 17; xii. 80; xviii. 21). In Isaiah it occurs once, i. 21, a passage which seems to have been in our Poet's mind. There, as here, the ideal person of Jerusalem, i. e., of the city of Jerusalem (in distinction from the tribe of Judah, to which ver. 3 relates), is the subject. The personification is apparent: 1. From the expression, sits solitary. 2. From the words, as a widow. The comparison with a person shows that the subject of comparison is regarded as a person. 3. The singular forms in ver. 2, she weeps, her tears, her cheeks, etc., as certainly indicate a personification, as the plural forms would prove a reference to the concrete multitude of the exiles. The Poet then has in his eye, not, perhaps, the collective person of the exiled people, but the ideal person of the city of Jerusalem, now ruined. This person he sees in the spirit, sitting solitary amidst the devastated holy places.—Doth the city sit solitary. Solitary, because she has lost her inhabitants, her children. This is evident from the antithesis,—the city that was full of people. [NOYES: “There are several Roman coins extant, representing on the one side the emperor Vespasian, and on the other a woman (the daughter of Zion) sitting upon the ground under a palm tree, in a mournful attitude, and having around her a heap of arms, shields, etc. The legend is JUDÆA CAPTA—Judea taken.”]—That was full of people! In regard to sense and construction, see Jer. li. 13; 1 Sam. ii. 5. [HENDERSON: “It is impossible to determine what was the extent of the population of ancient Jerusalem. Before the revolt under Rehoboam it must have been very great, especially during the celebration of the three annual festivals, when the males congregated there from all parts of the country: and even after that event, there is reason to believe that, as the metropolis of the southern kingdom, the number of inhabitants was considerable. It not only continued to be the resort of the tribes of Judah and Benjamin, but was one of the principal mercantile cities of the East."—How. [The repetition of the How in the second and the last clauses of the verse, as in our English version, is not only unnecessary, but mars the rhythmical construction and interrupts the consecutive flow of thought. There is no more propriety in its repetition in ver. 1, than there would be in ver. 2, which in form and matter is a continuation of ver. 1. The particle, as used in the beginning of the verse, is ejaculatory, not interrogative. It rouses and directs attention, with fine poetical effect, to the image of the ideal Jerusalem, once representing a city full of people, now seen as a dejected woman, sitting solitary, as in the deepest grief. The attention thus gained, the description goes on to the end of ver. 2, adding feature to feature, and circumstance to circumstance, with admirable art and graphic power, till the picture is complete.—W. H. H.]—Is she—she is become as a widow! In Is. i. 21, the faithful city has become a harlot. Here, where we have a poem not of invective and denunciation, but of lamentation, the populous city has become as a widow. For she is no longer (בְּיָמֶיהָ) a married one, since she no longer enjoys communion with Jehovah, her Husband (בְּיָמֶיהָ). See DELITZSCH on Isaiah liv. 1 sqq.). She is a woman forsaken (Is. liv. 6), and the reproach of widowhood (Is. liv. 6) rests upon her. The expression as a widow (בְּאַלְמָנָה, as one forsaken, widowed) implies that Jerusalem has not lost her husband utterly and forever, but she is only separated from him for a period. There is in the particle as a foreshadowing of reunion. See the expression as widows in v. 3.—She that was great among the nations. [Dr. NAEGLS-BACH's punctuation, which is the punctuation also of the Sept., Vulg., and some more modern versions, requires us to connect these words with the preceding declaration. She is become as a widow, the great one (Die Grosse) among the nations. This is, however, in violation of the masoretic punctuation, and does not seem to strengthen the meaning that Dr. N. derives from the expression as a widow. See critical notes below. Nor is there a necessary antithesis between being as a widow and having been great among the nations. If we adopt the punctuation of the Sept. and Vulg., we should adopt the translation in full of one or the other of those versions, both of which do preserve an antithesis. The Sept. reads She is become as a widow, i. e., a lone, forsaken woman, who was filled with nations. The Vulg. reads, She the lady of nations became as a widow. The punctuation in our present Hebrew Bibles, which is retained by our English version, BROUGHTON, GATTACKER, NOYES, and GERLACH, certainly makes the sense clearer and the thoughts more copious. The city sits solitary that was full of people! She is become as a widow! She that was great among the nations. . . . is become tributary.—W. H. H.]—And princess among the provinces. That not only Israelitish, but foreign provinces also, were at times governed by Jerusalem, is sufficiently established in history. [See David's conquests and sovereignty over the neighboring states, 2 Sam. viii. 1-4; x. 6-19; the extent of Solomon's dominions, 1 Kings iv. 21, 24; 2 Chron. ix. 23, 24; the power of Judah in the reign of Jehoshaphat, 2 Chron. xvii. 10, 11, and in that of Uzziah, 2 Chron. xxvi. 6-8. See also Ezra iv. 20, "There have been mighty kings also over Jerusalem, which have ruled over all countries beyond the river; and toll, tribute, and custom, was paid unto them."—W. H. H.]—How is she become—is become. [See remarks on How above.]—Tributary. ["Obliged to pay tribute-service. This is the common meaning of the word." NOYES.]

יִשְׁבֶּה בָּרָד, sitteth solitary. This cannot mean dwelleth alone. For the isolated location of the city could be no misfortune, since contact with heathen neighbors was forbidden as injurious. (See Num. xxiii. 9; Lev. xx. 24, 26; Deut. xxxiii. 23; Ex. xxiii. 31-33; Judg. ii., iii.) Nor can יִשְׁבֶּה have the sense of situation, place of, for יִשְׁבֶּה never has that sense in the Hebrew. See GESSENIER, Thes. In Ps. cxxii. 5; cxxv. 1; Zech. ii. 8; xii. 6; xiv. 10 it has either the active signification of inhabiting, or the passive of being inhabited (see Jer. xvii. 6, 25; xxx. 18; 1. 13, 39, et al.). That this last named passive signification does not suit here is evident from the contradiction involved by the words solitary and as a widow. We can only translate How sits solitary the city. [FURST, Lex., יִשְׁבֶּה, to sit, as an expression of being bowed down, struck down and forsaken, with אֶלְמָנָה, Is. iii. 26; Job ii. 13; יָגֵר, Is. xlvii. 1; Lam. i. 1; iii. 28; כְּשִׁוְכִים, Ezr. ix. 3; יָגֵר, Gen. xxxviii. 11; Is. xlvii. 8."] רַבְּתִי It is probable that the form רַבְּתִי, in the kindred passage, Is. i. 21, influenced the choice of the form of the word here.—בְּאַלְמָנָה, as a widow. In antithesis to רַבְּתִי עַם, full of people, bereaved of children, childless, would be first suggested; but this word occurs only once, Is. xlix. 21. יָגֵר, also, occurs once only (in connection with אֶלְמָנָה), Jer. xviii. 21. יָגֵר is the barren woman, כְּשִׁפְלָה or כְּשִׁפְלָה is abortion faciens, Ex. xxxiii. 26; 2 Kings ii. 19, 21, or infanticida, Ez. xxxvi. 13. אֶלְמָנָה suits admirably, in that it involves the impossibility of bearing children in the future. And that is what the Poet would say. Jerusalem is placed in a condition in which it is impossible for her to become a mother of children, Ps. cxiii. 9. The other feature, that she is also a widow robbed of the children already born to her, is further brought out in what follows. I do not believe, therefore, that Jerusalem is here called a widow, because she is bereaved "of king and princes, and the protection and guidance of rulers," as VITRINGA and others after him (lately ENGELHARDT), appealing to Is. xlvii. 8, have been inclined to think. Besides that, בְּאַלְמָנָה is not synonymous with לֵאמָּה, RASCHI has already remarked. Compare לֵאמָּה at the close of this verse, and לוֹנָה, Is. i. 21. The word אֶלְמָנָה is often found in Jeremiah, vii. 6;

xv. 8; xviii. 21; xii. 8. [HENDERSON is too positive when he says, "The בְּ in בְּאֵלֶיךָ is simply that of comparison, and is not intended to express any hope that she would be restored from her widowed state, as JARCHI fancifully supposes." Comparison is not assertion: a thing is not what it is compared with. If בְּ then does simply indicate a comparison, yet it leaves a possibility, and hence a hope of restoration from a widowed state; and there is certainly more than a 'fanciful' distinction between being a widow, לְאֵלֶיךָ, and being like one, בְּאֵלֶיךָ.—W. H. H.]

—הָיְתָה לְכֶם, has become tributary. The expression is found in Genesis (xlix. 15) and in Deuteronomy (xx. 11); and is especially frequent in 1 Kings (v. 27, 28; ix. 15, 21) and in Judges (i. 28, 30, 33, 35). It is also found in Isaiah (xxii. 8). The etymology and fundamental meaning are not quite certain. At all the places cited the word indicates bond-service, or rather, collectively, services (see עָבַד, Gen. xlix. 15; Josh. xvi. 10; 1 Kings ix. 21). It first occurs in the sense of tributum, a money tax, very late, Esth. x. 1. It is, however, unimportant whether we take the word in our text in the one sense or the other. Nor can we from this word determine the exact period of time, as J. D. MICHAELIS would do, when he says: "Therefore she is still standing, but has become tributary. This first happened under the Egyptians" (he has here in mind evidently 2 Kings xxiii. 33). "To what time then is this to be referred,—to that of the elegy on Josiah, or to that of a later period?" If Jerusalem was no longer standing, and not a human soul dwelt there, yet the place on which the ruins of Jerusalem remained had become, with the whole land, a part of the territory subjected to the Chaldeans.

Ver. 2. She weepeth sore in the night.—She weeps and weeps the night throughout. [This translation is beautiful and expository, but for grammatical reasons the E. V. is to be preferred. See the Gramm. Notes.—W. H. H.] The sorrowing widow weeps in the night. Not in the night-time only, in distinction from day-time,—nor, as EWALD prefers, 'until the night.' For why should she not weep during the night also? Precisely this is the meaning of the poet. She weeps in the night, but not only a part of the night, for that were nothing wonderful, but so that her weeping fills up the time which is usually spent otherwise. So is בְּלֵילָהּ to be understood in Num. xiv. 1, "and the people wept that night." See Jer. vi. 5; xxxvi. 80, et al. [HENDERSON: "To express the more aggravated character of the weeping, it is represented as indulged in even during the night—the period of rest and quiet."—And her tears are on her cheeks. 'Tears,' Jer. viii. 23; ix. 17, et al. The absence of a predicate index, which renders the supplement of the copula 'are' necessary, gives the idea evidently that the tears on her cheeks are constantly there, have fixed there, as it were, their permanent place. [HENRY: "Nothing dries away sooner than a tear, yet fresh griefs extort fresh tears, so that her cheeks are never free from them."—Among all her lovers she hath none to comfort her.—She has no comforter.—[That this phrase has an important meaning is to be inferred by its recurrence four times in this chapter (vers. ii. 9; xvii. 21; see also ver. 16), and from its being an unusual form, occurring elsewhere only in Eccl. iv. 1. It can have no common-place meaning. It refers indirectly to the loss of the Comforter—their God.—W. H. H.]—All her friends have dealt treacherously with her, they are become her enemies. The words lovers and friends indicate the human supports on which Jerusalem foolishly and presumptuously believed she could rely, especially all those nations whose friendship she had so often preferred, instead of trusting in Jehovah. See ver. 19; Jer. ii. 18, 18, 33, 36, 37; xxii. 20, 22; Hos. ii. 7 sqq.; Ezek. xxiii. These places show, in harmony with history, that the nations toward which Israel felt itself drawn in amorous love, but by which at last they were not only deserted, but treated with even positive hostility, were especially Assyria, Babylon and Egypt. With reference to Egypt, see particularly Ezek. xxix. 6, 7, 16. See EWALD in loc. [HENDERSON: "The lovers and friends were those neighboring states which were allies of the Hebrews,—and their idol-gods, which they worshipped, and in which they trusted. Egypt especially was the object of their confidence, but not even she durst venture to come to their help against the Chaldeans. Those in the more immediate vicinity actually joined the northern enemy on his irruption into the country. 2 Kings xxiv. 2."]

I. 3.

- 3 Judah is gone into captivity, because of affliction, and because of great servitude; she dwelleth among the heathen, she findeth no rest: all her persecutors overtook her between the straits.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 3.—גִּלְתָּרָה, see Jer. i. 3.—עָנִי, found in Lam. i. 3, 7, 9; iii. 1, 19, does not occur in Jeremiah; yet Isaiah uses it xlviii. 10: occurs also in Pentateuch; Gen. xvi. 11; xxix. 32; xxxi. 42; Ex. iii. 7; Deut. xvi. 3; xxvi. 7, etc.; in Psalms ix. 14; xxv. 18; xxxi. 8, and in other writings of earlier origin than Lam.—כָּרַב is found in Is. vii. 22; xxiv. 22; Nah. iii. 4, et al.: Jeremiah says אָלַרַב, xxx. 14, 15, or כָּרַב, xlii. 22.—עָנְדָה does not occur in Jeremiah, yet frequently in Penta-teach, and in Is. xiv. 3; xxxii. 17; xxviii. 21.—נָחַם occurs Gen. viii. 9; Deut. xxviii. 65; Is. xxxiv. 14, is not used by Jeremiah; he uses נָחַם, xlv. 3. [See Intr. Add. R. (4), p. 30. (0), p. 31.]—נָחַם occurs in Jer. xlii. 16 (see also xxxix. 5; lii. 8.)

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Ver. 3. The tribe of Judah is the subject here, as the city of Jerusalem was in vers. 1, 2, and is conceived of similarly as an ideal person.—Judah is gone into captivity, because of affliction and because of great servitude. Into exile is Judah gone from oppression and severe servitude. It has been correctly remarked that from oppression and from hard servitude cannot refer to the involuntary exile of Judah, since it is added she findeth no rest. For who may expect rest for a people carried into captivity? But voluntary fugitives might hope to find rest. Of such voluntary exiles, Jeremiah speaks in xl. 11, 12, and from Jer. xliii. 4-7 we learn that all these finally agreed together to seek rest in Egypt. That they found no rest there exactly agrees with what the prophet had declared, xlii. 13-22, to the people stubbornly persisting in the flight to Egypt. When the Poet speaks here of Judah as a fugitive, seeking rest and finding none, the reason for his doing so may be surmised from the fact that he himself belonged to that part of the people that were living in exile. We may suppose, also, that he regarded this part of the nation as a representative of the whole nation, because they consisted of people who were at least free. It is much like saying,—Judah is no longer with those who have become mixed with a foreign people as slaves. If it yet survive, it survives in a voluntary exile, where, notwithstanding its distressed state and reduced numbers, it still retains at least its personal liberty. [BLAYNEY: "Our translators, who have rendered, Judah is gone into captivity because of affliction and because of great servitude, seem to have adopted the notion of the Chaldee Paraphrast, who represents the Jews to have been carried into captivity in retaliation of their having oppressed the widow and the fatherless among them, and prolonged illegally the bondage of their brethren who had been sold them for slaves." HENDERSON adopts this view, that Judah is here represented as suffering captivity on account of, or because of her oppressing and cruelly enslaving her own people, see Jer. xxxiv. But the other view, that Judah sought by voluntary exile to escape the oppression and enslavement of the Chaldeans, is recommended by the reasons given above, and is adopted by BLAYNEY,

C. B. and J. D. MICHAELIS, BOOTHROYD and NOYES. HOUBIGANT, quoted approvingly by BOOTHROYD in his Heb. Bib., connects the words "from oppression and hard servitude" with the words "she findeth no rest," an obvious and awkward attempt to escape the difficulty of the supposed causal sense of נָחַם. HUGH BROUGHTON translates Judah leaveth country after affliction and much bondage.—W. H. H.]—[She dwelleth among the heathen, lit., nations, i. e., the heathen nations. The word dwelleth conveys an idea of a settled permanent abode, not required by the Hebrew, יָשָׁבָה. The German, sitzet, which NÆGELSBACH uses, is better (see ver. 1). The fugitive, fleeing before her pursuers, finds at last a place among the heathen, where she sits down in hoped-for security: but in vain; her pursuers overtake her, as the hart is found by the hunter, in the straits or defiles of the mountain, from which there is no escape. See ver. 6, they flee like harts before the pursuer.—W. H. H.]—She findeth no rest: all her persecutors, pursuers, in antithesis to all her lovers and all her friends in ver. 2 (see i. 6; iv. 19; Jer. xv. 15; xvii. 18; xx. 11) overtook her between the straits. נָחַם (Sing. נָחַם) occurs, besides here, only Pa. cxvi. 8; cxviii. 5. It can mean neither ἀνίσταται (so Sept., which erroneously takes it for a participle), nor termini, ὁρίσται (so Chald., Venitian Greek, et al.). It means angustia, narrow defiles from which there is no outlet. The figure is taken from the chase. See the German phrase, "in die Engen treiben," "to drive one into straits." [W. ROBERTSON: "נָחַם, a streight, or a streighting distress." FURST: "to take one in the straits, i. e., to get one at last into our power, a proverbial phrase." The present use of the English word straits (as 'reduced to straits,' 'in great straits') explains the sense here, but does not justify the translation, overtook her between the straits.—W. H. H.] The fugitive Judah sits indeed in the midst of a heathenish people, but has found there no rest. She would flee still further, were it possible. But whither could the Jews, with their wives, their children, and all their goods, have fled beyond the desert-surrounded Egypt? They dwelt there, it is true, but they dwelt amidst straits. All their pursuers (and that there were enough of them in Egypt, old and new, is evident from Jer. xlii. 12, 18, 26 sqq.) could reach them there.

I. 4-6.

- 4 The ways of Zion do mourn, because none come to the solemn feasts: all her gates are desolate; her priests sigh, her virgins are afflicted, and she is in bitterness. Her adversaries are the chief, her enemies prosper; for the LORD hath afflicted her for the multitude of her transgressions: her children are gone into captivity before the enemy. And from the daughter of Zion all her beauty is departed: her princes are become like harts that find no pasture; and they are gone without strength before the pursuer.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 4.—אָבֵל, adj. mournful [not desert, waste, devastated, as FUZZAT says, which destroys the beautiful personification—W. H. H.], occurs Gen. xxxvii. 35; Is. lvii. 18, et al., never in Jeremiah. The verb אָבַל he uses, in the same sense as the adjective here (v. 28; xli. 4, 11; xiv. 2; xxiii. 10) [and also the noun אָבֵל, vi. 26, et al.—W. H. H.] Isaiah uses the adjective, lvii. 18; lxi. 23.—כָּבֵל, see Jer. ii. 15; ix. 10, 11.—The expression בָּנָא (see Gen. xxiii. 10, 18) is not found in Jeremiah. כְּוִינֶרֶךְ is found in Jeremiah twice, viii. 7; xlv. 17, both times in the sense of tempus fixum. In the Lamentations the word occurs six times, and always in the sense of a time of feast, a festival, i. 4, 15; ii. 6, 7, 22, or the place of a feast, ii. 6. [It may have here the sense of an appointed time. Ordinary services in the Temple are neglected. None flock to Zion at the usual times of service.—W. H. H.]—The part שְׁוֹמֵם is not in Jeremiah: he uses the part. Niph., xxxiii. 10, and שָׁכַם, xli. 11. The plur. ending ִי (see iv. 3, K'tib), is not found in Jeremiah.—The root אָנַח Jeremiah does not use, either in a verbal or a substantive form (see Lam. I. 8, 11, 21).—נִגְוֹת, see הוֹנָה below.—כִּרְ Jeremiah does use, ii. 19; iv. 18.

Ver. 5.—As shown above, הוֹי לְרֹאשׁ is a Deuteronomic, שָׁלַח a Jeremic expression. For grammatical form of latter, see OLSH., § 233, b. הוֹנָה never occurs in Jeremiah, but frequently in Lamentations, i. 4, 12; iii. 32, 33: elsewhere, Is. ii. 23; Zeph. iii. 18. [Vulgate derives it from הָנַח, which sometimes means to speak; quia Dominus locutus est super eam; Douay, because the Lord hath spoken against her. But SEPT., SYR. and Versions generally derive it from נָה.—W. H. H.]—עֵל־רֹכַב is entirely Jeremic (see on כִּרְבַּב, ver. 3). פָּשַׁע in Jeremiah only once, v. 6.—עוֹלֵל, Jer. xlv. 7; עוֹלָל, Jer. vi. 11; ix. 20.—הָלַךְ שְׁכֵנִי is peculiar to this place. שְׁכֵנִי cannot well be an accusative, since to go into exile is always elsewhere expressed by פָּשַׁע הָלַךְ שְׁכֵנִי, see ver. 18. [HENDERSON: her children are gone captives before the enemy.]—The sing. צָר, which is frequent in Lam. (i. 7, 10; ii. 4; iv. 12), never occurs in Jeremiah: he uses only the plural (xxx. 16; xlv. 10) and צָרָה (iv. 31; vi. 24, et al.).

Ver. 6.—כִּי־נָצַח, for forsaken, lost, is peculiar. [HENDERSON: “For כִּי־נָצַח the K’ri and some MSS. read more correctly כִּבְתָּה. The phrase is also thus quoted in the Rabboth.” This best suits the rhythm.—W. H. H.] הָדָר־ is never found in Jeremiah; nor אָלַי (yet see אֵלֶיךָ, xiv. 6); nor כִּרְעָה (Jeremiah always says כִּרְעִית, x. 21; xxiii. 1; xxv. 36). We find expressions in Jeremiah analogous to כֹּחַ בָּלֵא יוֹעִל, v. 7, בָּלֵא אֱלֹהִים, לִרְךָ־בָּלֵא is found in Jeremiah, but only with suffixes, xv. 15; xvii. 18; xx. 11.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

These verses contain a description of the present condition of the city and people of Jerusalem [or, a new aspect of their condition is presented.—We have here another of those changes which impart to these poems a highly dramatic character. A third personage is introduced,—“the daughter of Zion.” The ideal person here is not that of the city of Jerusalem, formerly in outward splendor and estate a queen among the nations, now fallen and humbled (vers. 1, 2), nor yet that of the tribe of Judah, or of the theocratic people, now a fugitive among the heathen (ver. 3),—but of Zion, formerly the seat of the theocracy, the abode of God, the Temple where Judah and Jerusalem worshipped, now forsaken and despoiled. No longer do the people gather to her appointed solemnities. Silence reigns on Zion, broken only by the sobs of her priests and the moaning of her virgins, a higher evidence than either the ruined city or the exiled people, that the glory was departed from Israel.—W. H. H.]

Ver. 4. The ways of Zion, The way to Zion, those ways which lead to Zion: not the streets of the city, as ROSENMUELLER thinks, for the latter are called חִיצוֹת (see Hos. vii. 1 with vi. 9), do mourn, are mournful (Prosopopeia, as, e.g., ii. 19; Jer. xiv. 2; xxiii. 10; Am. i. 2), because none come to the solemn feasts, forsaken by those who used to come to her feasts [because there are none coming to her appointed services. Appointed assemblies, including all occasions of stated worship, whether daily sacrifices or annual festivals, would more correctly interpret the sense than either “feasts,” “solemn feasts,” or “festivals.”—W. H. H.]—All her gates are desolate, destroyed. Concerning the city itself, its gates are destroyed. But ruined gates are the sign of a ruined city. [“Destroyed,” so NÆGELSBACH, zerstört, Sept. ἡφαιγενται=razed to the ground, Vulg. destructæ. E. V. and modern Versions generally read desolate. It is the gates of Zion, not the gates of the city of Jerusalem, that are here referred to. Those sacred barriers are removed. The holy place has lost its sanctity. It is open now to the intrusion of any who please to enter. See ver. 10: “She hath seen that the heathen entered into her sanctuary whom Thou didst command that they should not enter into Thy congregation.” What could more forcibly express, in accordance with Jewish ideas, the idea that the theocratic glory had departed from Israel?—W. H. H.]—Her priests sigh: her virgins are afflicted, sorrowful. Two classes of the inhabitants are named,—the priests and the virgins: the former the nobility, the latter the flower and ornament of the nation. The former sigh under heavy oppression; the latter, who formerly rendered every festival attractive, with dances and pastimes (see Jer. xxxi. 13; HERZ. Real. Encyc., XV., pp. 414, 415), are now sorrowful. It is thus intimated that every possibility of making a joyous festival is gone. See Jer. vii. 34; xvi. 9; xxv. 10; xxxiii. 11; comp. xxx. 19. The Sept. reads, instead of sorrowful, ἀποβρυαι=led away; the translation evidently of נִהְיֹות, which either really stood in the text, or was erroneously substituted by the Alexandrian for the rare word נִגְוֹת. EWALD follows the Sept. Incorrectly, it seems to me. נִגְוֹת is sufficiently expressive, if it be taken as an indication of the prevailing grief and in antithesis to the indications of the public rejoicings that existed in former times. [The mention of "the priests" particularly shows that the sacred precincts of Zion, where they ministered, and where "the virgins" went up to the solemn feasts with joy and gladness, are before the Poet's eye. To say that the priests are mentioned because they constituted "the nobility" of the inhabitants of the city, is not only awkward, but untrue. NOYES translates the last clause Her virgins wail: a meaning of the original word not licensed by authority.—W. H. H.]—And she is in bitterness. In these words the whole is summed up. [It is, perhaps, impossible to give in English the exquisite force of the original. NÄGELSBACH nearly reproduces it in German, "Und ihr—ist wehe."—W. H. H.] Here it is evident that the ideal person of Zion is the embodiment of all the particular members and ranks of the community (des volkslebens). [If this were indisputably evident, it would not militate with the fact that Zion represented the religious life as Judah did the political life of the people.—W. H. H.]—This relative conclusion shows that the Poet proposes to pass to something new. In fact, ver. 4 describes the positive sorrows and afflictions of the people: ver. 5, a. b., the good fortune of her enemies as the natural reciprocal effect of the misfortunes of Judah; vers. 5, c., 6, the negative side of the painful experience of the people, namely, the losses they sustained.

Ver. 5. Her adversaries are the chief, lit., have become the head [i. e., her superiors. BLAYNEY and NOYES: or, the head over her. BOOTHROYD.] In Deut. xxviii. 13 a promise is made to Israel, if obedient, "and the Lord shall make thee the head and not the tail," and in same chapter, ver. 44, the reverse is threatened, if disobedient. The Poet, without doubt, had these passages in his mind.—Her enemies prosper. The darkness of Israel's sorrows is deepened by the brilliant prosperity of her enemies. The expression occurs in same sense, Jer. xii. 1. See Ps. cxxii. 6; Job xii. 6.—For the LORD hath afflicted her for the multitude of her transgressions. This advantage on the part of their enemies had not happened by chance, nor by mere arbitrariness or unrighteousness on the side of God, but by an act of Divine rectitude in the punishment of Israel for their sins. What is professedly made conspicuous in ver. 8 is here anticipated. [Observe, in connection with Zion, as the representative of the religious element of the theocratic idea, in distinction from the national, the name Jehovah is first introduced, and the calamities suffered by the people are first distinctly ascribed to their sins;—the sins especially of priests and ministers of religion, and of hypocrisy, formalism and idolatry on the part of the people.—W. H. H.]—Her children are gone into captivity, her young children are gone captives. From here to end of ver. 6 the Poet describes what Judah has lost. And first, her children. עֲלֵלִים are little children (see ii. 20; iv. 4; Jer. vi. 11; ix. 20). These are compelled as captives to go forth before the oppressor into foreign lands. See Joel iv. 2, 8.—Before the enemy. [The word ad- versary (so BROUGHTON) is preferred to enemy, E. V., because the word in Hebrew is the same as that rendered "adversaries" in the first clause. Oppressor and oppressors might be well substituted.—W. H. H.] What renders this more dreadful is the idea that the little children are torn away from parents and brothers and sisters, to be driven as merchandise by their purchasers, some to one place and some to another. [HEXDERSON: "In the representations which we find on ancient sculptures nothing is more affecting than to observe females and young children driven as captives before their conquerors." Observe, young children are mentioned in connection with Zion because they, in a peculiar sense, are the care of the church, of the religious rather than the political rulers, the lambs of the flock entrusted to the spiritual shepherds of Israel. Nothing could more forcibly express, in accordance with Jewish ideas, the fact that God had forsaken His people, than that the heathen were suffered, without Divine hindrance, to carry away these young children, the children of the covenant, into captivity and slavery. It is this thought that constitutes the poetic climax, showing how severely Jehovah afflicted Zion for her sins.—W. H. H.]

Ver. 6. And from the daughter of Zion all her beauty is departed. Zion has lost, not only her dearest and most precious ones, her children, but also her beauty, her glory. This last feature is represented by the princes, with whom, and before them all, the king is to be classed. [What then was the beauty of Zion—the King and the Princes, or God Himself? The beauty of Zion was the presence of Jehovah and the maintenance of His worship on the Holy Mount. See Lam. ii. 1, 6; 1 Sam. iv. 21, 22; Ezek. vii. 20-22; Ps. l. 2, "Out of Zion, the perfection of beauty, God hath shined," Ps. xcvi. 9, "Oh, worship the Lord in the beauty of holiness," בְּהַדְרֵת קִדְשׁ, Ps. cxxxii. 13, 14. The beauty of Zion departed when God forsook His people, suffered the Temple to be destroyed, Jer. liii. 13, and the ordinances of worship to be discontinued. The condition of her princes, like hunted harts, pursued and overtaken, is the consequence of the destruction of Zion, whence they are driven forth, deprived of all spiritual nourishment. God is no longer with them. No more are they fed with the bread of Heaven; and therefore, like starved and parched harts, they fall an easy prey to their pursuers.—W. H. H.]—Her princes are become like harts that find no pasture; and they are gone without strength before the enemy. These noble and fleet-footed animals lose, by hunger, their strength and the power of flight. They are caught and driven at pleasure. So the princes of Zion, formerly her pride and strength, are driven forth by the pursuer. The Sept. and JEROME have κριοί, arietes, = rams. They read or understood אֵילִם. But evidently אֵיל is the stag or hart (see Deut. xii. 15; xiv. 5; xv. 22): rams would not suit in this connection, since rams do not belong to those animals of the chase, which only suffer themselves to be taken by men, when hunger deprives them of power to escape.

I. 7.

7 Jerusalem remembered in the days of her affliction, and of her miseries, all her pleasant things that she had in the days of old, when her people fell into the hand of the enemy, and none did help her: the adversaries saw her, and did mock at her sabbaths.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 7.—יָמֵי עָנִיָּה is not the object of זָכְרָה, but indicates the time, as is evident from the absence of ׀ before זָכְרָה. The accusative יָמֵי answers, as frequently, the question, When? See my Gr., §70, d. [BLAYNEY: "Houbigant supposes that we ought to read יָמֵי בְיָמֵי; but I am inclined to think that it is not the בְּ, but the יָ, which has been sunk before יָמֵי, by means of the preceding word having been terminated with the same letter,—a mistake of which we find numerous instances originating from the same cause. יָמֵי signifies during the days, or since they began, as יָמֵי קָדֶם does presently after, in or during former days." BOOTHROYD quotes this note with approval in his Hebrew Bible. HENDERSON says, "in יָמֵי there is an ellipsis of בְּ, of which there are numerous examples." But nouns may be "used absolutely to express the relations of time," see GREEK'S Gr., §274, 2.—W. H. H.]—כָּרָדִים, not from כָּרַר, but from רָדַר, dissipari, vagari (Hos. xii. 1; Jer. ii. 31), is vagatio, erratio, ulla extorris et erratica (FUEST). The word is found, besides here and iii. 19, only at Is. lviii. 7. [Dr J. A. ALEXANDER translates כָּרָדִים כְּרָדִים, the afflicted, the homeless, and remarks, "LOWTH'S version—the wandering poor—is now commonly regarded as substantially correct. כָּרָדִים is properly an abstract, meaning wandering (from רָדַר), here used for the concrete wanderers." Accepting the opinion of LOWTH and ALEXANDER, I have put "wanderings" in the text. FUEST, in his concordance, derives the word from רָדַר, as above, but, in his Lexicon, from כָּרַר, and translates it expulsion, persecution, misery. W. ROBERTSON says, "כָּרָדִים, her *mourning*s, her lamentations, her miseries or calamities, or her rebellions, for the word may be referred to the root רָדַר, in Hiph., to mourn, to lament; or to the root כָּרַר, to rebel." BLAYNEY says it "comes from רָדַר, to descend from a higher to a lower condition," and so translates it abatement. The variety of meanings put upon the word is indicated in the following English Versions: BROUGHTON, exertion; BLAYNEY, abusement; BOOTHROYD, misery; HENDERSON, persecution; NOYES, oppression. But wanderings is evidently best supported by its use and most natural derivation, and suits the meaning here, but in iii. 19 it seems to denote simply a condition of wretchedness.—W. H. H.]—כְּחֹכְרָהּ, only here and ver. 11, K'tib. Neither כְּחֹכְרָהּ, nor כְּחֹכְרָהּ, found in Jeremiah. He uses only חֹכְרָהּ (iii. 19; xii. 10; xxv. 34).—כִּי־יָמֵי קָדֶם, in Jeremiah we have יָמֵי־קָדֶם, xlv. 26.—יָד בְּיָד could be into the hand [E. V., BLAYNEY, BOOTHROYD, HENDERSON, NOYES] instead of by [BROUGHTON]; the difference is not important.—[BLAYNEY: "Instead of הָאֵלֶּיךָ רָאִהוּ יָצְרִים I propose to read הָאֵלֶּיךָ יָצְרִים." An ingenious, but unnecessary, unauthorized change.—W. H. H.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Ver. 7. Jerusalem. [Here occurs another of those sudden changes which give to this poem its highly dramatic character. In the preceding verses, which may be properly regarded as introductory to all that follows, the city, the nation, and the church have been successively introduced. Now Jerusalem is named for the first time. Jerusalem, here, must be regarded as generic and comprehensive; the representative of the theocratic idea; the head of all the cities of Israel, the type of its nationality, the seat of its worship, where God dwelt in its consecrated Zion. The ideal persons who have already appeared,—the ruined city, pictured as a sorrowing widow and dethroned and conquered queen, of vers. 1, 2,—the exile, fleeing from misery and bondage, seeking a home among heathen, but finding no rest, no escape from trouble and persecution, of ver. 3,—the daughter of Zion, despoiled of her beauty, bewailing the absence of worshippers, the invasion of her sacred courts by heathen, the captivity of her infant children and the humiliation of her proud leaders and princes, of vers. 4-6,—all now are embraced under the generic name of JERUSALEM, which from this verse to the end of the chapter is personified as the representative of the theocratic idea.—W. H. H.]—remembered, remembers. The unfortunate cannot forbear recalling their former prosperity, the remembrance of which serves both to comfort them and to increase their sorrow. Zion follows this propensity of nature.—in the days of her affliction and of her miseries, all her pleasant things.—All the glorious things, of a spiritual and of a temporal nature, which had fallen to the lot of the chosen people from the beginning of their history, are now the subject of painful remembrance.—that she had in the days of old. See ii. 17; Is. xxxiii. 7; xxxvii. 26; Mich. vii. 20. [BROUGHTON: "in the old time." HENDERSON: "from ancient days." Ewald regards the words, all the pleasant things she had from the days of old, as erroneously transplanted here out of ver. 10. His principal reason seems to be that they spoil the rhythm. VAHINGER supposes that this verse, as well as ii. 19, contains four members. I see no necessity for this. We are only to regard the two members of the first part of the verse as of greater length. There is apparently no exact measure for the number of syllables of the several members. The thought that Jerusalem in her misery remembers her present misery [which would be the sense according to EWALD'S emendation] is unnatural; for זָכַר [to call to mind, to remember] always suggests something distant, remote, in reference to space or time, and, in the latter relation, either past or future. Besides, the words, "that she had in the days of old," so appropriate in ver. 7, would be altogether superfluous and confusing in ver. 10.—when her people fell into the hand of the enemy, when her people fall by the hand of the oppressor.

This is a more particular description of "the days of her affliction." They were the days when her people fell by the hand of their enemies.—and none did help her, and she has no helper. [So all the Eng. Versions, except E. V.]—the adversaries saw her, her oppressors behold her. The construction is determined by what precedes, according to acknowledged usage. See my Gr., § 99.—[רָאָה—to see, has here the sense of looking at in the way of inspection, beholding (Broughton), perhaps in the sense of 'looking at a person with satisfaction or joy,' to 'feast the eyes upon one with malicious joy' (see FUEST'S Lex.). The remark of Dr. J. A. ALEXANDER on Is. liii. 2, that רָאָה "means to view with pleasure only when followed by the preposition בְּ," needs qualification.—W. H. H.]—and did mock—they mock—at her Sabbaths. מִשְׁבָּתֹת is an ἀπ. λεγ. The sense of the word itself is clear. It can only mean cessations, excidia [cessations, destructions]. But the choice of a word else unused, seems to indicate that the scorn of their enemies was of an equivocal character; namely, they scoffed not only because Zion had come to its end, but likewise because now a general Sabbath, a day of rest for the land in a bad sense, had begun. We have then a proof that the Sabbath was to the heathen, even before the days of Rome (see Juv. Sat. XIV. 96-103; Pers. V. 179-184; Mart. IV. 4, 7), an occasion for mockery. [HUGH BROUGHTON: "This prophesieth how in Babel they will mourn for desire unto their feasts, which in their Land they would not keep aright. And the Chaldeans will scoff at their Sabbatisms, as did long after HORACE, OVID, and other Poets,—and TULLY, too, deserving to have his head cut off and his tongue pricked, as he had. The Ps. cxxxvii. commenteth upon this verse."] This early mockery of the Jewish Sabbath would be more likely to happen, since it would naturally come to the ears of those who destroyed Jerusalem, that the commandment itself predicted to the disobedient people a time of desolation, as an involuntary Sabbath rest of the land. See Lev. xxvi. 34, 43; 2 Chron. xxxvi. 21. I believe, therefore, that the old explanation of Vulg., Arab., LUTHER, L. CAPELLE, translating מִשְׁבָּתֹת

by Sabbaths, is right, so far as it allows an equivocal sense of this word. [This word has given the translators and commentators much trouble. The Sept. translates it by μετοικεσία, "and mocked at her captivity," deriving the noun from שָׁבַח, captivum ducere. The other Versions vary. BLAYNEY: "discontinuance;" "HOURIGANT justly observes that שָׁבַח is nowhere used for Sabbath, etc. But without taking the liberty which he does of substituting another word, כִּשְׁבָרָה, the use of the verb שָׁבַח will justify giving to כִּשְׁבָרָה a sense well suited to the exigence of the passage, namely, 'her discontinuance,' that is, the ceasing, or causing to cease, of her, or of her former prosperity." BOOTHROD and NOYES: "destruction." HENDERSON: "they laughed at her ruin," "כִּשְׁבָרָה, lit, her ruined circumstances; the state of the complete cessation of all the active businesses of life. Root, שָׁבַח to cease; Hiph., to put an end to, cause to cease." BROUGHTON: "Sabbatisms;" (which, as preserving the equivocal sense, is to be preferred).—BLAYNEY: "Some critics have been willing to discard this line, Her oppressors behold her—they mock at her Sabbaths—as well as the fourth in ii. 19, but for no better reason than because all the other periods in the two chapters consist of three lines only. But I think this not a sufficient ground, in opposition to the authority of all the Hebrew copies and ancient Versions." HENDERSON, who makes four lines of this verse, and only three of the others, remarks, "there is no reason to believe that Jeremiah considered himself so rigidly bound to adhere to his triple arrangement, as on no occasion to break through it in order to give utterance to a thought forcibly bearing on the statement which he had just made." Why then adopt an artificial style at all? But there is no necessity for making four members instead of three of this verse. Each member consists of two distinctly marked clauses; and in this verse the first member has two clauses of more than usual length. NAEGLSBACH'S arrangement of the lines in sixes, instead of triplets, plainly disposes of this difficulty, and its correctness is vindicated by the accents.—W. H. H.]

I. 8-11.

- 8 Jerusalem hath grievously sinned; therefore she is removed: all that honored her, despise her, because they have seen her nakedness; yea, she sigheth, and 9 turneth backward. Her filthiness is in her skirts; she remembereth not her last end; therefore she came down wonderfully: she had no comforter. O LORD, be-
10 hold my afflictions; for the enemy hath magnified himself. The adversary hath spread out his hand upon all her pleasant things: for she hath seen that the heathen entered into her sanctuary, whom thou didst command that they should not enter 11 into thy congregation. All her people sigh, they seek bread: they have given their pleasant things for meat to relieve the soul: see, O LORD, and consider; for I am become vile.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 8.—חַטָּא חַטָּאָה. See my Gr., § 93, d, note. The form חַטָּא (frequent in Deuteronomy, xv. 9; xxi. 22, etc., comp. Is. xxxi. 7; iii. 12; Hos. xii. 9) is never found in Jeremiah, and in Lam. only here and iii. 39. Jeremiah uses only the form חַטָּאָה, xvi. 10, 18; xvi. 1, 3; xviii. 23, et al. The verb חַטָּא is frequent with him, ii. 35; iii. 25; viii. 14.—[BLAYNEY: "For לִנְדִּיחָהּ, which occurs nowhere else, nineteen MSS., and the first edition of the Hagiographa, read לִנְדִּיחָהּ, as at ver. 17 and various other places."—כִּכְכֵּר, not found in Jeremiah; 1 Sam. ii. 30; 2 Sam. x. 3; Prov. xiv. 31.—The Hiphil form, הִזְלִי (not to be confounded with הִזְלִי from הִזָּל, Is. xlviii. 21), occurs only here. See OLSH., § 255, a, note. In Jer. xv. 19 we find הִזְלִי, abjectum, vile. [The word is from הִזָּל, Chaldaic inflexion. See BENJAMIN DAVIDSON, Analyt. Lex., § 18, 14; or from הִזָּל, see FURST, Lex.—W. H. H.]—עָרִיבָה, not found in Jeremiah. See Is. xlvii. 3; Ezek. xvi. 37. [CRANMER, BISHOPS' B., filthiness; BROUGHTON, BOOTHROYD, Notes, shame.]—אָהֹרֶךְ is found in Jeremiah only with הִלֵּךְ, xv. 6, and נִכְסֹן, xxxviii. 22; xli. 5.

Ver. 9.—טִמְאָתָהּ. EWALD, wholly unnecessarily, would read טִמְאָתָהּ, she polluted (§ 194, b). The word is not found in Jeremiah. כִּלְאִים, acc. adverbial. See נִפְלְאוֹת, Job xxxvii. 5; נִוְרָאוֹת, Ps. lxx. 6; מִיִּשְׁרִים, Ps. lxxv. 3; my Gr., § 70, k.—הִנְדִּילִי requires neither נִפְשִׁי nor פִּי to complete the sense. The object lies in the verb itself. The direct causative is needed (see my Gr., § 19, 3). It also means, to play the part of or to affect greatness; see Jer. xlviii. 26, 42; comp. 1 Sam. xl. 41. [FURST gives this verb an inchoative sense, to grow violent. This sense of the word seems to have induced the inaccurate translation of BLAYNEY, Behold how an enemy hath aggravated mine affliction. BOOTHROYD gives same sense.—W. H. H.]

Ver. 10.—פָּרֵשׁ (see vers. 13, 17; iv. 4) is not strange to the vocabulary of Jeremiah: iv. 31; xvi. 7; xlviii. 40; xlix. 22.—Before פָּרֵשׁ supply אֲשֶׁר.—[HENDERSON: "The הַ הַיִּתְּהָ is merely the fuller form of the pronominal fragment for הַיִּתְּ, the common form. It is omitted in some MSS."]

Ver. 11.—מִכֹּחֲבוֹיָהֶם, see vers. 7, 10. [HENDERSON: the form is "quite irregular. It is corrected in the K'i, which rejects the י. The word is thus exhibited in a great number of MSS. and in eight printed editions."]—בָּאֵכֶל, בָּ indicates something given in the way of price or wages; see Gen. xxix. 18; xxx. 26; Is. vii. 23; my Gr., § 112, 5, a. אָכַל is not found in Jeremiah. He says אָכַל, xii. 19; or כָּאֵכֶל, vii. 33; xvi. 4; xlix. 7; xxxiv. 20.—נָפֵשׁ occurs vers. 16, 19; Ruth iv. 15; Ps. xix. 8; Prov. xxv. 13, never in Jeremiah.—רָאָה וְהִבִּטָּה. These two imperatives are found together, only in the reverse order, in Job xxxv. 5; Is. lxiii. 15; Ps. lxxx. 15; cxlii. 6. In the Lamentations we also have רָאָה וְהִבִּטָּה, ver. 12; גִּירָה וְהִבִּטָּה, ver. 1, and גִּירָה וְהִבִּטָּה alone iii. 63. Jeremiah never uses the verb נָבַט, which Isaiah uses constantly, v. 12, 30; viii. 22; xviii. 4; xlii. 18; lxiii. 15; xx. 5, 6, etc.—וְהִזְלִי occurs once in Jer. xv. 19. See הִזְלִי, ver. 8. The word is used in a contemptuous sense; Zion [Jerusalem] has become a נִבְזָה (Jer. xxii. 28) when she ought to be נִחַלֶּת צָבִי צְבִי צְבִי (Jer. lxi. 19). נִחַלֶּת is properly the participle of נָחַל, to shake to and fro, to totter, hence figuratively to be low, bad, contemptible, abject, mean, and then again figuratively to be miserable, unhappy, in which last sense it is used here. See FURST, Lex.—W. H. H.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Ver. 8. It is sin that has made Jerusalem an object of abhorrence. Her uncleanness has become notorious: therefore those who might comfort her keep far from her, while her heathen oppressors, who, according to the law, should keep away from her, have free access to her.—Jerusalem hath grievously sinned. [Lit., hath sinned a sin. This Hebraism suggests the idea, not only of a sin of a grievous character, but of sin persevered in, and its guilt aggravated by constant repetition. So CRANMER translates: "Jerusalem hath sinned ever more and more." NÄGELSACH, poetically, if not accurately: Gesündigt, gesündigt hat Jerusalem. CALVIN: "Here the Prophet expresses more clearly and strongly what he had briefly referred to, even that all the evils which the Jews suffered proceeded from God's vengeance, and that they were worthy of such a punishment, because they had not lightly offended, but had heaped up for themselves a dreadful judgment, since they had in all manner of ways abandoned themselves to impiety. This is the substance of what is said."—W. H. H.]—Therefore she is removed.

[Correctly, therefore she is become vile. WESTMINSTER ANNOTATIONS: "She is become as a woman separated for her uncleanness," Lev. xv. 19; Ezek. xxii. 10; xxxvi. 17; or, an abominable thing, for so also is the word used in an abstract notion, Lev. xx. 21; 2 Chron. xxix. 5; Ezra ix. 11. So ver. 17.—W. H. H.]—All that honoured her despise her. Those who formerly honored Jerusalem, her friends and allies, now despise her. [CALVIN: "This also did not a little increase the grievousness of her calamity; she had been repudiated by her friends, by whom she had before been valued and honored. The reason is mentioned."]—Because they have seen her nakedness. By the discovery of her nakedness we are to understand, not merely that after the removal of all protecting covering (i. e., of all means of defence), men could see and even enter into the precincts of her innermost recesses, but especially that in this way the nakedness of Jerusalem, in a moral sense, has become notorious. In reference to her nakedness in this moral sense, Nebuzaradan said (Jer. xl. 3), "because ye have sinned against Jehovah, and have not obeyed His voice, therefore this thing is come upon you." See DELITZSCH on Is. xlvii. 3: "The nakedness of Babylon is her shameful deeds, which are become manifest as such." The same figure of speech is found in Hos. ii. 10; Nah. iii. 5; Ezek. xiii. 87.—Yea, she sigheth. [Yea, she herself, or, as for herself she sigheth, etc.—W. H. H.]—And turneth backward. The shame of Jerusalem is so manifest that she herself cannot deny it. There remains nothing for her to do, but groaning to hide herself. See ver. 18; ii. 8; Ps. ix. 4; xlv. 11; lvi. 10. [The sense seems to be that she herself is so self-convicted and stricken with grief and mortification, that she can only sigh and turn her back upon the spectators in the vain endeavor to hide her shame. This would be very natural in the case of a naked woman, and such is the disagreeable image employed by the poet. NÆGELSBACH: und wendete sich zurück, lit., and turned herself round. The only other sense that can be put upon the phrase is to regard it as expressive of despair. So CALVIN, "to turn backward means the same as to be deprived of all hope of restoration." But the correctness of such an interpretation is far from obvious. The other is more natural and probable. WEST. ANNOTATIONS: "Yea, she sigheth and turneth backward for shame; as those in such case would do, that have any shamefacedness, or spark of ingenuity at all in them, see Is. xlvii. 5: for they seem to swerve here from the genuine sense, who understand the term turning back as intimating a want of power to stand to it, or to rise and recover again, as Jer. xlv. 5."—W. H. H.]

לִנְדָה, vile. The old translators derive the word from נָדָה, vagari, errare, in the sense of agitatio, jactatio facta, i. e., agitata jactata est. Others take it in the sense of נָדָה (Ps. xlv. 15), that at which men shake the head [as an expression of contemptuous pity.—W. H. H.]. But the connection requires that the word be used in the sense of that which excites abhorrence: for, according to the following clause, Jerusalem is despised because men now see her nakedness and her uncleanness. Since the lengthening of a syllable, to compensate for the doubling of the following consonant, is not infrequent [see הִלְלָה for הִלְלָה, next clause, and GREEN'S Gr., § 141, 3.—W. H. H.], we may take נִדְהָ as another form of נָדָה (ver. 17). See OLSH., § 82, c. But נָדָה is that which one avoids, flings away from him as vile, abominates, that which is unclean, an object of abhorrence, and then the condition [or state, in the abstract] of uncleanness. It is especially used of the uncleanness of women (Lev. xii. 2; xv. 19, etc.). Here it would denote the person afflicted with such uncleanness, and become, on that account, an object of abhorrence, as Ezek. xviii. 6 speaks of a אִשָּׁה נִדְהָ. Neither נִדְהָ nor נָדָה occur in Jeremiah.

[The authorities for the translation of this word are about equally divided. Those that agree with our author are: the Syr., horror; Ital., a laughing-stock; Ger., ein unreines Weib; BLAYNEY, one set apart for unclean; HENDERSON, unclean; NOYES, vile. On the other hand we have: Sept., fluctuation; Vulg., instable; Targ., va- grant; CRANMER and BISHOPS' B., therefore she is come in decay; E. V. and BOOTHROYD, therefore she is removed. CALVIN, therefore she is become a wanderer; "the word ought properly to be applied to their exile, when the Jews became unfixed and vagrant s:" to which his English Editor, Rev. JOHN OWEN, adds this note, "the reference here is evidently to banishment, and not to uncleanness, as some take it, because the noun is sometimes so taken, persons being removed from society on account of uncleanness." HUGH BROUGHTON, therefore came she into dispersion, "such uncertainty of place as Cain had, Gen. iv., wandering from place to place." The argument derived from the connection seems to be decisive in favor of the first opinion, therefore is she become vile, or abominable, NÆGELSBACH, zum Abscheu—W. H. H.]

Ver. 9. Her filthiness is in her skirts.—Zion [Jerusalem] for a long time trifled with sin. She believed the evil she did would not become manifest to her injury. Now it is all become manifest. Her uncleanness has come to the surface: it is no longer hidden within her, but it is on her skirts (see Jer. xiii. 22, 26; Nah. iii. 5). [WORDSWORTH: "It is visible to all; she cannot deny her uncleanness." CALVIN refers this to the punishment, rather than the guilt of their sin; as LOWRY remarks: "she carries the marks of her sins in the greatness of her punishment." The idea of personal uncleanness, however, is stated with such revolting plainness that we cannot fail to see that the very punishment consists in the exposure of her moral pollution. See Jer. ii. 19, 22, 34.—W. H. H.].—She remembereth not her last end. She considered not what the end would be. She did not in the beginning reflect what the consequences of her sin must be. [ASSEM. Annot.: "She remembered not. She considered not, when time was, what the issue of her wicked courses would be, what they would bring her to at last; see Deut. xxxii. 29. So was it with Babel, Isa. xlvii. 7, and with this people, though forewarned of it, Jer. ii. 25." CALVIN understands this to mean, "that the Jews were so overwhelmed with despair, that they did not raise up their thoughts to God's promises;—they were so demented by their sorrow, that they became stupidified, and entertained no hope as to the future." This interpretation grows out of the view that the first clause refers to the punishment of sin and not to sin itself; and is inconsistent with the apparent sense, with the context and with the ordinary use of the phrase "remembering the latter end."—W. H. H.].—Therefore she came down wonderfully.—Lit. She considered not her latter end, and came down wonderfully. In consequence of her want of consideration she has fallen and is degraded from her high estate. See Deut. xxviii. 43; Jer. xlviii. 18.—She had—has—no comforter. See ver. 2.—O Lord, behold my affliction, for the enemy hath magnified.—doth magnify—himself.—A pious ejaculation, which is put in the mouth of Zion [Jerusalem] herself. Jehovah is implored to observe how proudly the enemy, to whom Zion [Jerusalem] is no match, exalts himself. [HENDERSON: "After ascribing the fall of Jerusalem to heedless indulgence in sin, by a striking prosopopeia, he introduces her as imploring the compassionate regard of Jehovah." See, for a strikingly similar rhetorical construction, Gen. xlix. 18.—The idea in the last clause, for the enemy magnifies himself, is that the enemy increases his insolence and violence (see gram. note above), he is growing more and more vindictive. This may be considered, not only as a reason why Jerusalem utters a cry to God, but as an argument addressed to God for His interposition. So CALVIN represents it: "The Prophet, in order to obtain favor, says, that enemies had greatly exalted themselves. And this deserves a special notice; for what seems to occasion despair to us, ought, on the contrary, to encourage us to entertain good hope, that is, when enemies are insolent and carry themselves with great arrogance and insult us. The greater and the less tolerable their pride is, with more confidence may we call on God, for the Holy Spirit has not in vain taught us this truth, that God will be propitious to us when enemies thus greatly exalt themselves, that is, when they become beyond measure proud, and immoderately indulge themselves in every kind of contempt."—W. H. H.]

Ver. 10. Since Zion [Jerusalem] has not preserved the sanctuary of her heart from pollution by the enemy of her soul, but has suffered that enemy to rob her of her spiritual treasures, she must not wonder if her earthly enemies desecrate by their presence her earthly sanctuary, and stretch out the hand towards its precious things.—The adversary hath spread out his hand [or rather, stretched it out, (so FUERST, NAEGLSBACH, and ASSEM. Annot.), as about to seize and appropriate them.—W. H. H.], upon all her pleasant things. Precious, or glorious things. The vessels and treasures of the Temple are intended (see 2 Chron. xxxvi. 10; Jer. lii. 17 ff.), as is evident from the explanatory conjunction for with which the next clause begins: for she hath seen that the heathen entered into her sanctuary, whom Thou didst command that they should not enter into Thy congregation. In Deut. xxiii. 2, 3, we find the command never to allow Ammonites and Moabites to come into the congregation of the Lord. This special command was afterwards applied to all the heathen: Ezek. xlv. 7, 9; Neh. xiii. 3. We are reminded also of the Porch of the heathen, violation of which, according to Josephus (Jewish Wars, VI., 2, 4; comp. Acts xxi. 28), was forbidden on pain of death. [Observe the antithesis between sanctuary and congregation. BOOTHROYD expresses this in his translation, in which he says "the sense is given and not the idiom:" Surely she hath seen nations enter into her sanctuary, whom Thou didst forbid to enter even into Thy congregation. Those who were forbidden even to worship with the people, had intruded into the holy place—only priests might enter. "If even their entering to perform an act of worship would have been construed as a violation of the precept, how much more when it had for its object destruction and spoliation" (HENDERSON).—W. H. H.]

[NÆGELSBACH translates: For she saw heathen who came into her sanctuary. It would be better to translate, For she hath seen how heathen came, etc. I have tried to preserve the same form of the verb נָכַח in both clauses by making heathen

the object of one verb and subject of the other. If this is a fault, I share it in company with old HUGH BROUGHTON and with BLAYNEY. The CRANMER and BISHOPS' BIBLES give the sense excellently: "Yea, even before her eyes came the heathen in and out of the sanctuary; whom Thou (nevertheless) hast forbidden to come within Thy congregation."—It is difficult to preserve the force of the final word נָכַח, without putting the clause in quotation marks. The possessive pronoun in the English version "thy congregation" must refer to the people, not to God.—W. H. H.]

Ver. 11. To dreadful spiritual distress is added the greatest bodily want, hunger. The Israelites must part with their jewels in order to procure necessary food. See ver. 19. [All her people sigh. The distress is real and universal. In ver. 4 the priests sigh; in ver. 8 the ideal person, Jerusalem, sigheth: but here we have, not a poetical image, but the actual groaning of the people, suffering with hunger and searching for food.—They seek bread, or rather seeking for bread. This expresses the reason for their sighing.—They have given (they give) their pleasant things (precious things, BROUGHTON, CRANMER, BISHOPS' BIBLE, HENDERSON, NOYES; jewels, NÆGELSBACH, WORDSWORTH); for meat (food). By precious things are, doubtless, meant those ornaments which oriental women value so highly. "A striking illustration of this is given by Mr. ROBERTS:—the people of the East retain their little valuables, such as jewels and rich robes, to the last extremity. To part with that, which has perhaps been a kind of heirloom in the family, is like parting with life. Have they sold the last wreck of their other property; are they on the verge of death?—the emaciated members of the family are called together, and some one undertakes the heart-rending task of proposing such a bracelet, or armlet, or ear-ring, or the pendant of the forehead, to be sold. For a moment all are silent, till the mother or daughters burst into tears, and then the contending feelings of hunger, and love for their 'pleasant things' alternately prevail. In general, the conclusion is to pledge, and not to sell their much-loved ornaments; but such is the rapacity of those who have money, and such the extreme penury of those who have once fallen, that they seldom regain them" (Oriental Illustrations, p. 483). "Under such circumstances, and particularly in times of public calamity, it often happens that jewels and other property of most valuable description, are disposed of for the merest trifle, that a little bread may be obtained to relieve the soul" (Pictorial Bible, Lon. See also Comp. Comm.).—W. H. H.]—To relieve the soul [marg. E. V., to make the soul to come again]. The meaning is evident from 1 Kings xvii. 21, 22; 1 Sam. xxx. 12; Jud. xv. 19. [To sustain life: lit., to cause the breath, or life to return. "This mode of expression is founded on the idea, that when one is faint, the breath or life is as it were gone" (HENDERSON). See Job ii. 4, "all that a man hath will he give for his life."—W. H. H.] See, O Lord, and consider. See vers. 9, 20; ii. 20: v. 1; comp. iii. 63; iv. 16.—[For I am become vile. How wretched I am become. There is certainly, as HENDERSON remarks, "something incongruous in assigning her vileness as a reason why God should regard Jerusalem;" what is here meant is, as HENDERSON acknowledges while he retains the word "vile," "not her moral pollution, but her abject and despised condition, which was exposed to all around her." —NAGELSBACH with the last clause of this verse begins an entirely new section. In all that follows, he says, down to ver. 16 Zion herself speaks. She entreats first Jehovah, then all passers-by to regard her misery. In fact, however, the address of Jerusalem to Jehovah begins with the last clause of ver. 9, and is continued down to end of this verse. The appeal to God in the last clause of ver. 10, which Thou commandest, etc., and again this prayer to God at the close ver. 11, shows that the whole is addressed to Him: the use of the third person instead of the first in the first two clauses both of ver. 10 and ver. 11, does not refute this, as the change from the first to the third person is so frequent in Hebrew descriptive poetry.—W. H. H.]

PART II.

I. 12-22.

- ↳ VER. 12. Is it nothing to you, all ye that pass by?
Behold and see
If there be any sorrow like unto my sorrow,
Which is inflicted on me,
Wherewith Jehovah hath afflicted me
In the day of His fierce anger!
- Ⓜ VER. 13. From on high hath He sent fire into my bones,
And it subdued them.
He hath spread a net for my feet,
He hath turned me back.
He hath made me desolate—
All the day long sorrowful!
- Ⓜ VER. 14. The yoke of my sins is bound fast to His hand.
They are twined together,
They rise up above my neck.
He hath caused my strength to fail.
The Lord hath delivered me into the hands of those Whom I cannot resist.
- Ⓜ VER. 15. The Lord hath made despicable all my mighty men
In the midst of me.
He hath proclaimed a set-time against me
To crush my young men.
The Lord hath trodden the wine-press
As to the virgin, Judah's daughter.
- Ⓜ VER. 16. For these things I weep.
Mine eye, mine eye—runneth down with water,
Because the Comforter—Restorer of my soul—
Is far from me.
My children are perishing
Because the enemy prevails.
- Ⓜ VER. 17. Zion stretches out her hands,
But there is no Comforter for her.
Jehovah has given charge concerning Jacob
That his neighbors be his enemies.
Jerusalem has become An abomination in the midst of them.

- ♀ VER. 18. Jehovah—He is righteous :
 For I have disobeyed His commandment.
 Hear, I pray you, all ye peoples,
 And behold my sorrow.
 My virgins and my young men
 Are gone into captivity.
- ♀ VER. 19. I called to my lovers :
 They deceived me.
 My priests and my elders
 Expired in the city,
 For they sought food for themselves
 To revive their souls.
- ♀ VER. 20. Behold, O Jehovah, how I am distressed !
 My bowels are greatly troubled.
 My heart is turned within me,
 For I have grievously rebelled ;
 Abroad the sword bereaveth,
 At home —Death !
- ♀ VER. 21. They heard that I sigh,
 That I have no Comforter.
 All my enemies heard of my trouble.
 They rejoiced that Thou hadst done it,
 That Thou hast brought the day Thou hadst proclaimed.
 But they shall be like me !
- ♀ VER. 22. Let all their wickedness come before Thee ;
 And do unto them
 As thou hast done unto me
 For all my transgressions :
 For my sighs are many
 And my heart is faint.

ANALYSIS.

From the last clause of verse 11, the Poet lets Zion [Jerusalem] herself speak, as she had done already, parenthetically, in ver. 9. This method of recital continues to the end of the chapter, with a single interruption, ver. 17, where the Poet himself throws in a word. [There is no necessity for supposing a change of speaker in ver. 17.—W. H. H.] Zion [Jerusalem] invites all who pass by, ver. 12, to convince themselves by their own observation, that there is no sorrow like unto her sorrow ; it streamed as fire through her bones, whilst at the same time a net had caught her feet, ver. 13. She was the victim of sins of her own sowing, in consequence of which she had been helplessly given up to mighty enemies, ver. 14 ; her heroes had proved themselves powerless, for her enemies had been called together against Judah as to a feast at the wine-press, ver. 15. It is most natural that Zion's [Jerusalem's] tears should flow without ceasing for such calamities, and all the more natural since after the catastrophe all hope failed her, ver. 16. By way of confirmation the Poet repeats, in his own words, the thoughts expressed by Zion [Jerusalem] in the preceding context, ver. 17 : that she stretches forth her hands for help in vain, that the Lord had called together all her foes against her, so that she now stood in the midst of them as an object of abhorrence. Vers. 18-22, Zion [Jerusalem] speaks again. Once more she repeats, vers. 18, 19, in the way of recapitulation, the acknowledgment of her sin, the invitation to consider her great distress, the description of the principal items of the same, the banishment of her efficient youth, the defection of human allies, the pitiable death by starvation of her venerable priests and elders. The last three verses are a prayer. May the Lord regard her misery ; the hopeful heart is broken by the blows of the angel of death, ver. 20. May the Lord bring upon her malignant enemies such a day of vengeance as He had brought upon Zion [Jerusalem], vers. 21, 22. The last two lines of ver. 22 are a final exclamation of pain, from which it is evident that the petitions offered to the Lord had not availed to allay the deeply-seated agony of mind.

I. 12.

- 12 Is it nothing to you, all ye that pass by ? behold, and see if there be any sorrow like unto my sorrow, which is done unto me, wherewith the LORD hath afflicted me in the day of his fierce anger.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 12.—כִּלְעִנְבִּי דָרָךְ. This phrase is found in II. 15; Job xxi. 29; Ps. lxxx. 13; lxxxix. 42; Prov. ix. 15.—אִם־יֵשׁ, comp. ver. 18. These words, by brevity and simplicity, are highly poetical.—עוֹלָל. The Pual. conj. occurs only here; the active in ver. 22; II. 20; III. 51; Jer. vi. 9 in the sense of racemari [to glean; so JEROME renders it in our text, Who has gleaned me.—W. H. H.], comp. Jer. xxxviii. 19.—וְגִלָּתָהּ, see וְגִלָּתָהּ, ver. 4.—בְּיוֹם רָחִי. This expression is found only here and Is. xlii. 13. וְרָחִי אֶפְלֹ is an expression common with Jeremiah, iv. 8, 26; xxv. 37, 38; xxx. 24; xlix. 37.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Ver. 12. Zion [Jerusalem] addresses herself now to men, especially to all "passers by," in order to gain their attention and stir up their sympathy for her sufferings. [This address, according to NAEGLSBACH, extends to ver. 16, but in fact, to the end of ver. 19, when Jerusalem again addresses herself to Jehovah.—W. H. H.]—Is it nothing to you, all ye that pass by? The Hebrew is very difficult and hardly capable of a satisfactory explanation. It seems to me that the only allowable explanation is this: not on yourselves (look), but look and see whether any sorrow is as my sorrow. [See crit. note below. There is a difficulty first in deciding whether the first word in the Hebrew is a mere particle of wishing: oh if, oh that, utinam, would that! Or whether it is the particle of negation. If the former, then we may adopt BLAYNEY'S translation, "O that among you, all ye that pass by, ye would look and see, if there be a sorrow like unto my sorrow," etc. Thus our text is a call for sympathy. But there is little in favor of this interpretation. But if the word referred to is a particle of negation, then there are other difficulties: is it a simple negative, or a negative of interrogation? In either case, what is the meaning? If it is a simple negative, we may explain it in several ways. 1. We may, as NAEGLSBACH does, connect the negative with the following verbs, Look not on yourselves, but look and see if there be any sorrow like unto my sorrow. Or, 2. We may translate literally, it is not to you, and then we may explain it in two ways: either as an enunciation of the fact that what had befallen her had not befallen them; so HUGH BROUGHTON, This hath not befallen you, O all that pass by the way. Consider ye and see if, etc.; or it may be taken as a complaint that her sorrows were so slighted—and then the sense is, It is nothing to you, i. e., you have no concern in it or care for it. Or, 3. We may translate it in the form of a wish or prayer, 'let not that befall you that hath befallen me.' If we take the word interrogatively, then we may suppose a word omitted, 'Whether or no shall I call upon you,' etc.; or we may render it as the English version has it, and in favor of which we have the weight of authority on the part of translators and commentators: Is it nothing to you, all ye that pass by? WEST. ANNOT.: "Do ye make light of mine afflictions? or, do ye not regard them, and lay them to heart? as complaining that her calamities were so slighted by others, and endeavoring to move them to some commiseration of her. See somewhat the like form of speech in the prayer of those holy men to God, Neh. ix. 32."—Behold and see if there be any sorrow like unto my sorrow, which is done unto me. WEST. ANNOT.: "The manner of persons that sit weeping and wailing, as wandering outcasts, by the wayside, is wont to be no other than is here deciphered, in a proneness to acquaint others with their calamitous condition (so ver. 18), and to aggravate them in relation of them, as being such as had never the like been known or heard of before. See iii. 1; iv. 6."—Wherewith the Lord (Jehovah) hath afflicted me in the day of His fierce anger. See ver. 5. "By the transcendent greatness of mine affliction ye may easily perceive that there is a special hand and work of God in it. See Is. x. 5." WEST. ANNOT.—W. H. H.]

לֹא אֶלֶיכֶם. The Sept. reads οὐ πρὸς ὑμᾶς, where without doubt we should read οὐ πρ. ὑ. Vulgate: O vos omnes. Chald.: Adjuro vos omnes. Syr., very literally: Nihine ad vos omnes viatores? Arab.: O quotquot viam transitis! That the Sept.

reads לֹא אֶלֶיכֶם as לֹא אֶלֶיכֶם is very probable. There is nothing that should prevent our pointing it so today, if any thing were to be gained by it. But לֹא (for which we have לֹא, 1 Sam. xiv. 30; Is. xlviii. 18; lxiii. 19) never stands as a simple interjection, but is a conjunction, and always requires a verb after it. We could indeed supply such a verb (Oh, that my call might compel your attention, or the like); but it is difficult to supply the right word, and we cannot conceive why the Poet should leave the reader to supply it. If we read לֹא אֶלֶיכֶם (which, according to the Masora, stands 35 times for לֹא, see FÜRST), then there are two ways of explaining it. Either it may be understood interrogatively: nonne ad vos? Then אֶלֶיכֶם must be supplied, as Prov. viii. 4 reads, אֶלֶיכֶם אֲשִׁים אֶקְרָא. But there אֶקְרָא is expressed. To supply it here, seems to me, were equally as difficult as the supply of a word after לֹא would necessarily be. Or, לֹא אֶלֶיכֶם may be understood as a negation. In this sense ABEN EZRA and ROSENMUELLER take it, whilst they supply the words לֹא אֶקְרָא, i. e., hucusque non tetigit vos, quod mihi accidit; vos tanta mala, quanta nos opprimunt, nondum estis experti. But this explanation is evidently very arbitrary.

אֶלֶיכֶם is to be regarded as dependent on וְגִלָּתָהּ, which is often construed with אֶלֶיכֶם, Num. xxi. 9; Ps. xxxiv. 6; cii. 20; Is. xxii. 11, etc. This explanation is not, it is true, entirely satisfactory. But may not the forced construction arise from the constraint of the alphabetical arrangement of the text? [See remark above.

לֹא here is the same as הֲלֹא, see FUERST and 1 Sam. xiv. 30. The omission of the interrogation הֲ is accounted for by the desire to employ ל as the initial letter. HENDERSON: "לֹא is a strong mode of expressing the negation לֹא, which has here all the force of a substantive put interrogatively, as it is in the common version: Is it nothing?"—W. H. H.]

I. 13-16.

- 13 From above hath he sent fire into my bones, and it prevaieth against them: he hath spread a net for my feet; he hath turned me back; he hath made me desolate
14 and faint all the day. The yoke of my transgressions is bound by his hand; they are wretched, and come up upon my neck; he hath made my strength to fall; the LORD hath delivered me into their hands, from whom I am not able to rise up.
15 The LORD hath trodden under foot all my mighty men in the midst of me: he hath called an assembly against me to crush my young men: the LORD hath trodden the virgin, the daughter of Judah, as in a wine-press. For these things I weep; mine eye, mine eye runneth down with water, because the comforter that should relieve my soul is far from me; my children are desolate, because the enemy prevailed.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 13.—מְרוֹם occurs often in Jeremiah: xvii. 12, etc.; מְפֹרוֹם, xxv. 30.—עֲצָמוֹת, Jer. viii. 1, and elsewhere.—וַיִּרְדָּהּ. The word is obscure. It is the Imp. Kal. of רָדָה. But רָדָה signifies to tread upon, govern. The subject can be אֵשׁ, since this word is also used as a masculine (אֵשׁ לְהַט, Ps. civ. 4). The singular suffix נָה—refers to עֲצָמוֹתֵי, since the bones are regarded as constituting one body. See NAEGLER, Gr., § 105, 7, rem. 2. We translate, therefore, and it subdued them. [FUERST: (יִרְדָּה) for (יִרְדָּה), and he caused it (the fire) to become master. BLAYNEY translates, and hath caused it to penetrate into my bones, and says: "This is obviously the right construction, and it is that which is approved by the LXX." But the Sept. uses the verb καταγαγεν,—and obviously neither that verb nor the Hebrew means to penetrate. All the other versions use the word 'prevail,' 'subdue,' or 'govern,' except BOOTHROYD, who blindly follows BLAYNEY.—W. H. H.] רָדָה, Jer. v. 31. Comp. Lev. xxv. 43, 46, 53.—פָּרַשׁ. See ver. 10. רָשָׁת occurs not again in Lamentations and not at all in Jeremiah.—הִשִּׁיבֵנִי. The Hiphil form, caused me to turn. This favors the idea of the net as the instrument of preventing escape; see below.—W. H. H.] שׁוּמְכִין, ver. 4.—רָדָה. This word does not occur in Jeremiah. It is found, besides here, v. 17; Lev. xv. 33; xx. 18; Is. xxx. 22.

Ver. 14.—נִשְׁכָּר is ἀν. λεγ. The root נָכַר, which reappears in נִשְׁכָּר, ligare (Gen. xli. 9), נִשְׁכָּר, אֶנְךָ, Aram. אֶנְךָ, ligarii (see אֶנְךָ, nodus, Is. lviii. 6) cal-ens, kettle (observe the change of the aspirate to the sibilant, comp. סַע and סוּס, סֶלֶם and סִלְבָּא, שָׁרֵף and שֶׁרֶף, אֶלֶס and סַל, Ges. Thes., p. 1318), seems to have the signification of binding, tying. EWALD conjectures that נִשְׁכָּר may have been the common technical term for harnessing.—עָלָה, frequent in Jeremiah: ii. 20; v. 5; xxviii. 2, 4, 11, 14; xxx. 8. In עָלָה and עָלָה the Poet seems to aim at a play upon words.—פָּשַׁע occurs only vers. 5, 14, 22; Jer. v. 6.—The Hithpael הִשְׁתַּכְּנָה only here; elsewhere only the Pual, Job xl. 7. [BOOTHROYD, translating עָלָה as if it were עָלָה, is compelled to translate יִשְׁתַּכְּנָה in the sing., His yoke He hath twisted on my neck.—For a similar use of עָלָה with עָלָה, in the sense of rising above the object indicated, see Deut. xxviii. 43.—W. H. H.]—הִכְשִׁיל. Kal frequent in Jeremiah; Hiph., labare fecit, Jer. xviii. 15; Hoph. Jer. xviii. 23.—בִּירֵי. Construction as in Jer. ii. 8. See my Gr., § 65, 2, f. ["A noun is sometimes put in the construct before a succeeding clause with which it is already connected,"—particularly when the relation is itself omitted, בִּירֵי הַיָּד, by the hand of him whom thou wilt send" (GREEN'S Gr.). This construction renders it necessary to take קוֹם in a transitive sense; or else to introduce a word besides the relative; so E. V.: from whom I am not able to rise up. NOYEN: against whom I cannot stand up. Whom I cannot withstand or resist. This seems to be the sense, and is not foreign to the use of קוֹם.—W. H. H.]

Ver. 15.—כֶּלֶה. Piel only here: Kal, Ps. cxix. 118; Pual, Job xxviii. 16, 17.—מְבִיר, often in Jeremiah, viii. 16; xlv. 15; xlvii. 3; i. 11. In Lam. only here.—כִּיעָה, Lev. xxiii. 4. See ver. 4. Jeremiah generally uses the noun in the sense of tempus finem [and that is its meaning here. OWEN: He hath brought on me the fixed time to destroy my young men.—W. H. H.]—לְשֹׁכֵר בַּחַיִּי. A peculiar expression, yet see Jer. li. 22.—לֶךְ גֵּת לֶךְ. A peculiar use of ל [it seems to mean with relation to, as to, quoad.—W. H. H.]—גֵּת, not in Jeremiah, yet he uses לֶךְ of the treaders of the wine-press, xxv. 30; xlviii. 33; li. 33.—בְּתִילֵית בַּת, in Jeremiah once, of the Egyptians, xlv. 11, and once in the connection בְּתִילֵית בַּת עֶפְרַיִם, xiv. 17; comp. xviii. 13; xxxi. 4, 21. In Lam., besides here, only in ii. 13, comp. ii. 10.

Ver. 16.—בִּכְהָ (see פִּרְיָה, Is. xvii. 6 and elsewhere; OLSH., § 177, 6) occurs only here. Yet Jeremiah uses בִּכְהָ, xli. 6, and בִּכְהָ, xxxi. 15: in the last place in connection with עָלָה, as here: elsewhere בִּכְהָ is constructed with acc. viii. 23, ל, xxii. 10, or כִּפְפוּ, xiii. 17. [GREEN, Gr., §209, 1, and PAULI, Anal., p. 261, attribute the form to the fact that ' was originally the last radical of the verb. PAULI, in his Kry, p. 63, n, informs us that "the Prophet uses the feminine gender for the purpose of expressing meekness and the intensity of his grief." A rather remarkable instance of a rule made to meet a supposed case. Fortunately we are not obliged to allow the Prophet to unsex himself, since not the Prophet himself, but the ideal and feminine Jerusalem is the speaker.—The verb, properly intransitive, is used in a transitive sense: my eye runs down water. A peculiar Hebrew idiom to express abundance, Joel iv. 18, הִלְכְּנָה הַרְלֵכָה, the hills shall run milk. See GREEN'S Gr.—W. H. H.]—The part. כְּנֻחִים Jeremiah does not use. שְׂוֹכֵמִים, see ver. 4.—כָּרַךְ is found Jer. ix. 2.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Vers. 13-16 contain a particular account of the various sufferings endured, together with their efficient causes.

Ver. 13. The sufferings [of the city] appear under two images. The first image is derived from the fire that falls from Heaven (Gen. xix. 24; Deut. xxix. 23; Ps. xi. 6). Heavenly fire burns more fiercely than earthly; it cannot be quenched. [The image of fire is suggested by the last words of the preceding verse, "in the day of his fierce anger," which may be rendered in the day of His glowing or burning anger. So CALVIN, in die exardescenzie iræ suæ.—From above, lit., from on high. CALVIN: "the expression is emphatical, for the Prophet means that it was no common or human burning; because what is ascribed to God exceeds what is human or earthly."—Hath he sent fire into my bones. CALVIN: "They who interpret bones of fortified places, weaken the meaning of the Prophet. I take bones in their proper sense, as though it were said, that God's fire had penetrated into the inmost parts. This way of speaking often occurs in Scripture.—David deplored that his bones were vexed or troubled, Ps. vi. 2. And Hezekiah said in his song, "As a lion he hath broken my bones," Is. xxxviii. 13."—W. H. H.]—And it prevaileth against them. And it hath subdued them, or got the better of them. [CALVIN: "The Prophet says that fire had been sent by God, which ruled in his bones,—that is, which not only burnt the skin and the flesh, but also consumed the bones." The CRANMER and BISHOPS' BIBLES translate very freely, but preserve the sense, "From above hath He sent down fire into my bones, and it burneth them cruelly."—W. H. H.]—The second image is derived from the hunter, who lays nets for the wild beast.—He hath spread a net for my feet. [CALVIN: "There is another similitude added, that God had spread a net before her feet,—and thus He had taken away every means of escape. She had been ensnared by God's judgments, so that she was bound over to ruin, as though she had fallen into toils or snares."—He hath turned me back. See ver. 8. This and the two following clauses contain ideas by means of which the poet seems to pass over from the image to the reality. [But is not this clause to be explained by the metaphor of the net, by which, when she sought to escape, she was turned back? So CALVIN understands it: "She had been turned back by the nets of God." Or we may explain it consistently with the metaphor, as the WESTMINSTER ANNOTATIONS do: "Cast me down backward; thrown me down and laid me on my back."—He hath made me desolate, and faint all the day: or, better, sorrowful all the day: so NÆGELSACH and CALVIN.

CRANMER'S B. and BISHOPS' B. both render it, "He hath made me desolate, so that I must ever be mourning." CALVIN: "It is stated in the third place, that she was desolate all the day, so that she sorrowed perpetually."—W. H. H.]

Ver. 14. A third metaphor, which indicates the cause of the ruin which has befallen Zion [Jerusalem].—The yoke of my transgressions is bound by His hand, to His hand. Zion [Jerusalem] may not be relieved from her guilt, but rather it is tied fast upon her as a yoke. And truly this is done by God's hand. But what God binds, that He holds fast; no mortal power can loosen it. [HENDERSON: "The next metaphor is taken from agricultural life. As the hand of the ploughman firmly binds the yoke on the neck of the ox, so inseparably had the punishment of the iniquities of Jerusalem been connected with her rebellious conduct towards Jehovah."—There is some uncertainty as to the verb in this clause. In the Keri or Masoretic reading and in several MSS. and printed editions of the Bible, the verb used means to be watched: and the verb is taken in the sense of watching in the Sept., Syr. and Vulgate, and the old versions generally. It is singular that NÆGELSACH does not refer to this reading, since it is the one adopted in the text of the German Bible. Dr. BLAYNEY and the Rev. JOHN OWEN, insist that this is the correct reading. All the versions and translators adopting this reading, except the Vulgate, take the word rendered yoke not as a noun, but as a preposition. Mr. OWEN translates thus: He hath watched over my transgressions, by His hand they are twined. This gives a good sense. "To 'watch over transgressions,' is similar to 'watch upon (or over) the evil' in Dan. ix. 14; it is to watch over them in order to punish them" (J. OWEN). But the grammatical objections to this rendering are nearly insuperable. See Crit. Note below.—Another point of interest is whether we should translate by His hand, or in, or to His hand. The former is adopted by NÆGELSACH, HENDERSON and BOOTHROYD, and has the sanction of the English Version. The latter in His hand, is supported by Sept., Vulg., BISHOPS' BIBLE, CALVIN, BLAYNEY, and NOYES, and is recommended by the sense, and also best expresses the primitive sense of the preposition. The BISHOPS' BIBLE reads, the yoke of my transgressions is bound fast to His hand; and appends this note, "The bondage through sin is most grievous, which therefore is called the yoke of sins, fastened in or to God's hand because by no means it can be shaken off or remitted, but only of God's grace and mercy." NOYES: "The yoke of my transgressions is fastened in His hand. A metaphor drawn from the practice of a husbandman, who, after fastening the yoke upon the cattle, keeps the cords wound round his hand. So she says the yoke of her transgressions, i. e., the consequences of them, is fastened upon her neck, and the cords connected with it wound round the hand of God, so that she could not throw it off." CALVIN has a long note to the same effect.—W. H. H.].—They are wreathed and, or, [leaving out the conjunction which is not in the original] they come up—rise up above—upon my neck. Comp. Ps. xxxviii. 5. As if the yoke were fastened by many cords, interwoven together, and forming, as it were, a heap or elevation upon the neck. The verbs being in the plural must have for their subject the word "transgressions," hence it is evident that he regarded the sins themselves as the cords which fastened the yoke on the neck. And very certainly sins constitute the bond between the guilty one and his guilt. [WORDSWORTH: "My sins are twined together, so as to fasten the yoke upon my neck. Comp. Deut. xxviii. 48. The reason of this comparison is that sins become punishments (peccati poena peccatum), and are a sore burden, too heavy for the sinner to bear (Ps. xxxviii. 4)."] HENDERSON: "To express more forcibly the complicated character of the iniquities of the Jews as entailing punishment upon them, they are said to entwine or interweave themselves, the idea being probably borrowed from the intertwining of withes for the purpose of binding the yoke with them." The expression, they come up upon my neck (variously rendered, they go over my neck (BROUGHTON), come up about my neck (BISH. BIBLE), rise up on my neck (HENDERSON), are laid upon my neck (NOYES), may express the idea of a burden in addition to that of a yoke, that the sins wreath themselves into a yoke that is heavy and burdensome on the neck, "a yoke which is insupportable" (WORDSWORTH, NOYES),—or the idea may be, that the yoke is so wreathed together and knotted as it were upon the neck, that the head cannot be withdrawn from it. The last seems to be NAGELSBACH's idea. So CALVIN, "we ought to bear in mind the two clauses—that God's hand held the yoke tied, and also that the yoke was bound around the neck of Jerusalem, * * * it is tied, and so fastened, that it cannot be shaken off." So also BROUGHTON, who translates, they plat themselves; they go over my neck, and in a treatise on "Jeremie's Lamentations" explains this passage thus: "The yoke of their sin was platted over their head. The state in Jeremie's time was so entangled with the idolatry of the Egyptians and their other friends, that they could not get their head out of it."—W. H. H.] In what follows the Poet as in ver. 13, drops the metaphorical style for the literal.—He hath made my strength to fall. He has broken my strength. [The primitive meaning of the Hebrew verb suggests the idea of one tottering to and fro, staggering from weakness (see Is. v. 27), as, in the present instance, under a heavy yoke. Our E. V. vainly strives to preserve this idea in a phrase that is awkward and needs explanation, "He has made my strength to fall." BLAYNEY comes nearer the primitive meaning of the verb by using the word "stumble" instead of "fall," hath caused my strength to stumble. But it is doubtful if the verb, in the form in which it is used, expresses more than the idea of weakening or exhausting the strength. OWEN: "He hath weakened my strength." CALVIN: corrumpere fecit (vel, debilitavit) robur meum.

BISHOPS' BIBLE and HENDERSON: "He hath caused my strength to fail."—W. H. H.].—The Lord hath delivered me into their hands, from whom I am not able to rise up, whom I cannot resist.—The Lord, Adonai. This name, Adonai, never occurs alone in the prophecies of Jeremiah, but is always followed by Jehovah (and that, too, according to the Masoretic punctuation יהוה אדני), i. 6; ii. 19, 22; iv. 10; vii. 20; xiv. 18; xlv. 26, xlv. 5; l. 81. But in the Lamentations, Adonai is never followed by Jehovah, and stands alone in fourteen places, i. 14, 15 twice; ii. 1, 2, 5, 7, 18, 19, 20; iii. 81, 86, 87, 58 [see Introduction, Add. Rem., p. 82. If Adonai is the correct reading, its significance is thus explained by WORDSWORTH: "The prophet appears thus to intimate in the Lamentations, that now, in her captivity and humiliation, Jerusalem felt the lordship of Jehovah, the God of Israel; but by reason of her sins, no longer felt that lordship to be exercised by Him as JEHOVAH, i. e., as the God of His covenanted people, to protect them. A similar feeling made Solomon abstain in Ecclesiastes from the use of the name JEHOVAH altogether."]

[The argument of OWEN for reading שָׁקַר instead of נָשַׁק, that where all the versions agree, there is a strong presumption that they are right, is offset by the difficulty of construction in that case and the necessity it involves of changing עַל yoke into עָל upon in the first clause, and the verb קָלָה they rise up into the noun and pronoun עָלָה his yoke in the third clause. The difficulties of construction are evident in the translations of BLAYNEY and OWEN, the two advocates for this reading; BLAYNEY gives the verb in the singular a plural noun for its subject, my transgressions have been closely watched; and OWEN renders the verb, which is confessedly a passive verb and so rendered by the Sept. and all the old versions except the Vulgate, which OWEN himself says "hardly gives any meaning," in an active sense, He hath watched over my transgressions. A reading involving three changes in the Masoretic points, and even then incapable of correct grammatical construction, surely ought to be rejected.—W. H. H.]

Ver. 15 The Lord hath trodden under foot.—Hath cast away, or rejected [despised or made despicable]—W. H. H.] This verse begins in the literal style of speaking, and ends in the metaphorical. [If our English version is to be retained, trodden under foot, then the metaphor is begun in the first clause, and beautifully developed as the verse proceeds. But the E. V. cannot be sustained, see Critical Note below.—W. H. H.] All my mighty men,—Heroes, Ger. Helden [FURST: great men].—In the midst of me; in meiner Mitte. [CALVIN. "She says, in the midst of me. And this ought to be observed, for if they had fallen on the field of battle, if they had been taken in the fields by their enemies, such a thing would not have been so grievous; but that they had thus been laid prostrate"—or rather, deprived of strength to resist and thus rendered contemptible,—"in the very bosom of the city, was indeed a token of vengeance from above."—He hath called an assembly against me.—He has proclaimed a solemn feast [a set time.—W. H. H.] against me.—to crush my young men,—to break in pieces my young men. As to a festive gathering the Lord calls her enemies to Jerusalem. The purpose of this festive gathering is indicated in a general way by the words against me; but is more clearly indicated by the words to crush or break in pieces my young men. In this expression is already shadowed forth the following metaphor; for the wine-press breaks to pieces, crushes the berries. [WORDSWORTH: "An oxymoron; the term to call an assembly signifies the gathering of a holy convocation for festal rejoicing, or other religious purposes. But now the religious festival of Jerusalem hath ceased (see ver. 4), and God has called an assembly of enemies to crush her. Compare the expression to sanctify war, or consecrate an army against a city. See on Isa. xiii. 8; Jer. vi. 4; li. 27, 28; Joel iii. 9."—Though it may impair a beautiful figure, it seems better to take מוֹלֵךְ in its usual meaning of a set time. God appointed the time, as for a great solemnity, and it came according to His appointment the time to crush the young men.—W. H. H.]—The Lord hath trodden the virgin, the daughter of Judah, as in a wine-press.—The Lord trod the wine-press of the virgin Judah's daughter. We find substantially the same image used, Joel iv. 13; Isa. lxiii. 2, 3; Rev. xiv. 18-20; xix. 15. [OWEN: The wine-press has the Lord trodden as to the virgin, the daughter of Judah.]

מָלַךְ. The meaning is tollere, lüpfen [to lift up, to remove a thing from its place, to cast it away, and thus to treat it with contempt, or to destroy it, as the case may be. The old lexicographers, tracing a remote analogy between this verb and מָלַךְ, gave to it the sense of treading down, or treading under foot, which is adopted here by E. V., BROUGHTON, CALVIN, BLAYNEY, BOOTHROYD and NOYES; but has not the sanction of the ancient versions. CRANMER and BISHOPS' BIBLE translate it hath destroyed. HENDERSON: hath cast away. So NÄGELSBACH: verworfen hat: so also the Sept., ἐξήνευ, and the Vulg., abstulit. So also NOYES in Ps. cxix. 118, "Thou castest off all who depart from Thy laws;" which ALEXANDER translates, "Thou despisest all those straying from Thy statutes," in which he agrees with the Sept., ἐξουθενώσας, and with the Vulg., sprevisi. This sense, "Thou hast despised," is very suitable to our text. It is still better to give the Piel the force of Hiphil, Thou hast caused to be despised, or rendered despicable, "my mighty men in the midst of me." See CALVIN's note above on the words "in the midst of me," and observe how admirably then the first clause of this verse follows the last clause of the preceding verse: She is given up into the hands of those she cannot resist, and thus her mighty men in the midst of her are made objects of contempt. On the other hand, to translate as NÄGELSBACH, FÜRST and HENDERSON, "The Lord has rejected, or cast away, all my mighty men in the midst of me," is awkward and not very intelligible.—W. H. H.]

Ver. 16. For these things I weep.—This refers back to ver. 12. Zion [Jerusalem] asserted in ver. 12 that no sorrow was like her sorrow. The correctness of this assertion is established, vers. 13-15, by matters of fact. Zion [Jerusalem] then, in ver. 16, refers in the words for these things I weep, back to the foregoing assertion, whilst she repeats the same with emphasis though in other words.—Mine eye, mine eye. The emphatic repetition of the same word is not infrequent with Jeremiah; iv. 19, vi. 14; viii. 11; xxiii. 25.—Runneth down with water. See iii. 48; Jer. ix. 17; xiii. 17; xiv. 17.—Because the comforter. See ver. 2.—that should relieve (marg., bring back) my soul,—the Reviver of my soul: see at ver. 11 [the Restorer of my soul, more nearly expresses the original, which is purposely generic and pregnant.—W. H. H.].—Is far from me. [Five times in this poem we have an allusion to an absent comforter; vers. 2, 9, 16, 17, 21. That there is an allusion to God the Holy Ghost seems evident. The addition of the words "Restorer of my soul," reminding us of Ps. xxiii. 3, makes this plain. DIODATI: "The comforter, namely, God by His Holy Spirit." It was the absence of God who comforts His people by His word and Spirit, that Jerusalem deplored, and she might have expressed her grief in the words of the Psalmist, "Why standest Thou afar off, O Jehovah? Why hidest Thou Thyself in times of trouble (x. 1)?" NOYES betrays the theologicum odium in his version, violating the grammar and changing the text, to destroy any possible reference to a Divine personality, "Far from me are they that should comfort me, that should restore my strength." We may translate מְנַחֵם the comforter, or a comforter. the one comforting, one that comforts, but cannot make plurals of it and מְנַחֵם, or get the idea of "strength" out of מְנַחֵם.—W. H. H.]—My children are become desolate,—perished, lit., have become perishing; same word as is used in ver. 4, "her gates are desolate"—destroyed.—W. H. H.]—Because the enemy prevailed—prevails [or has become more powerful. Some take this as if an explanation of the preceding,—that Jerusalem is comfortless because the children, who should comfort her, are themselves helpless. But this is too broad a distinction between Jerusalem and her children, and destroys the unity of the ideal image of the mourning daughter of Jerusalem. We are to take the last words as stating a result, rather than a cause of the helpless Jerusalem, forsaken of her comforter, who could restore her life, and therefore unable to prevent her children from perishing under the superior power of the enemy.—W. H. H.]

מִן עֵינַי. Mine eye, mine eye. BLAYNEY, BOOTHROYD and NOYES omit the repetition on the authority of the ancient versions and some Hebrew MSS. All the other modern versions retain it; even the Douay departs from the Vulgate so far as to read "my eyes." We cannot agree with BLAYNEY that the repetition incumbers the metre. It is more difficult to account for the repetition in so many MSS. than for its omission in a very few. BLAYNEY feels this, when he taxes his ingenuity by suggesting that "perhaps מִן עֵינַי may originally have followed בְּלוֹיָהּ, and have been thus the ground of the transcriber's mistake." OWEN, the editor of CALVIN, says: "Though the Sept. and Vulg. do not repeat the 'eye,' yet the Targ. has 'my two eyes'" [so the German, meine beiden Augen] "and the Syr. 'mine eyes.'" All the ancient versions, therefore, do not omit the second 'נֶי', as has been asserted. Most of the Heb. MSS. contain it: and it is very emphatic, highly poetical, and "quite in the style of Jeremiah."—W. H. H.]

I. 17.

17 Zion spreadeth forth her hands, and there is none to comfort her: the LORD hath commanded concerning Jacob, that his adversaries should be round about him: Jerusalem is as a menstruous woman among them.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 17.—פָּרֹשֶׁה. The construction of Piel with פָּ follows the analogy of the Hiphil, then too Piel may have a direct causative signification. See my Gr., §18, III., 2, 3; §69, 1, rem. 2. The Hiphil is found so construed in Jer. xviii. 16. See Ps. xxii. 8; Job xvi. 10. ["As the object of an action may, in certain cases, be regarded as the instrument with which it is performed, some transitive verbs admit a construction with פָּ, with" (GREEN'S Gr., §272, 2, b). See Judg. iii. 27, וַיִּהְיוּ עֵינָיו כְּעֵינֵי יְהוֹשָׁפָט. BLAYNEY: "Five MSS. read כִּידֶה, and the Roman edition of the LXX. represents χαίρει αυτης in the singular; but the Alexand. and Complut. editions read χαίρει."—W. H. H.]—לֵךְ. לֵ here is not a sign of the dative, but a preposition of place. [CHALDÆUS explains, as quoted by ROSENMUELLER, 'Jehovah imposed on the house of Jacob the commandments and law, that they should keep them; but they themselves transgressed the decree of His word.' It is impossible to crowd so much meaning into three words. The ל obviously does not indicate a commandment given to Jacob, but a commandment given concerning Jacob. See כִּי־לֵךְ, ver. 15.—The ancient versions which give כִּי־לֵךְ, ver. 8, the idea of wandering, all agree that לֵךְ in this verse has the sense of uncleaness. Yet OWEN would insist on translating it here "a wanderer" or fugitive.—W. H. H.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Ver. 17. The excited speech, begun with last clause of ver. 11, ends with ver. 16, as if from sheer exhaustion. We get the impression from ver. 16, that Zion [Jerusalem] can speak no more on account of pain and tears. Therefore the Poet allows her a pause. He speaks again himself, in order partly to corroborate what has been said, and partly to adduce new matter. [There is no necessity for assuming a change of speakers. See remarks on vers. 11, 12.—The three ideal persons successively introduced in vers. 1-6, representing the city, the nation, and the Temple,—Jerusalem, Judah, and Zion,—appear again, grouped together, in ver. 17, but in a reverse order.—Zion, Jacob, and Jerusalem.—The poetical effect of this separate stanza, following and preceding several connected stanzas, is very fine.—W. H. H.]

Zion spreadeth forth—stretches out—her hands, and there is none to comfort her,—but there is no Comforter for her. See ver. 2. The underlying thought is evidently this: Zion imploringly stretched out her hands for help, but finds none, neither from men nor from God, for Jehovah Himself commanded her neighbors, from whom first of all help was to be expected, to behave in an unfriendly way towards her. [HENDERSON: "Spreading out the hands is a token of the greatest distress." The commentators generally agree in regarding this as a gesture indicating pain; some even regard it in the sense of wringing the hands; so CHALDÆUS, quoted by ROSENMUELLER, expandit Zion manus suas præ angustia, sicut expandit mulier, qui sedet ad pariendum." (See Jer. iv. 81.) But holding up or stretching out the hands is a natural gesture of entreaty, and is constantly used in the Bible in connection with prayer to God. See especially Ex. ix. 29, 33; 1 Kings viii. 33; Is. i. 15; Ps. xlv. 21; cxliii. 6, where the same Hebrew verb is used as here. NÆGELSBACH, ADAM CLARK and ASSEMBLY'S ANNOTATIONS give it this sense in our text. And it is exceedingly appropriate as an act of Zion, the ideal representative of the religious element of the theocracy and the seat of worship. Zion stretches out her hands in prayer, seeking the Divine Comforter (see ver. 16), but finds Him not: while Jacob, the representative of the theocratic people, is surrounded with enemies, and the queenly city, the seat of the theocratic government, is become an object of abhorrence.—The unusual occurrence in the Hebrew of the preposition with before the word hands led some of the Jews to adopt a singular translation, which DIODATI adopted in the Italian version: "Sion distributeth bread to herself with her own hands." A description of the want of comfort, because that amongst the Jews, the kinsfolks and neighbors did use to bring food to them that mourned for the death of their nearest friends, inviting them to take food and to comfort themselves: see Dent. xxvi. 14; Jer. xvi. 7; Ezek. xxiv. 17; Hos. ix. 4." DIODATI'S ANNOTATIONS.—W. H. H.]—The LORD [Jehovah] hath commanded—given a charge, see Num. xxvii. 19—concerning Jacob, that his adversaries should be round about him,—that his neighbors should be his enemies. The word translated in E. V. round about him does not indicate the place where his enemies were assembled, but is to be understood personally, as Jer. xlviii. 17, 39: Jehovah so ordered it that his neighbors became his oppressors.

[The use of the masculine pronoun his, instead of the feminine her, shows that there is a distinction between the ideal persons described. When the same person is introduced in ver. 8, under the tribal name of Judah, the feminine particles are used: but the substitution of the name "Jacob" suggests with propriety the idea of a man, rather than of a woman.—The use of masculine or feminine forms in Hebrew indicate often delicate shades of feeling or depths of thought. See PAULI's Analecta, Lect. XXX.—W. H. H.]—Jerusalem is as a menstruous woman among them—Jerusalem has become an object of abhorrence in the midst of them. The consequence is that Zion [Jerusalem] at last stands in the midst of her oppressors as a woman defiled with blood and become an object of horror.

I. 18, 19.

- 18 The LORD is righteous; for I have rebelled against his commandment: hear, I pray you, all people, and behold my sorrow: my virgins and my young men are gone 19 into captivity. I called for my lovers, but they deceived me; my priests and mine elders gave up the ghost in the city, while they sought their meat to relieve their souls.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 18.—כִּי־צִדִּיקוֹ כְּרִיתִי. This phrase in full does not occur in Jeremiah. He uses כִּי־צִדִּיק alone, with an accusative following. iv. 7, comp. v. 23.—[HENDERSON: "For כִּי־צִדִּיק read with the Keri כִּי־צִדִּיק in the vocative." All ye peoples; BROUGHTON, CRANMER, CALVIN, BLAYNEY, BOOTHROYD, HENDERSON, NOTES.—W. H. H.]

Ver. 19.—The Part. כֹּהֲנֵי is found in Jeremiah, xxii. 20, 22; xxx. 14.—He also uses רִבְיָה, iv. 29, but not in Piel.—יָנִיעַ is not found in Jeremiah.—[The י prefixed to יָנִיעַ has the force of in order that, as in Job x. 20, and the phrase is fully translated by our infinitive.—The Sept. and Syr. add the words—and found none.—W. H. H.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Ver. 18. Vers. 18, 19 contain nothing new. They only recapitulate. But it is noteworthy that Zion [Jerusalem], who is now again in a condition to speak [see remarks on preceding verse], begins with an acknowledgment of the righteousness of God and of her own unrighteousness.—The Lord is righteous—Righteous is He, Jehovah. [OWEN: "Righteous He Jehovah: the pronoun is used instead of the verb is—a common thing in Hebrew."] This acknowledgment, that the Lord is righteous, is found in Jer. xii. 1. See Deut. xxxii. 4; 2 Chron. xii. 6; Ps. cxix. 137; cxxix. 4; cxlv. 17.—For I have rebelled against His commandment. Better, disobeyed His commandment, lit., resisted His mouth. The same expression occurs in Num. xx. 24; xxvii. 14; 1 Kings xiii. 21, 26.—Hear, I pray you [the Heb. particle of entreaty, הִנֵּה], all people [lit., all peoples], and behold my sorrow. Although willing to confess her guilt, yet Zion [Jerusalem] feels the need of human sympathy. She summons, therefore, as in ver. 12, all peoples to observe her sorrow. [Since men of the acknowledged taste of HENDERSON and NOYES sanction the use of the reduplicated plural peoples, we may be allowed to retain it; especially since no other word in English is its exact equivalent.—W. H. H.]—Then she recounts, as in vers. 13-15, the principal causes of her sorrow. The first is the captivity of her young women and young men, who are her pride and strength.—My virgins and my young men are gone into captivity. See vers. 4, 5, 15.

Ver. 19. The second particular feature of her sorrow is, that her friends and allies had deserted her.—I called for my lovers, but they deceived me—I called to my lovers, they deceived me. See ver. 2.—The last and crowning cause of her sorrow is, that those who represented the dignity and honor of Zion [Jerusalem] are reduced to miserable extremities in order to preserve their lives.—My priests and mine elders gave up the ghost—expired or perished—in the city. [HENDERSON: "Elders, occurring as it here does in immediate connection with priests, is to be understood in an official sense, and not as simply indicative of old age. Both, without respect to dignity of office, were under the necessity of going in quest of food." They died in the city—not from the sword of the enemy on the battle-field, but while hemmed in by surrounding enemies, and seeking food in vain within the walls; they perished from sheer starvation.—W. H. H.]—While they sought their meat to relieve their souls—for they sought food for themselves in order to revive their souls. See vers. 6-11. [WORDS-WORTH: "for they (even the priests and elders) sought for meat (and sought in vain) to recover their fainting souls." For themselves, לָשׁוּב; ROSEN-MUELLER explains the pronoun as used in a reflexive or reciprocal sense. It is certainly emphatic, and suggests the severity of the famine, when the nobility are forced to go themselves in search of food to preserve their own lives.—W. H. H.]

I. 20-22.

- 20 Behold, O LORD, for I am in distress; my bowels are troubled; mine heart is turned within me: for I have grievously rebelled: abroad the sword bereaveth, at home there is as death. They have heard that I sigh; there is none to comfort me: all mine enemies have heard of my trouble; they are glad that thou hast done it: thou wilt bring 22 the day that thou hast called, and they shall be like unto me. Let all their wickedness come before thee; and do unto them as thou hast done unto me for all my transgressions: for my sighs are many, and my heart is faint.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 20.—The sing. צָר never occurs in Jeremiah. See ver. 5. [NÄGELSACH here, inadvertently (or else he would have cited this ver. at ver. 5), mistakes the noun צָר or צָרָה, used at ver. 5, for this צָר, which is 3d sing. perf. of צָרַר, and is so given by GESSENIUS, FUERST and DAVIDSON, and is translated as a verb by nearly all the versions.—W. H. H.]—כִּנְיָ in Jer. iv. 19; xxxi. 20.—וְהָמָרְמָרִי, to boil, move in an undulating manner; except here and ii. 11, only in Job xvi. 16.—See OLSE., § 252, b.—The pause accent Aathenah belongs under קִרְבִּי. [An unnecessary change of punctuation.—W. H. H.]—כִּרְהוּ. See ver. 18. The Inf. כִּרְהוּ is found only here.—The Piel שָׁכַל, in Jer. xv. 7. Comp. i. 9; Lev. xxvi. 22; 1 Sam. xv. 33.—כְּחֹזֶק־, foris, Jer. xxi. 4.

Ver. 21.—שָׁמַעְתָּ. The Sept. and Syr. improperly render it in the Imperative.—W. H. H.]—אָנֹכִי, see ver. 4.—רָעָה, a very current word with Jeremiah. שָׁנָשׁ, Jer. xxxii. 41.—עֲשִׂיתִי as the antithesis of speaking, as Jer. iii. 5. [If we take doing here as the antithesis of speaking, the absence of the affix is emphatical. Thou hast done, acted, as well as spoken. This verb often occurs without an object expressed. See FUERST, Lex.—W. H. H.]—וְהִבָּאתִי, as Jer. vi. 19; xi. 11, and elsewhere.—קִרְאָה, of prophetic proclamation, Jer. ii. 2; vii. 2; xix. 2.

Ver. 22.—וְהָבָא. On account of the Imperative וְעֹלָלִי, we must understand this as stronger than a wish: let it come, which is grammatically allowable. See my Gr., § 89, 3 c.—The phrase בָּאָה רָעָה לִפְנֵי is not found in Jeremiah.—וְיִנְוֹלֵל. See ver. 12. [WORDSWORTH says, "the primary notion" of this word "seems to be that of plucking," and refers to GESSENIUS, 633. So CRANMER's B.: Thou shalt pluck them away even as thou hast plucked me. The Sept. gives it the sense of racemandi, gleaning; and substitutes 3d person plur. for 2d sing., and does not translate לִי at all. Kai επιφύλλισον αυτοίς, δν πρόπον εποίησαν επιφύλλισα. The Vulg. takes it in the sense of gathering the vintage, and preserves the grammatical construction of the original: vindemia eis sicut vindemiasisti me. Instead of the επιφύλλισον of the Codex Vaticanus, the Codex Alexandrinus has επιφάυλισον, which seems to mean reject them as vile. That our version is correct would appear from the use of כְּעֵרֶלִים for actions, doings, or deeds. See Jer. xvii. 10; Prov. xx. 11. See ROSENMUELLER.—W. H. H.]—לְכִי בְּגִי-י is found in Jeremiah, viii. 18, comp. Is. i. 5.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

The Poet closes with a prayer, which is composed of an exordium, ver. 20 a; two principal parts: 1. Ver. 20 b, to ver. 21 c. 2. Ver. 21 c, to ver. 22 c; and a conclusion, ver. 22 c.

Ver. 20. Behold, O Lord; for I am in distress.—Behold, O Jehovah, how I am distressed! With these words, Behold, O Jehovah, how badly it fares with me, first of all, the attention of Jehovah is directed to Zion, and her misfortune is in general terms commended to His consideration.—The words Behold, O Jehovah, are the same as See, O Jehovah, of ver. 11.—Then follows the first part of the prayer, which extends to ver. 21 c, in which are successively detailed the causes of her distress, proceeding from those of an internal to those of an external character. 1. We have her sufferings subjectively considered, in two particulars—(a). My bowels are troubled. [HENDERSON: My bowels are made to boil. NÄGELSACH: Meine Eingeweide wallen siedend auf. The Hebrew word "is strongly expressive of that violently excited state of the intestines which is occasioned by excessive grief" (HENDERSON), or rather, which was employed as an image of mental perturbations and distress.—W. H. H.] (b).—Mine heart is turned within me. The expression is found in this sense, of the turning of the heart as a symptom of the most painful affection, only elsewhere in Hos. xi. 8. In another sense, Ex. xiv. 5.—2. We have a statement of the reason which has occasioned her chastisement.—For I have grievously rebelled. Since I rebelliously have rebelled. These words belong evidently to what follows, and accordingly the particle at the beginning is not for, but since, or because. For the first and immediate result of disobedience was the punishment described in what follows, rather than the suffering caused by that punishment. Besides if this clause belongs to what precedes it, then the first half of the verse has four members, and the last only two. [The sense is not affected, whether we connect this with what precedes, or with what follows. The irregular division of the verses is too common to authorize here a change in the Masoretic punctuation, such as NÄGELSACH proposes (see Gram. note above), merely for the sake of an equal division of this verse.—W. H. H.]—3. We have the punishment itself in declarations of concentrated meaning.—Abroad

the sword bereaveth, at home there is as death.—Rages without the sword, as within Death. For the sense according to kindred places, we have Jer. xiv. 18; Ez. vii. 15. By death in antithesis to the sword it is natural to understand, death wrought by hunger, or pestilence. See Jer. xv. 2; xviii. 21. [Boothroyd: "Death as it were acting in propria persona, and not by the instrumentality of another, as when a person is slain by the sword" (Biblia Hebraica). See Jer. ix. 21; Hab. ii. 5. ADAM CLARK gives examples from the poets of similar personification of death.—W. H. H.]

[יָצַר, impers. lit., it is strait to me, that is, I am in a strait, I am distressed, I grieve. יָצַר-לִי seems itself a cry of distress, the sharpness of which is lost in the E. V., for I am in distress.—My bowels, etc. It seems impossible to reproduce this in an English form; at least our ideas of the commotions of the bowels have no association with agitations of the mind. To say with HENDERSON, "my bowels are made to boil," though it seems to be sanctioned by the meaning of the verb, yet does not really express the idea of violent motion, as witnessed in boiling water, or the surging of the ocean, which is the idea intended. To say with NOYES, My bowels boil, is worse yet, as the verb is strictly passive. If we might be allowed to ignore the figure, and say simply, my mind is greatly agitated, we would more correctly interpret the words to English ears, than by a figurative use of the word bowels, that never was ingrafted into English thoughts and feelings. If we could accept the opinion that in ancient usage the word bowels denoted the upper viscera and was not restricted as by modern usage to the lower viscera (see ALEXANDER on Is. xvi. 11), we might substitute the word bosom with advantage. But accepting the usual signification of יָצַר, we can give to חֲכָרְכָר no other English form than we have done, greatly troubled. OWEN: "Troubled, or disquieted, is the rendering of all the versions, and also of the Targ. As it is a reduplicate, the verb means greatly troubled or greatly disturbed, or violently agitated."—לִבִּי נִהְפָּךְ.

ROSENMUELLER refers to a similar phrase in Ps. xxxviii. 11; לִבִּי כְחָרָר, cor meum circumit, circumagitur: ALEXANDER explains it of "the palpitation of the heart, denoting violent agitation."—W. H. H.]—The reading כְּפִיּוֹת, whatever may be urged against it, is very old, for the Sept. has ὡς περὶ θανάτου. But it is impossible to attach to this כְּ (if it be understood here as a particle of comparison, or as a so-called Kaph veritatis), a pertinent sense. For כְּפִיּוֹת stands here in antithesis to כְּחַיִּיתָ: כְּחַיִּיתָ is their common predicate; and to fill out the sense there should be a subject indicated corresponding to חַיִּיתָ. To supply חַיִּיתָ again, or with EWALD the idea "something similar" before כְּפִיּוֹת, would give us a construction in the highest degree forced and unnatural. Unless we suppose a mistake of the transcriber and read simply חַיִּיתָ, as the Syriac has it, there is nothing left but to transpose the words, and to read כְּפִיּוֹת כְּחַיִּיתָ, which the text of the Sept. seems to sanction, for since the Sept. translates ὡς θάνατος ἐν οἴκῳ, its authors apparently read the Hebrew words in the order indicated. [ROSENMUELLER: "PAREAU regards the כְּ, placed before כְּפִיּוֹת in this place, not as the particle of similitudo, but what the Grammarians call the כְּ veritatis, which not seldom is used for the name of the thing or person referred to. But I prefer to suppose, with LEWIS and WOLFFSOHN, that the words are to be transposed, as may be done; כְּחַיִּיתָ חַיִּיתָ חַיִּיתָ, without the sword bereaves, even as death within."—HENDERSON has a curiously unsatisfactory remark, which his translation does not clear up, "the Caph is the Caph veritatis expressing the reality of the thing." What "thing?" Famine or pestilence? We must either adopt NAGELSBACH's opinion, with which Sept., Syr. and Arab. agree, and transpose the words, Around the sword has bereaved me, as death at home; or suppose an awkward prosopopoeia in the substitution of the word death for famine or pestilence, in which case the כְּ is strictly the כְּ veritatis; or we must translate as HENDERSON (though his translation is at variance with his explanation), Around the sword bereaveth, in the house it is as death, and accept the suggestion of CALVIN, that the כְּ is the כְּ of similitudo, at home it is as death, as if he would say, nothing met them at home but that which was like death itself. There is as little, if not less, difficulty in the first of these explanations, as in either of the others.—W. H. H.]

Ver. 21. 4. We have the rejoicing of her enemies at her misfortunes. This subject, now first alluded to, the Poet dwells upon at some length, whilst he only briefly indicated the matters that have been mentioned.—They have heard that I sigh, there is none to comfort me,—that I have no comforter.—All mine enemies have heard of my trouble. What the enemies heard is described as if it came to them borne on successive waves of rumor, proceeding by degrees from the circumference to the very centre of their grief. At first they heard how Zion [Jerusalem] bitterly mourned, because left alone, without Comforter and Helper (see ver. 2), she was exposed to the violence of her enemies. Then they [her enemies] began to comprehend the nature and extent of her misfortune. But they rejoiced that Jehovah had done it, that is to say, He had actually brought about the day which He had before predicted.—They are glad that Thou hast done it, Thou wilt bring the day that Thou hast called (Marg., proclaimed). They rejoiced because Thou hast done it, that Thou hast brought the day Thou hast proclaimed. It will be observed that I take the last clause as epexegetical. This seems to me necessary. For, 1. To give a precatory sense to the last clause [as LUTHER, let the day come; HENDERSON: Bring the day which Thou hast announced; NOYES: O bring the day which Thou hast appointed.—W. H. H.] is very forced. 2. These words are a very suitable explanation of the preceding clause: the Lord has done it by bringing about in fact the day He had predicted or proclaimed, that is to say, He had not merely spoken, but acted [not merely threatened, but carried His threat into execution, by doing what He had said

He would do]. Least of all can we say, Thou bringest, Thou proclaimest the day, for this would require a change in the order of the words in the Hebrew, and the text should read וְהָיָה יוֹם. EWALD, following the Sept. [Ἐπήγαγες ἡμέραν, ἐκάλειπας καιρόν], supplies וְהָיָה [an appointed time] after וְהָיָה יוֹם. This is unnecessary and arbitrary. [CALVIN explains this clause as NAEGLSBACH does: and his English translator, OWEN, remarks: "Our version is wrong in rendering this clause in the future tense. The reference is not to the day of vengeance to the Babylonians, but to the day of vengeance which God had brought on His own people. The versions, except the Syr., give the verb in the past tense." So WORDSWORTH: "They are glad that Thou hast done it; that Thou hast brought (upon me) the day (of sorrow) which Thou hadst proclaimed (by Thy prophets, who warned me of my impending destruction)."—W. H. H.]. That the Lord had threatened the people of Israel with eventual destruction, was well known to the heathen. See Jer. xl. 2, 3—And they shall be like unto me. The second principal part of the prayer begins with this petition, that the Lord would visit her enemies with the same fate which had befallen her. [WORDSWORTH: "The Edomites, Moabites and Ammonites, who exulted over the destruction of Jerusalem, will share the same fate, at the hand of the same enemy. See iv. 21; Jer. xii. 14; xxv. 21; and Babylon herself also will be punished for her cruelty to Zion (Jer. l. 9, 10; li. 85; Is. xlvii. 6)."]

It cannot be objected to the above interpretation, that then the adversative sentence should begin with וְכִי, for the subject of the adversative sentence is the same as that of the preceding one, only viewed in a different light. Whilst what precedes shows what the enemies hitherto had done (שָׂשׂוּ, שָׂשׂוּ, שָׂשׂוּ), the adversative sentence shows what in the future will be done to them: therefore, from וְכִי to וְכִי the perfect only is used, from וְכִי to וְכִי the imperfect only. If the sentence began with וְכִי, the proper grammatical construction would be וְכִי יִהְיֶה כִּי. וְכִי. ROSENMUELLER: "In the repetition of this word there is emphasis, as below, iii. 43, 44; Ps. cxxiv. 1, 2. The introduction of this verb, at first, without a subject expressed, was doubtless an expedient suggested by the alphabetical arrangement of the verses which required an initial וְ; but its introduction in the next clause, with the subject expressed, and that in an intensified form,—"heard (have they) that I sigh." etc.—"ALL my enemies heard of my trouble,"—is one of those triumphs of the art of the true poet, by which he makes even the artificial and arbitrary laws of poetry contribute to the force and beauty of his sentiments.—J. OWEN: "There are here two instances of וְכִי being carried on to the next clause,—

Heard have they that I sigh, that I have no comforter:
All mine enemies have heard of my evil; they have rejoiced
That Thou hast done it, that Thou hast brought the day
Thou hast announced."

It is better, however, to consider each וְכִי as uniting the two clauses that follow it as in close apposition, in each case the latter clause being explanatory of the preceding one: They heard that I sigh, I have no comforter, i. e., I sigh because I have no comforter. They rejoiced that Thou hast done it, Thou hast brought the day, i. e., Thou hast done it by bringing the day.—Thou hast done it. The gloss of the famous Jew, JARCHI, quoted by ROSENMUELLER, is singular, and shows what far-fetched interpretations of Scripture have been allowed: "Thou hast afforded the occasion why my enemies have hated me and rejoiced in my misfortune, because Thou hast given us commandment not to eat and drink what they do, nor to enter into marriages with them. If only I had joined myself in marriage with them, they would have been disposed to pity me and the children of their own daughters."—W. H. H.]

Ver. 22. Let all their wickedness come before Thee. The expression come before Thee is to be understood in the sense of becoming acquainted with. See Gen. xxxvii. 2.—And do unto them as thou hast done unto me for all my transgressions [see gram. notes above]. For my sighs are many and my heart is faint. The conclusion of the prayer contains a declaration of fact. It is impossible to refer this to the thoughts immediately before expressed: for neither confession of sin ("for all my transgressions"), nor prayer for the retribution of the injustice done by her enemies ("do unto them as they have done unto me"), could suggest this concluding sentence. Rather, it relates generally to the prayer for help, which is contained as well under the second head, as in the first part of the prayer. This last clause, containing the evidence of her need of help, naturally recalls the prayer for help.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. Vers. 1-3. This change of fortune, befallen the holy city and holy people, may well claim our sympathy in the highest degree. But at the same time we should let it be to us a solemn warning. For if this was done to the green tree, what shall be done to the dry (Luke xiii. 31)? If God rejected the people whom He called the apple of His eye (Deut. xxxii. 10), if He exposed to destruction the city, in reference to which He said, that "His fire is in Zion, and His furnace in Jerusalem" (Is. xxxi. 9), what claim can the people, kingdoms and dynasties of the Gentiles have?—what claim can the particular Christian churches even have?—what claim can Rome, Geneva and Wirttemberg have to the privilege of eternal existence? Truly, since the Lord could destroy Jerusalem and entirely lay waste Canaan, without being unfaithful to His promise given to the Fathers, even so He can remove the candlestick of every particular Christian church, without breaking the promise given to the church at large, that the gates of Hell shall not prevail against it (Matth. xvi. 18).

2. Vers. 1-11. "From Jeremiah's passionate lamentation over the wretched condition of the Jewish land and people, we derive a lesson in reference to the manner in which one in great affliction and misery may be allowed to behave.

There have been found, among the heathen, persons reputed for wisdom, some of whom have held the opinion, that a wise, intelligent man should be altogether emotionless, neither rejoicing in good fortune, nor cast down by bad fortune, but willing to let things be as they are. But we see the very opposite of this in pious, holy persons, especially here in Jeremiah, where he bitterly laments the misery of his people and fatherland. Could he have hoped for deliverance from that misery, or any mitigation of it, how heartily would he have rejoiced! And such emotions, if properly controlled, are not obnoxious to God, since He Himself has implanted them in our human nature. As it would displease a faithful father, should his children laugh when he punished them, so it cannot please God when His people show no sign of grief on account of His chastisements. If we should, in the ordinary affairs of life, rejoice with those who rejoice, and weep with those who weep (Rom. xii. 15), and as the elect of God, holy and beloved, should manifest hearty commiseration towards the suffering (Col. iii. 12), much more should we, in times of general and national calamities, not then be joyful, but heartily mourn and lament on account of the losses and evils suffered by the public generally. Those who do not so, the Lord God reproves; because they eat and drink joyfully, and are not at all concerned for the calamity of Joseph, He threatens severely to punish their false security." WUERTEM. SUMM.

3. Ver. 1. The Targum Jonathan compares the destruction of Jerusalem with the expulsion from Paradise: "It was with Jerusalem as with Adam and Eve, when they were judged, who were ejected from the Paradise of pleasure, and then the Governor of the universe lamented over them."—ORIGEN conceives that under the image of Jerusalem, formerly noble and splendid, but now become widowed and servile, the human soul is represented: "In a sublimer sense, Jerusalem, in the enjoyment of felicity, abounding in people and nations, and the head of provinces, is the (divina est anima) soul which is of divine origin. * * * Even as we are permitted to see Jerusalem, living in the greatest prosperity, with a large population, crowded with foreigners, and head of the provinces, but when virtue fails, desolate and widowed and enslaved, so that it becomes tributary to the enemy that conquered it, so it happens to the soul of him who has fallen from virtue." GHISLER., p. 11.—So also OLYMPIODORUS: "She became as a widow, having been deprived of the bridegroom—the Logos."—So also RHABAN MAURUS: "Lamentation is made for the faithful soul of man, which formerly was full of virtues and controlled its various passions, governing the appetites of the flesh; but afterwards inflamed by the fire of lust through the agency of malignant spirits, deprived of angelical consolation and wanting divine communion, it was given over to serve as many masters as it had vices." Ibid., p. 10.—HUGO A SANCTO VICTORE: "When God reigning in our hearts governs us, then the flesh subjected serves Him in the outward life, and in proportion as we are inwardly more humbly submissive to Him, we have in a stronger degree the mastery over the outward life. Thus, therefore, our soul, when it had God for its King, was within 'full of people,' i.e., of virtues, and without was also 'mistress of the nations'—that is, of carnal desires, and 'a princess of provinces'—that is, of the bodily senses. But now she is 'solitary,' because she has lost her king; she is a 'widow,' because she is separated from her husband; she is 'tributary,' because she serves the vices to which she is subject." Ibid.

4. Ver. 1. Jerusalem, in this passage, is regarded by many as a type of the church. So says PASCHASIUS RABERTUS: "The Prophet mourns, not only because she sitteth in garments soiled with dust and earthly deeds (sedet pulvereis et terrenis operibus sordidata), but especially because she 'sitteth solitary.' Solitary, moreover, because 'as a widow.' And widowed, because she has been deserted by her husband on account of the filthiness of her turpitude. But it should be observed that she is said to be 'as a widow,' and not really a widow; since, although she is despised by her spouse, yet her rights of marriage remain, so that if she should reform and discharge the duties of her former love, she may at least receive her husband and immortality through her penitence." GHISLER., p. 9.—HUGO A SANCTO VICTORE allegorizes in another fashion: "How is it that while we perceive so many people in the church, we see the church herself 'solitary'? Because we can find hardly any one who may be esteemed as truly with the church. * * * As Christ remains untouched by the crowd pressing upon Him (Mark v. 24-34), so the church, the body of Christ, 'sitteth solitary' amidst a multitude, because the Catholic faith has many professors, but few imitators." Ibid., pp. 9, 10.—In another way still, the ABBOT RUPERT VON DEUTZ: "What city is it that was 'full of people,' etc.? That holy city, Jerusalem, forsooth, the mother of us all, whose citizens we are, whosoever of us are believers. That city, before the creation of the world, was already full of people in the foreknowledge or predestination of God. * * * How has it come to pass that she should sit solitary, should become as a widow, should pay tribute? Forsooth by transgressing; namely, by one man's sinning, the first man's, for in him the whole multitude of his posterity sinned and suffered condemnation. Thus has it come to pass that the holy city should sit solitary—should sit, as it were, as a widow, not having her husband—God, a church holy through faith, though cast out of Paradise, a wanderer in this world, suffering through exile, death and an offended Lord—that is, paying penal tribute for sin." Ibid., p. 10.

[5. Vers. 1-11. With regard to the allegorical and mystical interpretations of this song, we may adopt the language of KIRRO on 1 Sam. xvii.: "Although we do not, with some, think that 'these things are an allegory,' * * * it is impossible for the experienced Christian to read it without being reminded of eventful passages in his own spiritual history. There is no doubt some mysterious connection between even the external things of Scripture history, and the inner things of our spiritual life, which 'the wise' are enabled, by the Spirit's teaching, to discern, and which renders the seemingly least spiritual parts of the holy writ richly nourishing to their souls"

(Daily Bible Illustrations).—SCOTT: "The serious mind perceives abundant cause to meditate, with solemn awe and deep concern, on the tokens of His indignation at the sins of men. * * * How is it that so many populous cities now sit solitary? That so many flourishing empires are now become tributary and enslaved? Whence are the tears, with which vast multitudes wear away their restless nights and joyless days; whilst they mourn the loss of dear relatives, the treachery of professed friends, the cruelty of enemies, the oppression of the powerful, the fury of persecutors, grievous servitude and multiplied afflictions? Whence is it, that idolaters now occupy the places where flourishing churches once were? That the ways of Zion are deserted, her ordinances interrupted or profaned, her gates desolated, her priests and people in bitterness, or cut off? How is it that the adversaries of the church are the chief, and prosper, and that her children are in captivity? However we may vary our inquiries, the same answer recurs: the fierce anger of the Lord for man's transgressions hath filled the earth with sighs and groans, with tears, sickness and death. * * * Sin fills our consciences with remorse and our hearts with terror; deprives the soul of strength and confidence; perverts every pleasant thing and every good gift of God, and even His truths, Sabbaths and ordinances into occasions of deeper condemnation and misery. * * * Among the manifold evil effects of sin, the pious mind is peculiarly grieved, when, being committed by professors of true religion, it causes the enemies of God to blaspheme, and to mock and scoff at the truths and ordinances of His word and worship. We be to the world because of such offences: and we be to those by whom such offences come, except their repentance be as deep as their transgressions are aggravated. We ought to prefer any of the other temporal effects of sin to this. Should any be wonderfully brought down from the height of affluence to the depth of penury; should their honor be changed for contempt; should they have no comfort in affliction, and be constrained to part with all their pleasant things for bread to sustain life; nay, should they have the prospect of dying by famine; yet all this ought to be considered as far less afflicting than that their sins should cause the name, truths and ordinances of God to be blasphemed; and men to stumble and fall and perish forever, through the increasing prejudice, hardness and impiety that they have excited. Even the profanation of sacred things, and the sacrilege of those who, in different ages, have laid their rapacious hands on the substance which was dedicated to the support of religion; and the contempt with which the clerical office hath been treated by profligates and infidels; have in great measure been chargeable upon the atrocious sins of professors and preachers of the gospel, who have rendered themselves vile, and exposed themselves to shame by their evident misconduct: and therefore the Lord hath made them vile and contemptible even to the most abandoned of mankind." (Practical Observations).—W. H. H.]

6. Vers. 1-3. "If God's chastisements begin, they come not once, twice, or thrice only, but they follow one after another, as one wave pursues another in a tempestuous ocean (Ps. xlii. 8). For no misfortune comes alone, as is plainly seen in the present instance in the case of the Jews." CRAMER according to EG. HUNNIUS (Ser. 2, p. 28).

7. Ver. 4. "What an unspeakable blessing of God it is, when He gives public tranquility, so that people may come in crowds and regularly observe the holy rites of Divine worship, the world knows not, until God creates a famine of His Word and people seek for it over land and water without finding it. Let us be admonished to love the Word of God and the sanctuary where it is preached. Example: David, Ps. xxvi. 8; xxvii. 4." CRAMER by EG. HUNNIUS (Ser. 2, p. 19). "O how many people there are who sigh after the precious gospel and have willingly gone in crowds over many miles to the places, where alone they could obtain and enjoy it. These will on that day stand up and condemn those, who have had it at their very doors, and yet have regarded it so disdainfully and treated it so carelessly." EG. HUNNIUS, Ser. 2, p. 20.

8. Ver. 5. "God has, on account of Zion's sins, set her enemies in authority over her. What does not this signify! The enemy governs at pleasure! Thus the church must be trodden under foot by the world—and this drives her anew to penitence and prayer. The youth must go bound into slavery. To be obliged to see this, breaks the heart. He who will not understand that it is the enemy of souls, who leads the children, bound by lusts and false doctrine, to hell, that person must regard every thing that he reflects upon in a gross and literal sense." DIEDRICH.

9. Ver. 5. "The devil is the author of our spiritual captivity (Col. i. 13; 2 Tim. ii. 26), Christ is our Redeemer (John viii. 36), the means of redemption are—in respect to the price paid (ratione acquisitionis) the blood of Christ (Zech. ix. 11; Col. i. 14),—but with regard to its actual application to us (respectu autem exhibitionis) the Word and Sacraments, especially Baptism which by ST. BASIL, in his Homily on 'Holy Baptism,' is called 'the ransom for captives' (Isa. lxi. 1)." FÖRSTER.

10. Ver. 5. FÖRSTER here considers the question, how the participation of children in the sufferings of their parents for sins of which the children are innocent, may be explained. He refers in this connection to LUTHER's explanation of Ex. xx. 5, where it is said: "This question, why the son suffers for the father, the prophet Ezekiel hath treated of and says (xviii. 2), 'The fathers have eaten sour grapes, and the children's teeth are set on edge;' and Jeremiah says (xxxi. 29?), 'Our fathers have sinned and are gone, but we must suffer for their sins;'—and it is still so in our days; we sin and deserve what those who come after us must suffer. We are not to understand by this that the child is damned on account of the father, as if it referred to the [eternal] punishment of souls. 'All souls,' says God by Ezekiel (xviii. 4), 'are mine; as the soul of the father, so also the soul of the son is mine; the soul that sinneth it shall die.' But we should understand this of temporal punishment; He punishes children on account of the fathers, by letting them die who must yet at any rate die."

11. Ver. 5. For the multitude of her transgressions.—"If thou fearest not sin, fear at least that which sin leads to." AUGUSTIN by FÖRSTER.

12. Ver. 6. Her princes have become like harts, etc.—"The deer is an extremely timid animal, and on that account the heart of a deer is reproachfully imputed to the timid, as appears by this verse of HOMER: 'O son of Atreus, having dog's eyes and the heart of a stag.' And the Apothegm of Philip of Macedon from STOBÆUS is well known: 'an army of stags with a lion for a leader, were better than an army of lions with a stag for a leader.'" FÖRSTER.

13. Ver. 6. All her beauty is departed.—"Now they will consider well the mercies of the Lord they formerly possessed, and how little they had valued them. Such reflections God awakens by means of affliction, and herein again is mercy, though enjoyed only in the midst of tears." DIEDRICH.

14. Ver. 7. And did mock at her Sabbaths.—"A corresponding punishment (pœna æquivalet) answers, by the just judgment of God, to the sin of Sabbath profanation; viz., the derision of the Sabbath (comp. GREGOR. NAZIANZ. The festivals of the people become the door of sins)." FÖRSTER. [ADAM CLARKE: "The Jews were despised by the heathen for keeping the Sabbath. Juvenal mocks them on that account:

Cni septima queque fuit lux Ignava et partem vitæ non attigit ullam. Sat. V.

"To whom every seventh day was a blank and formed not any part of their life." ST. AUGUSTIN represents Seneca as doing the same:—"Inutiliter id eos facere affirmans, quod septimani fermè partem ætatis suæ perdent vacando, et multa in tempore urgentia, non agendo lædantur. 'That they lost the seventh part of their life in keeping their Sabbaths; and injured themselves by abstaining from the performance of many necessary things in such times.' He did not consider that the Roman calendar and customs gave them many more idle days than God had prescribed in Sabbaths to the Jews."]

15. Ver. 7. Jerusalem remembered.—Sinning first and remembering afterwards has brought many into great trouble.

16. Ver. 8. Jerusalem hath grievously sinned.—"We, Jerusalem, must suffer on account of our sins, and this chiefly makes our sorrows so very bitter: sin is the sting of death and of every evil." DIEDRICH. [CALVIN: "Here the Prophet expresses more clearly and strongly what he had briefly referred to, even that all the evil which the Jews suffered proceeded from God's vengeance, and that they were worthy of such a punishment, because they had not lightly offended, but had heaped up for themselves a dreadful judgment, since they had in all manner of ways abandoned themselves to impiety. It is common to all to mourn in adversities; but the end of the mourning of the unbelieving is perverseness, which at length breaks out into rage, when they feel their evils, and they do not in the meantime humble themselves before God. But the faithful do not harden themselves in their mourning, but reflect on themselves and examine their own life, and of their own accord prostrate themselves before God, and willingly submit to the sentence of condemnation, and confess that God is just."]

17. Ver. 9. [Her filthiness is in her skirts.—"Much of the Jewish law is employed in discriminating between things clean and unclean; in removing and making atonement for things polluted or prescribed: and under these ceremonies, as under a veil or covering, a meaning the most important and sacred is concealed, as would be apparent from the nature of them, even if we had not, besides, other clear and explicit authority for this opinion. Among the rest are certain diseases and infirmities of the body. * * * The sacred poets sometimes have recourse to these topics for imagery, even on the most momentous occasions, when they display the general depravity inherent in the human mind (Isa. lxiv. 6), or exprobrate the corrupt manners of their own people (Isa. i. 5, 6, 16; Ez. xxxvi. 17), or when they deplore the abject state of the virgin, the daughter of Sion, polluted and exposed (Lam. i. 8, 9, 17; ii. 2). If we consider these metaphors without any reference to the religion of their authors, they will doubtless appear in some degree disgusting and inelegant; if we refer them to their genuine source, to the peculiar rites of the Hebrews, they will be found wanting neither in force nor in dignity." LOWTH: Sacred Poetry of the Hebrews, Lec. VIII.]

18. Ver. 9. She remembereth not her last end.—"It is a peculiarity of sin, that while it may rest a long time in a man's heart without disturbing him, yet whenever God begins to show His wrath, it wakes up and stings as a serpent and makes a wound that no one can heal (Ecclesiasticus xxi. 2). It would be well for us to reflect, when the devil makes sin as sweet as honey, that there may be poison concealed in it." CRAMER by EG. HUNNITS (Ser. III., p. 27). ["My son, hast thou sinned? Do so no more, but ask pardon for thy former sins. Flee from sin as from the face of a serpent; for if thou comest too near it, it will bite thee: the teeth thereof are as the teeth of a lion, slaying the souls of men. All iniquity is as a two-edged sword, the wounds whereof cannot be healed." Ecclesiasticus xxi. 1-3.]

19. Ver. 10. "If we have failed to keep diligently the gates of our heart and through some one of our senses lying open the old enemy have found entrance, he advances thence by means of depraved suggestions and illicit lusts into the very sanctuary of our soul, where the Holy Trinity used to dwell by means of true faith, and he despoils that sanctuary of the wisdom and virtues that beautify and embellish it, and we become miserable and most deserving of being overwhelmed with shame." RHABAN. MAURUS by GÜTSLER. p. 36.

20. Vers. 8-10. "Not the person, but the doctrine sanctifies a place, much less can a place sanctify the person and the doctrine. To which is pertinent that saying of JEROME in his Epistle to Heliodorus,—'It is not easy to stand in the place of Paul and to hold the rank of Peter, both of whom reign with Christ.' Whence it is said,—'They are not the sons of the saints who occupy the places of the saints, but those who do their works.' Wherefore if Jerusalem, the holiest of all cities in the judgment of God Himself, is nevertheless declared in our text to be the wickedest of all cities, who will not rather say this of the city of Rome, which to-day, all the world knows, is the abyss of superstitions and of all possible abominations." FÖRSTER.

21. Ver. 11. See, O Lord, and consider: for I am become vile.—"The righteous are oppressed in the church that they may cry out, they cry that they may be heard, they are heard that they may glorify God." AUGUSTIN by FÖRSTER. [CALVIN: "We said yesterday, that the complaints which humbled the faithful, and, at the same time, raised them to a good hope, and also opened the door to prayers, were dictated by the Spirit of God. Otherwise, when men indulge in grief, and torment themselves, they become exasperated; and then to be kindled by this irritation is a kind of madness. The Prophet, therefore, in order to moderate the intensity of sorrow, and the raging of impatience, recalls again the faithful to prayer. And when Jerusalem asks God to see and to look, there is an emphasis intended in using the two words; and the reason given does also more fully show this, because she had become vile; so that the church set nothing else before God, to turn Him to mercy, but her own miseries. She did not, then, bring forward her own services, but only deplored her own miseries, in order that she might obtain the favor of God."]

22. [Ver. 12. Is it nothing to you, all ye that pass by? behold and see if there be any sorrow like unto my sorrow, which is done unto Me.—HENRY: "She justly demands a share in the pity and compassion of spectators. How pathetically does she beg their compassion! ver. 18. This is like that of Job, xix. 21. Have pity, have pity upon me, O ye my friends! It helps to make a burden sit lighter, if our friends sympathize with us, and mingle their tears with ours; for this evinces that, though in affliction, we are not in contempt, commonly as much dreaded as anything in an affliction."]

23. Ver. 12. "This is allegorically expounded to be the voice of Christ hanging on the cross, or of souls in Purgatory. * * * Or it is the voice of the church in tribulation. * * * Of the same nature is the anguish of the mother when in labor, or mourning her dead children, or dreading separation from her husband, or carried captive with her children among enemies. * * * It is the voice of the truly penitent soul, for there is no greater desolation than separation from God." BONAVENTURA by GHISLER. pp. 41, 42.

24. [Ver. 12. HENDERSON: "The words of this verse have been very generally applied, in the language of the pulpit, to the sufferings of our Saviour, and unquestionably they graphically describe the intensity of those sufferings; but considering the extent to which the original sense of the passage has been lost sight of, and the accommodated one substituted in its room, it would be well to notify that the secondary meaning is merely an accommodation of the words." WORDSWORTH: "This sorrowful exclamation may, in a secondary and spiritual sense, be regarded as coming from the lips of CHRIST on the cross, bewailing the sins and miseries of the world, which caused Him that bitter anguish, of which alone it could be properly said, 'that no sorrow was like unto His sorrow.'" Thus GEORGE HERBERT, in "The Sacrifice:"

"Oh all ye, who pass by, whose eyes and mind
To worldly things are sharp, but to Me blind,
To Me, who took eyes that I might you find:
Was ever grief like Mine?"

But now I die; now all is finished.
My wo, man's weal: and now I bow My head:
Only let others say, when I am dead,
Never was grief like Mine."—W. H. H.]

25. Ver. 12. "Our Saviour could have used this apostrophe on the day of the preparation for the Passover, which might without impropriety be called, in the very words of this text, the day of the wrath and indignation of the Lord, inasmuch as on that day He poured out His wrath as if by a sudden impulse, on His own Son, in accordance with the testimony of Isa. liii. Speaking briefly: the suffering of Christ was infinite and infernal in regard to its atrocity, though not with regard to its duration; and this should be urged in refutation of the frivolous, carping objection of the disciples of Photinus, who with most impious sophistry assert, that the passion of Christ, because not eternal, could not be expiatory of sins which are infinite in guilt. Preachers ought to and can, by means of this prophetic exhortation, stimulate their hearers to more attentive meditation on the Lord's passion." FÖRSTER.

26. Ver. 12. "Zion's sorrow exceeds all other sorrow, for Zion is fully sensible of the nature of her sin,—which is the sin of a horrible rebellion against God Himself:—and, at the same time, she feels for the lost sinners, who were called by her word and whom she could have wished to see not lost. Zion's sorrow is fulfilled and completely realized in Jesus Christ, of Him have the prophets, and all saints, and all who are His, interpreted it,—these know only Christ. He who inflicts the sorrow is God the Father, and He who bears it, in the fullest sense, is the Son of God" DIEDRICH.

27. [Ver. 13. POOL: "The holy man owneth God as the first cause of all the evil they suffered, and entitles God to their various kinds of afflictions, both in captivity and during the siege, looking beyond the Babylonians, who were the proximate instrumental cause."]

28. Ver. 14. "Although it may have the appearance of wrath, that God should punish the Jewish people so severely with servitude, famine, disgrace and the contempt of their enemies, yet thereby God promoted their eternal benefit, since many of them were brought by these means to a knowledge of their sins they had not otherwise attained. Moreover, God does many a 'strange work' (Isa. xxviii. 21), in reference to that which He esteems His own. Example, MANASSEH." CRAMER by EG. HUNNIUS (Ser. III., pp. 28, 29).—"Oh! how salutary is the blow, when God punishes a man for his sins here in this life, and by such temporal punishment preserves him from the future eternal and terrible wrath of God and from unquenchable Hell-fire! Thus that holy teacher AUGUSTIN speaks, in his Confessions: Lord, burn me here, saw me in pieces here, pierce me here, stone me here. Only spare me in that world." EG. HUNNIUS, id. loc.

29. Ver. 14. "Punishment daily increases because guilt increases daily. AUGUSTIN. Sins because they excite the wrath of God, which is an intolerable burden (Prayer of MANASS., ver. 5), are themselves well called, and are, a yoke and an intolerable burden (Ps. xxxviii. 4; lxx. 4)." FÖRSTER. ["My transgressions, O Lord, are multiplied: My transgressions are multiplied, and I am not worthy to behold and see the height of Heaven, for the multitude of mine iniquities. I am bowed down with many iron bands, that I cannot lift up mine head, neither have any release: for I have provoked Thy wrath, and done evil before Thee; I did not Thy will, neither kept I Thy commandments: I have set up abominations, and have multiplied offences." (The Prayer of MANASSEH.)—HENRY: "We never are entangled in any yoke, but what is framed out of our own transgressions. The yoke of Christ's commands is an easy yoke, Matt. ix. 40; that of our own transgressions a heavy one: God is said to bind this yoke, and nothing but the hand of His pardoning mercy will unbind it."]

30. Vers. 12-15. "We should observe here, what is the real source of all tribulation and adversity on earth; namely, not blind chance, not celestial agencies, not men, who err in their opinions, or cause misfortunes through wantonness or malice: in these we may find a secondary cause, but the highest cause, which should be first and most considered, is God. The Lord, says Jeremiah, has filled me full of grief; He has sent from on high a fire into my bones; the Lord has so severely handled me that I am not able to rise up. The Lord Himself freely confesses all this and says, 'Is there evil in the city, which I, the Lord, have not done?' (Am. iii. 6). Therefore if we would escape evil, we must go to no one but God, and see to it that we are reconciled with Him in regard to our sins. Würtemb.: Summar."—[SCOTT: "It may properly be inquired of all that pass by, whether the suffering of the people of God be nothing to them? If they have no thought of compassionating or attempting to alleviate their distresses, they may at least behold and be instructed: they may see in them the holiness of God, the evil of sin, the emptiness of forms, the fatal effects of hypocrisy and impiety: and they may take warning to flee from the wrath to come, by considering the temporal miseries to which sin exposes men in this world, 'For if the righteous scarcely are saved, where will the ungodly and profligate appear?' If the rod of correction be so terrible, what will the sword of vengeance be?—But whatever may be learned by viewing the desolations of Jerusalem, * * * far more may be learned from looking unto Jesus, and His sufferings and death. Does He not, as it were from the cross, call on every heedless mortal to attend to the scene? Does He not say, 'Is it nothing to you, all ye that pass by? Behold and see if there be any sorrow like unto My sorrow, wherewith the Lord hath afflicted Me, in the day of His fierce anger against the sins of those whom I came to seek and save? Is it nothing to you that I am here a sinless sufferer? That I, the well-beloved Son of the Father, am consumed by the fire of His wrath, and that My heart in the midst of my bowels is even as melting wax, and all my bones out of joint, and that mine enemies stand staring on and insulting over Me? Is it nothing to you that the Father hath wreathed on My neck the yoke of man's transgressions, and laid on Me the iniquity of all His people?' I say, doth not our suffering Immanuel seem thus to address us? And does it not behoove us to consider, who this Sufferer was, what He suffered, and why He suffered at all? Here we may see the evil of sin, the honor of the law, and the justice of God, more than in all the other scenes that we have been contemplating: here we may learn the worth of our souls, the importance of eternal things, the vanity of the world, and the misery of fallen man. Here we may see the only foundation of our hope, and the source of our comfort and happiness. Here we may learn gratitude and patience, meekness and mercy, from the brightest example and the most endearing motives. Let then all our sorrows lead us to contemplate the cross of Christ, and to mark the way He took through sufferings and death to His glory: that we may be comforted under our trials, and cheerfully follow our Fore-runner, that where He is, there we may be also."]

31. [Ver. 16. Because the Comforter that should relieve my soul is far from me.—The church suffering for her actual sins becomes a type of the Saviour suffering for the sins of the church imputatively. Here we have another cry from the cross. "Eloi, Eloi, lama sabachthani. My God, My God, why hast Thou forsaken Me?" Those who forsake God will be forsaken of Him, and those who are forsaken of God, will seek in vain for any other comforter, and will be left to cry out with tears and lamentations and 'spread forth their hands,' ver. 17, in vain, because 'there is none to comfort' them. The constant allusion to an absent Comforter in this Song, see vers. 2, 9, 16, 17, 21, is significant. There is nothing like it in the other Songs of Lamentation.—W. H. H.]

32. Ver. 17. Zion spreadeth forth her hands, and there is none to comfort her.—"She receives compensatory punishment, in that, having refused to hear Him, who stretched out His hands (Isa. lxx. 2), and to seek safety under His wings (Matt. xxiii. 37), she herself should afterwards stretch out her hands and not find a comforter." AMBROSE by GHISLER. p. 53.—"The ancient church (Zion) spreadeth forth her hands, i. e., her legal works and carnal righteousnesses, but there is none to comfort her on account of those works, for the Lord does not justify her through them. But what [is the result of this exhibition of her good works]? If she expects to be justified by spreading out her hands after this fashion, God hath commanded that her adversaries, i. e., her sins, should be round about her, and her sins are much more numerous, nay without comparison, innumerable, and her thousand justifications are as if she were an unclean woman, as a prophet elsewhere testifies, when he says: 'But we are all as an unclean thing, and all our righteousnesses are as filthy rags' (Isa. lxxiv. 6)." RUPERTUS ABBAS by GHISLER. p. 54.

33. Ver. 18. "It is an ingenious and considerate method of discipline, when the good God would make us better and wiser, not by words, but by examples in other persons. Happy are they, who become wise thus by the misfortunes of others." CRAMER.—The Lord is righteous. "Here recurs a common saying, to which the church bears her most illustrious testimony, in the same way as Mauritius the General, when about to be beheaded, is said to have pronounced publicly these words from Ps. cxix.: 'Just art Thou, O Lord, and just are Thy judgments.' FÖRSTER. [The Mauritius referred to is Mauritius Tiberius, sometimes called St. Maurice, though not the Saint usually so designated. Before he himself was beheaded, his five sons were massacred before his eyes; "and Maurice, humbling himself under the hand of God, was heard to exclaim, 'Thou art just, O Lord, and Thy judgments are without partiality.'"] (Encyc. Brit.) —W. H. H.]

84. Ver. 19. I called for my lovers, but they deceived me.—"Under God's judgments we first learn, how foolish it was ever to have expected anything good from the world, to which we paid our earliest court, as Judah to Egypt, and from the Princes of the world. They have betrayed me, is ever said of all nations, whenever the church has relied upon the great ones of a nation as such. The world is the church's field, which bears thistles and thorns. Those who trust to the world must come eventually to beggary, and thus miserably prolong their lives; whereby they may possibly recover their senses." DIEDRICH.

85. Vers. 20-22. "Here the question occurs, whether we may pray against our enemies, since Christ says, 'Love your enemies' (Matt. v. 44)? Answer: There are two kinds of enemies. Some, who bear ill-will towards us personally for private reasons, concern ourselves alone. When the matter extends no further than to our own person, then should we privately commend it to God, and pray for those who are ill-disposed towards us, that God would bring them to a sense of their sin: and, besides, we ought, according to the injunction of Christ, to do them good, and not return evil for evil, but rather overcome evil with good (Rom. xii. 17, 21). But if our enemies are of that sort, that they bear ill-will to wards us, not for any private cause, but on account of matters of faith; and are also opposed, not only to us, but especially to God in Heaven, are fighting against His holy Word and are striving with eager impiety to destroy the Christian church;—then indeed should we pray that God would convert those who may be converted, but as for those who continue ever to rage, stubbornly and maliciously, against God and His church, that God would execute upon them according to His own sentence judgment and righteousness (Ps. cxxxix. 19)." CRAMER by EG. HUNNIUS (Ser. III., p. 86).

86. Ver. 20. [Behold, O Lord.—CALVIN: "The people turn again to pray to God: and what has been before said ought to be remembered, that these lamentations of Jeremiah differ from the complaints of the ungodly; because the faithful first acknowledge that they are justly chastised by God's hand, and secondly, they trust in His mercy and implore His aid. For by these two marks the church is distinguished from the unbelieving, even by repentance and faith."] —For I am in distress. "Such is the distress which arises from a disturbed conscience, of which AMBROSIUS says (Lib. I., cp. 18). There is no greater pain than that which wounds the conscience with the sting of sin." FÖRSTER.—[Abroad the sword bereaveth, at home there is as death. HUGH BROUGHTON: "Deut. xxxii. They shall be brent with hunger and eaten up with burning and bitter destruction: without, the sword shall rot; within shall be fear. St. Paul, 2 Cor. vii. 5, calleth Moses and Jeremy both into mind, saying when we came into Macedonia my flesh had no rest, we were always in distress, without was fighting, within was fear. Thus divinely honoreth he the Songs of Moses and Jeremy, as having their words still before him, joining Moses' prophecy with Jeremy's story, and showing how the Apostles were vexed in the world, as Jerusalem of the Chaldeans."]

87. Ver. 21. Thou hast done it.—"It is most worthy of observation, that the church in this prayer having turned towards God openly declares, Thou hast done it. Whence it is plainly to be inferred that all calamities are sent by God (θεοπεμπτοι)." FÖRSTER.

88. Vers. 21, 22. "O that God would let this day come soon, in which the discipline of His children has an end and the flames of God's wrath shall consume the rods of His chastisement forever! Then, in truth, our sins and the Devil will be once for all under our feet, and the whole world, which now vexes us, will descend into the abyss with howling and shrieks. In the heart of the Prophet, speaks also the Christ, who judges the world and will make it His footstool: and if we are really Christians, then we have, at the same time and in full measure, both sorrows and confidence; yet often the sense of sorrow exceeds, so that we say, my sighs are many and my heart is faint. But these sighs will be turned into joy (John xvi. 20-22), for they are the birth-throes of the new life and of the eternal world. Happy is he who has a part therein." DIEDRICH.

89. Ver. 22. "Although our prayer is not a work of merit on account of which God should hear us, yet it is a means by which we are heard (Matt. vii. 7)." CRAMER.—[CALVIN: "We, in short, see that the faithful lay humbly their prayers before God, and at the same time confess that what they had deserved was rendered to them, only they set before God their extreme sorrow, straits, griefs, tears, and sighs. Then the way of pacifying God is, sincerely to confess that we are justly visited by His judgment, and also to lie down as it were confounded, and at the same time to venture to look up to Him, and to rely on His mercy with confidence."—HUGH BROUGHTON: "The first alphabet row is ended in the prophecy of ending the wicked kingdoms which should be brought under Babel's yoke, to show that all these troubles are in God's Providence settled in the most exquisite order for His judgments."]

40. [PRAYER. "Grant, Almighty God, that as Thou hast hitherto dealt so mercifully with us, we may anticipate Thy dreadful judgment; and that if Thou shouldest more severely chastise us, we may not yet fail, but that being humbled under Thy mighty hand, we may flee to Thy mercy and cherish this hope in our hearts, that Thou wilt be a Father to us, and not hesitate to call continually on Thee, until, being freed from all evils, we shall at length be gathered into Thy celestial kingdom, which Thine only-begotten Son has procured for us by His own blood. Amen." CALVIN.]

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

1. Vers. 1-11. On a fast-day, a church consecration, a festival in commemoration of the Reformation, at a Synod, or on similar occasions prompting to earnest warning, the congregation could be instructed, on the ground of this text, that the judgment which befell the Old Testament Zion by means of the Chaldeans is a warning example to the New Testament Zion. In doing so, it would be proper to consider: 1. The original glory of the Old Testament Zion, ver. 7 a. 2. Her presumptuous security and temerity, ver. 9 a. 3. The wickedness that became prevalent in consequence thereof, vers. 5 b, 8 a. 4. The judgment of God, for that wickedness, in its details; intrusion of enemies, ver. 10, desolation of the city, ver. 1, captivity of the people and of the Priests and Princes, vers. 3-6, discontinuance of public worship, ver. 10, famine, ver. 11, triumph of enemies, vers. 5, 7, 9, disgrace and misery of the people, vers. 1, 2, 3, 5, 8, 9. 5. The inference to be drawn from all this for our benefit; how that which happened to them may also happen to us, (Luke xxiii. 31; Rom. xi. 21-23; Rev. ii. 5).

2. Ver. 12. A sermon of consolation, on the occasion of a death, or other great misfortune. Our text suggests remedies for great pain. These are—I. Of a natural kind. 1. The sympathy of all men: 'I say to you all, etc., look and see, etc.' 2. Comparison with the pain of others: "see if there be any sorrow like unto my sorrow,"—where we are warned against the error of supposing our pain the greatest that ever was, and are reminded that some are more unfortunate than ourselves. II. Of a spiritual kind. 1. The Lord has inflicted the wounds. 2. The Lord will heal them. [Consider, here, especially the active sympathy of Christ. To the question 'Was ever any sorrow like unto my sorrow!' we may answer, 'Yes, Christ's, and greater, too?' If "His visage was so marred more than any man, and His form more than the sons of men," it was because, more than any man, He was "stricken, smitten of God, and afflicted." He bore the whole burden of our guilt and He suffered its full penalty. "The Lord laid on Him the iniquity of us all," and 'He bore our griefs and carried our sorrows.' Why? Not only in the way of atonement, but that He might be a merciful High Priest, to sympathize with us and to help us. See Heb. ii. 17, 18; iv. 15, 16.—W. H. H.]

3. Vers. 12-22. A sermon on penitence; when a calamity, that may properly be considered as a Divine chastisement, calls for repentance. Subject: The calamity, which has befallen us, considered in the light of Divine righteousness and love. I. It proceeds from Divine righteousness. 1. Not another, but the Lord, has ordained it against us, vers. 14, 15. 2. It corresponds exactly to what we have deserved, vers. 14, 18. II. It proceeds from Divine love. 1. It admonishes us to sincere repentance. 2. It dissuades us from confiding in any false hope or support, vers. 18-16, 21. 3. It incites us to seek help from God in a believing spirit, ver. 20.

4. Ver. 20. FLOREY—Biblical Guide for spiritual funeral discourses, Leipzig, 1861, No. 385: "Well is it for a distressed widow, in her agony, to look to the Lord. For—1. The Lord knows thy pain, which He Himself has inflicted. 2. The Lord soothes thy pain, for He is the best Comforter. 3. The Lord changes thy pain, sooner or later, into a blessed experience of good."

CHAPTER II.

LAMENTATION OF THE POET OVER THE DESTRUCTION OF ZION: [THE DESTRUCTION DESCRIBED AND ATTRIBUTED TO JEHOVAH.—W. H. H.]

[“The first song expresses sorrow over the disgrace of the city: the second describes the terrors of the destruction of the city and Temple” (GERLACH, Intr. p. 5), and connects them with the vengeance of God. In the first song, the city is the conspicuous object, and Zion and the holy places appear as accessories to her former honor and her present disgrace. In the second song, God's personal agency in the calamities described is the controlling idea (see vers. 1-9, 17, 20-22), and the Temple or Zion, as the place of His habitation, is the prominent object, while the city appears only as the locality or scene of Zion's former glory and the present cause of her deepest distress. The first words in each suggest the theme of each:—“How doth the city sit solitary! How hath the Lord covered the daughter of Zion with a cloud in His wrath!”*—The chapter is composed of two sections: 1. vers. 1-10, a description of the judgment which the Lord had inflicted; 2. vers. 12-22, lamentations over this judgment. The similarity of the general structure of Songs i, ii, their division into two almost equal parts, the first chiefly descriptive, the second more strictly composed of lamentations, is an evidence that they were written by one author, and help to compose one complete and symmetrical poem.—W. H. H.]

PART I.

VERS. 1-10.

✧ VER. 1. How doth the Lord cover with a cloud, in His anger,
The daughter of Zion!
He, from Heaven, hath cast down to the ground
The glory of Israel,
He remembered not His footstool.
In the day of His anger.

* [In an alphabetical poem, where attention is directed to the initial letters, it may not be without significance that in Songs i, ii, the initials of the first three words are similar, spelling צ'ק'ק, that may mean hailed, despised, or an enemy. In the initials of the first four words of i, we have צ'ק'ק'ק, enmity.—W. H. H.]

- 2 VER. 2. The Lord swallowed up and spared not All the habitations of Jacob :
 He demolished in His wrath
 The strongholds of the daughter of Judah :
 He cast down to the ground—He polluted
 The kingdom and its princes.
- 3 VER. 3. He broke in hot anger
 Every horn of Israel.
 He turned back His right hand
 Before the enemy.
 And He set Jacob on fire—
 As a flame of fire devoureth round about.
- 4 VER. 4. He bent His bow as an enemy :
 He stood—with His right hand as an adversary—
 And destroyed
 All the delights of the eye.
 In the tabernacle of the daughter of Zion
 He poured out, as fire, His fury.
- 5 VER. 5. The Lord became as an enemy :
 He swallowed up Israel ;
 He swallowed up all her palaces ;
 He destroyed all His strongholds :
 And increased in the daughter of Judah
 Mourning and lamentation.
- 6 VER. 6. And He laid waste as a garden His tabernacle :
 He abolished His appointed solemnities :
 Jehovah caused to be forgotten in Zion
 Appointed solemnities and Sabbath days :
 And rejected in His furious anger
 King and Priest.
- 7 VER. 7. The Lord cast away with disdain His altar,
 He abhorred His Sanctuary.
 He gave up into the enemy's hand
 The walls of her palaces.
 They shouted in Jehovah's house
 As on a day of appointed solemnity.
- 8 VER. 8. Jehovah purposed
 To destroy the wall of the daughter of Zion.
 He stretched out a line :
 He withdrew not His hand from devouring.
 Then He caused rampart and wall to mourn ;
 They languished together.
- 9 VER. 9. Her gates have sunk into the ground :
 He destroyed and broke her bars.
 Her King and her Princes among the Gentiles—
 There is no law !
 Her Prophets also Find no vision from Jehovah !
- 10 VER. 10. The elders of the daughter of Zion Sit on the ground,—they are silent,—
 They throw up dust upon their heads,
 They put on sackcloth.
 The virgins of Jerusalem
 Bow their heads to the ground.

ANALYSIS.

In this song, as in the preceding one, the alphabetical construction interferes with the succession of the several steps and parts of the great drama in their regular order; yet, on close examination, some regard to the arrangement of events, with reference to their nature and occurrence, is observable. There is given, first of all, a comprehensive survey of the whole work of destruction, vers. 1, 2. Then follows a brief recital of the events of the war, from its beginning to the capture of the city, vers. 3, 4. Then is described the complete destruction of the Temple, the houses and the walls, by Nebuzaradan, four weeks after the capture of the city (see Jer. lii. 13, 14), vers. 5-9 a. Thus far only the material objects of the destruction are spoken of. What follows relates the sufferings of the persons who were involved in the catastrophe. From ver. 9 b we learn the fate of the King, Princes and Prophets; in ver. 10 we see the elders and the virgins lamenting; in ver. 11 the Poet describes his own sufferings, etc. [NAGELSBACH does not recognize the very obvious division of this chapter into two parts. GERLACH makes three sections, vers. 1-10, 11-19, 20-22.—The first part naturally divides itself into two equal sections: vers. 1-5 contain a general description of the punishment of Zion; vers. 6-10 relate particularly to the destruction of Zion itself.—W. H. H.]

II. VERS. 1, 2.

- 1 How hath the Lord covered the daughter of Zion with a cloud in his anger, and
- 2 cast down from heaven unto the earth the beauty of Israel, and remembered not his footstool in the day of his anger! The Lord hath swallowed up all the habitations of Jacob, and hath not pitied; he hath thrown down in his wrath the strongholds of the daughter of Judah: he hath brought them down to the ground: he hath polluted the kingdom and the princes thereof.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver 1.—יָעַב. From the verbal stem, עָבַע, from which is עָבָה, a cloud, only this single form occurs, and this is as. lxy. [אֶבֶן]. GERLACH: "not with wrath (EWALD), but in His wrath, as similar expressions at the close of this ver. and in vers. 2, 6, 21, 22, show."—אָרַן. See Intr. Add. Rem. p. 32.]—וְשָׁלַךְ. Only used in Hiph. and Hoph.; frequent in Jeremiah, vii. 13, 29; ix. 18; xli. 9, etc.—אָרַן. Accusative of place, in answer to the question, Whither? 1 Sam. xxv. 23; 1 Kings i. 31; Is. xlix. 23; Amos ix. 9; Ob. 3; Ps. cxlvii. 15; my Gr., §70, b. Jeremiah uses אָרַן as accusative after verbs of going and coming very frequently, xxxvii. 12; xl. 12; xlii. 14; xliii. 7, etc.—הַפְּאֵרָה. הַפְּאֵרָה, a corresponding word, is very frequent with Jeremiah, xlviii. 17; xlii. 11, 18; xxxiii. 9.—וְכָרָה, in same sense, Jer. xxxi. 20; xv. 15. כָּרַם, not found in Jer.—Jeremiah never says אָף. The only place in which he connects אָף with the idea of a particular time, he says בְּעֵת אָפֶךָ, xviii. 23. The expression is found in Lam. only here and vers. 21, 22.

Ver. 2.—בִּלְעַד. Jeremiah uses only Kal, and that only once, li. 34. Piel in this chapter five times, vers. 2, 5, bis, 8, 16, nowhere else in Lam.—אָרַן. See Intr. Add. Rem. p. 32.]—לֹא חָקַל. [K'ri, אָרַן. "The asyndeton is much used in this species of verse at the half pause." BLATNEY.] Jeremiah uses the word חָקַל, xlii. 14; xv. 5; xxi. 7; i. 14; li. 3. But to express the thought, which חָקַל here represents, Jeremiah uses נָחַם, xx. 16. [With all deference, the thought in xx. 16 is only analogous to the thought here, which is exactly expressed in the passages first cited. This is not to be overlooked in considering the peculiarities of Jeremiah's style and language.—W. H. H.]—נְאוֹת יְעֶקֶב. נְאוֹת occurs only here. [BLATNEY translates נְאוֹת pleasant places, following the Sept., ωάρρα τὰ ὡπαία, and the Latin, omnia speciosa. DOUAY: all that was beautiful in Jacob. Though נְאוֹת is used in this sense in the Piel, there is no clear case where the noun has this sense; it designates either dwellings, Ps. lxxiv. 20; lxxxiii. 13, or pasture-grounds regarded as the dwellings of shepherds and their flocks, Am. i. 2; Jer. ix. 9; xxv. 37; Ps. xliii. 2; lxx. 13. FUERST translates it here unprotected, open cities, opposite of walled and fortified places.—W. H. H.]—וְהָרָם. Jeremiah uses frequently, i. 10; xxiv. 8; xxxi. 28, etc.—He uses יְבֵרָה only twice, vii. 29; xlviii. 30.—בְּתֵי-יְהוּדָה. See Jer. i. 8; v. 17.—חָלַל, Piel, occurs in Jeremiah, xvi. 18; xxxi. 5; xxxiv. 16; comp. Is. xliii. 28.—מְמַלְכָּה שָׁרָה. Sept. has βασιλεία αὐτῆς. They must have read מְמַלְכָּה as in ver. 9. The Syriac and Arabic read so also. Yet the authority of the Septuagint is much too precarious to change the reading of the text, which is also found in the Vulg. and Chal. Besides, it is much easier to explain how מְמַלְכָּה, at the time in sight as ver. 9, could originate from מְמַלְכָּה, than it would be to account for the reverse. מְמַלְכָּה in connection with שָׁרָה (the suffix of which refers to the former) and with reference to נְאוֹת and מְמַלְכָּה, is without doubt to be taken in the sense of royalty—kingship, regia potestas. Jeremiah uses the word in this sense, xxvii. 1; xxviii. 1. [FUERST: dominion, reign, kingdom.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Ver. 1. How—see i. 1—hath the Lord covered—doth the Lord cover—the daughter of Zion with a cloud in his anger. The Poet has evidently the image of a thunder-storm in his mind. The wrath of Jehovah envelops Zion in a cloud, out of which the destroying lightning (see next clause) descends upon her. [WORDS-

WORTH: "The Lord hath poured out His fury on Zion, as in a tempest, and has dashed down her beauty as with lightning, and has not spared the Ark of His Sanctuary." GERLACH: in his wrath. "The frequent repetition of this expression (see at the close of vers. 3, 6, 21, 22) shows that this chapter is especially intended to exhibit the fury of the wrath of God against Jerusalem; as in the first chapter the repetition of the formula, indicating the absence of help and comfort, corresponds to the description of the extreme distress described in that chapter." The expression daughter of Zion occurs i. 6, and Jeremiah iv. 81; vi. 2, 23.—And cast down from heaven unto the earth the beauty of Israel. To understand this it is necessary to determine first of all to whom the words from heaven refer. At the first glance they seem to refer to the object of the verb cast down. In that case the beauty of Israel would be in Heaven and from Heaven hurled down to the earth. But in what sense was the beauty of Israel in Heaven? To answer this, we must first know what is meant by the beauty or glory of Israel. The word in the original הַפְּאִרָה, by itself, could indicate the Temple which the Israelites called בֵּית הַפְּאִרָה [lit., house of our glory; E. V., our beautiful house], Is. liv. 10; comp. lx. 7; lxiii. 15; or, the ark of the covenant, in reference to which the daughter-in-law of Eli gave to her child the name of Ichabod, which is thus interpreted (1 Sam. iv. 21, 22), "And she named the child Ichabod, [Marg.: where is the glory? or, there is no glory], saying, The glory is departed from Israel (because the ark of God was taken, and because of her father-in-law and her husband); and she said, The glory is departed from Israel; for the ark of God is taken." See Ps. lxxviii. 61. The word הַפְּאִרָה is, however, in itself too abstract and general, and there is too little in the context to fix its definition, to allow us to say with confidence that it denotes in the concrete any particular object. We are obliged, therefore, to acquiesce in its general sense, and to understand by it the glory of Israel in general, especially all that distinguishes Israel as the chosen people before all peoples. All this is truly, by the destruction of the Theocracy, cast down to the ground. Should we now refer from Heaven to the object of the verb cast down, then we must take it figuratively, as expressing the height of the glory or beauty of Israel, which is thus denoted as towering up to Heaven. But Heaven שָׁמַיִם is never used in this figurative sense in the Old Testament. The places which are cited as proving such a use of the word (Gen. xi. 4; Job xx. 6; Isa. xiv. 12; Dan. iv. 8; 2 Chron. xxviii. 9; comp. Gen. iv. 10) are entirely irrelevant. In the New Testament only Matt. xi. 23; Luke x. 15 ("and thou, Capernaum, which art exalted unto Heaven," etc.) afford possible analogies for such a figurative use of this phrase. Therefore I believe (with DATHE, KALKAR and others) that from Heaven is to be referred to the subject of the verb cast down: the Lord from Heaven casts down the glory of Israel to the ground. This also suits admirably the idea expressed in the verb in the first clause, יָצַד = to cover with a cloud, under which the image of a thunder-storm is suggested. From the Heavens the Lord, by a stroke of lightning, casts down the glory of Israel. From Heaven, מִשָּׁמַיִם, is often used in this sense, Josh. x. 11; 2 Sam. xxii. 14; Gen. xix. 24; Ex. xvi. 4, etc.—And remembered not His footstool in the day of His anger. The ark of the covenant is explicitly called the footstool of Jehovah in 1 Chron. xxviii. 2, where David says, "I had in mine heart to build an house of rest for the ark of the covenant of the Lord and for the footstool of our God" [and for the footstool. "The conjunction and is exegetical, and the same with that is." So says JOSEPH MEDE in his article on Ps. cxxxii. 7, "We will go into His tabernacle, we will worship at (towards, MEDE) His footstool."—W. H. H.]. The ark of the covenant may be so called, because He, who is enthroned upon the cherubim (2 Sam. vi. 2; Ps. lxxx. 2; xcix. 1) [see also 1 Sam. iv. 4, which MEDE translates sitteth upon the cherubims.—W. H. H.], has the cover of the ark of the covenant [the mercy-seat] at His feet, wherefore it is also said, that the Lord speaks מֵעַל הַכִּפֹּרֶת from above the mercy-seat, Ex. xxv. 22; Num. vii. 89. Therefore, without doubt, the ark of the covenant is to be understood as the footstool, towards which worship is said to be directed in Ps. xcix. 5: cxxxii. 7. [ALEXANDER: on Ps. xcix. 5. "Exalt ye Jehovah our God, and prostrate yourselves to His footstool.—Bow down (or prostrate) yourselves, as an act of worship. Not at His footstool, as the mere place of worship, but to it, as the object, this name being constantly given to the ark, 1 Chron. xxviii. 2; Lam. ii. 1; Ps. cxxxii. 7; Isa. lx. 13. Even in Isa. lxvi. 1, there is allusion to the ordinary usage of the terms. The ark is here represented as the object of worship, just as Zion is in Isa. xlv. 14, both being put for the God who was present in them." CALVIN: "The design of the Prophet is to show to the people how much God's wrath had been kindled, when He spared not even His own sanctuary. For he takes this principle as granted, that God is never without reason angry, and never exceeds the due measure of punishment. As, then, God's wrath was so great that He destroyed His own Temple, it was a token of dreadful wrath. * * He (the prophet) could not have better expressed to the people the heinousness of their sins, than by laying before them this fact, that God remembered not His footstool in the day of His anger."—The three members of the verse are so related to each other, that the first exhibits Zion as completely enveloped as it were in a thunder cloud, the second represents the glory of Israel as destroyed by the lightning, the third dwells especially on the fact, that the Lord had not so much as spared the holiest of holy things, the ark of the covenant.

[יָצַד]. NAEGLSBACH translates it verdunkelt; GERLACH, umwölkt; HUGH BROUGHTON, beclouded.—OWEN, in a note to his translation of CALVIN, observes that this verb is clearly in the future tense, and proposes to translate it, "Why should the Lord in His wrath becloud the daughter of Zion?" "Then follows," he says, "a description of what had happened to Zion, He hath cast from Heaven," etc. SCOTT seems to take the same view of the expostulatory character of the sentence, when he says, the prophet "inquires, with mingled surprise and regret, how the Lord, the Author of her afflictions, could be induced thus to distress her?" But it is better to take the verb in the sense of the present, How doth the Lord cover, etc., as BLAYNEY, BOOTHROYD, NÆGELSBACH and GERLACH. The Poet "assumes an ideal point of vision prior to" the actual occurrence of the event, "and so regards it as future." Yet while he speaks, the thing is done: and the description is completed in the past tense. The future as thus used in Hebrew, is best translated by the present in English. See GREEN'S Gr. § 263, 5. "The intermingling of different tenses in relation to the same subject, which is so frequent in poetry, foreign as it may be to our modes of thought, does not justify the conclusion that they are used promiscuously or without regard to their distinctive signification" (ib. note "a."). If we accept NÆGELSBACH's idea of the thunder-cloud and the lightning, the use of the future in the first verb is very forcible. The Poet sees the cloud gathering, and while he looks, the lightning has flashed and the work of destruction is complete.—ABEN-EZRA, according to ROSENMUELLER, see also CALVIN, explains the word to mean lifted up to the clouds. God exalted the daughter of Zion to the clouds, "in His wrath," that He might cast her down from a greater height. "For when one wishes to break in pieces an earthen vessel, he not only casts it on the ground, but he raises it up, that it may be thrown down with greater force" (CALVIN). We need some evidence better than this ingenious argument that the word can have this meaning.—The Chald. and Syr., GESSENIUS in his Thes., MAURER and J. D. MICHAELIS translate the word sprevit, contumelia vel opprobrio affecit, dishonored, disgraced, finding for this sense an analogy in the Arabic. The principal argument for this is, that he who is thrown down from Heaven is not surrounded with clouds. We answer 1. According to NÆGELSBACH above, "from Heaven" refers to the subject and not to the object of the verb "cast down." 2. The figure of the thunder-cloud implies rather that the cloud covered the doomed City and Temple, and not that they were lifted up into the clouds. 3. There are two subjects expressed, as well as two verbs. Not the daughter of Zion, but the glory of Israel is cast down to the ground.—GERLACH gives a poetical explanation to the first two clauses, "Jerusalem is compared to a star, that once shone brightly, but was first clouded over and then thrown to the earth:" and seems to imagine an allusion to Isa. xiv. 12. But his beautiful star shines only in his fancy, and not in the text.

Ver. 2. The Lord hath swallowed up.—The Poet has in mind the idea of a yawning abyss. See Ex. xv. 12; Num. xvi. 30–32; xxvi. 10; Deut. xi. 6; Ps. cvii. 17. [All the English versions translate the verb swallowed up, except HENDERSON (destroyed) and the Douay (The Lord hath cast down headlong, from Vulgate, precipitavit).

Yet it seems manifest, from the use of the same word in vers. 5, 8, 16 (see also Hab. i. 13; Isa. xxv. 7, 8; xlix. 19; 2 Sam. xx. 19), that the word is used merely to signify utter destruction, without intending to suggest, even in a figurative sense, the exact method of destruction, as by such "a yawning abyss" as is referred to in passages cited by NÆGELSBACH. GERLACH has destroyed, vertilgt, CALVIN also, perdidit.—W. H. H.]—All the habitations of Jacob. The word rendered habitations includes the ideas of dwellings and pasture-grounds. It indicates the places where the Nomadic spread his tent and allowed his flock to graze. Hence the frequent phrase נִמְלֵךְ כְּרֶמֶר [lit. dwellings of pasture-land], Ps. lxxv. 13; Jer. ix. 9; xxxiii. 10; Joel i. 19, 20; ii. 22. And hath not pitied. See vers. 17, 21; iii. 43. And spared not. [So the Sept. and Vulg. E. V. pitied, is most in accordance with the use of the word: yet the idea of sparing, in the exercise of mercy, is suggested by the order of the words in the original, The Lord swallowed up and spared not all the habitations of Jacob. So CALVIN, BROUGHTON, GERLACH.—W. H. H.]—He hath thrown down—demolished, in His wrath the strongholds of the daughter of Judah. The strongholds of Judah stand in antithesis to the habitations of Jacob; not only the open unprotected places, where the people dwelt among their pasture and grazing lands, but also the fortified cities were visited with destruction.—The daughter of Judah, see i. 15; ii. 5. The expression is very suitable, since only Judah still had any strongholds. See Jer. xxxiv. 7.—He hath brought them down to the ground: He hath polluted the kingdom and the princes thereof. He cast down to the ground, He polluted the kingdom and its princes. The expression הֵרַס לְאָרֶץ, to bring down to the ground, is used very explicitly of fortified places in Isa. xxv. 12; xxvi. 5, comp. Ezek. xiii. 14. Yet to refer it here to what precedes, results in a troublesome asyndeton. Then, too, the structure of the verse would be irregular, for the second idea and clause of the verse would have three lines or members, and the third only one. Finally, there is an idea in bringing down to the ground [or made to touch the ground; margin, E. V.], akin to that of pollution, which immediately follows. For majesty is polluted by being brought into contact with common dust. Compare Ps. lxxxix. 40, חָלַלְתָּ לְאָרֶץ נִוְרוֹ, "Thou hast profaned his crown, by casting it to the ground." [In favor of NÆGELSBACH's construction is 1. the absence of the conjunction. 2. The prevailing meaning of the verb הָרַס followed by לְ, to touch, to come in contact with. 3. The natural division of the verse. 4. The excellent sense. This construction is adopted by ROSENMUELLER, EWALD, NEUMANN, BLAYNEY and NOYES. The only objections to it are 1, the application of the phrase brought down to the ground, in Isaiah, to the razing of fortified places; and 2, which is a stronger objection, the Masoretic punctuation.—W. H. H.]

II. 8, 4.

- 3 He hath cut off in his fierce anger all the horn of Israel: he hath drawn back his right hand from before the enemy, and he burned against Jacob like a flaming 4 fire, which devoureth round about. He hath bent his bow like an enemy: he stood with his right hand as an adversary, and slew all that were pleasant to the eye in the tabernacle of the daughter of Zion: he poured out his fury like fire.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 3.—נָתַן. Only the Niph. is found in Jer., xlviii. 25; i. 23.—חָרָה—חָרָה, Jer. xlviii. 45.—אָכַלָה כִּבִּיב, see Jer. xxi. 14; xlv. 14; i. 32. Jeremiah always employs as the object of אָכַל in this sense, כִּבִּיבִים or כִּבִּיבוֹת.

Ver. 4.—קָשַׁת דָּרָךְ, Jer. ix. 2; xlv. 9; i. 14, 29; ii. 3.—There is no sufficient reason for questioning the pointing of נָצַב as Part. Niph. It is in apposition with דָּרָךְ [נָצַב] is used of God's coming in judgment in Isa. iii. 13; Ps. lxxxii. 1. Its close connection by וְ with the next verb should not be unobserved. He stood or set Himself—His right hand as an adversary—and slew, etc.—W. H. H.] Jeremiah never uses the Niph. נָצַב, only the Hiph., v. 26; xxxi. 21, and Hithp., xlv. 4, 14.—The verb הָרַן (see Lam. ii. 20, 21; iii. 43), is scarcely current with Jeremiah. He uses only the Part. (xxx. 21) and Inf. Kal. (xv. 3). [Lowth, Prelim. Dissert. on Isaiah, and BLAYNEY supply after this verb כָּל נַעַר, every youth, from the Chaldee Paraphrase, to supply an apparent defect in metre.—W. H. H.]—The expression צִי אֶהְיֶה occurs only here.—[The recurrence in Jeremiah of the figures of bending the bow and of pouring out fury as liquid fire (see Jer. iv. 4; vii. 20; xxi. 12; xlii. 18; xlv. 6) may be regarded as evidences of authorship.—W. H. H.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Vers. 3, 4. When it is here said that the Lord had broken the horn of Israel, then that He had deprived him of his right hand, then that He had kindled a fire in Jacob, and as an enemy had assaulted him, it is evident that a climax is intended. There is described first the deprivation of the power of resistance, then the deprivation of help, then the progress to positive hostility. THENIUS sees in vers. 3, 4 a full statement of all the incidents of the war, from the capture of the frontier fortresses to the taking of the city by storm. He understands, therefore, by the horn of Israel, "those places of defence which were prominent, like horns, consequently frontier fortresses;" hath drawn back his right hand, etc. describes the retreat of the Jewish armies to the capital; he burned against Jacob, etc., the effusion of the hostile troops over the land of which they were to become masters; he hath bent his bow, etc., the institution of siege; he stood with his right hand, etc., and slew, etc., the assault and storming of the city; he poured out his fury like fire, the capture of the city. Some of this hits the true sense, but not all. That horn should indicate the frontier fortresses, is artificial. It is to be considered, too, that the phrase כָּל קֶרֶן, all the horn [it may mean, however, every horn: the absence of the article makes this sense most probable.—W. H. H.] To draw back the bow would not indicate the first attack of the city, for that attack was not made with arrows only. To stand with the right hand as an adversary does not mean to begin to fight with the right hand, and does not therefore describe an exclusively hand to hand fight. Certainly, as already remarked, the description advances from merely negative to directly positive hostility, but the latter is described, not by the successive steps of the siege, but according to the various and—as far as practicable—simultaneous events of the achievement, wherein the most impressive event, representing, of course, the end, is placed last of all.

Ver. 3. He hath cut off—He broke—in his fierce anger—in hot anger. See Ex. xi. 8; Deut. xix. 23; Is. vii. 4; 1 Sam. xx. 34; 2 Chron. xxv. 10. [The pronoun his supplied in E. V. is unnecessary, and weakens the sense. There is a rhetorical climax in the words—anger, אָף, ver. 1; wrath, עֶבְרָה, ver. 2; and heat of anger, or hot, fierce, furious anger, חָרָה, ver. 3.—W. H. H.]—All the horn of Israel—Every horn of Israel. See Jer. xlviii. 25; Ps. lxxv. 11. According to constant usage, the horn is a symbol of power; see Ps. xviii. 3; lxxv. 5, 6, etc. [CALVIN: "We know that by horn is meant strength as well as excellency or dignity; and I am disposed to include both here, though the word breaking seems rather to refer to strength or power." NOYES: "every horn, i. e., all her means of defence."]—He hath drawn back—He bent back—his right hand from before the enemy. Does the pronominal suffix הָיָה, in הָיָה, his hand, refer to Jehovah, or to Israel? Grammatically either is possible, and the sense in either case is substantially the same. The answer must depend on which interpretation best agrees with the usage of speech. The expression in full, as it is here, is found nowhere else in the Old Testament. It is worthy of remark that Jeremiah never uses יְמִינִי—right hand, in a figurative sense. The word occurs in his book only once, xxii. 24, and then in its literal sense. The only places that can be adduced as parallel to this place are, on the one side, Ps. lxxiv. 11 (with reference, perhaps, to the expression נִשְׁתָּרֵץ זְרוֹעַ—a stretched-out arm, Ex. vi. 6, and elsewhere), and on the other side, Ps. xlv. 11; lxxxix. 43, 44; comp. Is. xli. 13

Whilst the first named passage distinctly expresses the thought that Jehovah draws back His hand, and that His right hand, the other passages declare that the Lord let the people or the edge of the sword fall back from before their enemy. It seems to me that in our passage the word אחור, back, backward, standing in connection with כפני־אויב, before the enemy, decides for the latter meaning. For in Ps. lxxiv. 11 it is merely הִשִּׁיב־הָיָה, thou withdrawest thy hand. Here the אחור, backward, must change the sense. Drawing back the hand is merely the opposite of stretching it out (וְרָוַע נִשְׁתָּדֵק) and an act of volition consistent with the possession of strength. But falling back before the enemy is a symptom of weakness, which could not be asserted of the hand of Jehovah. As it is said elsewhere that Jehovah strengthens the right hand (Is. xli. 13), or elevates it (Ps. lxxxix. 43), so it can be said that He lets it fall back (as if it had become weak), and this falling back of the right hand is the same, as is elsewhere explained, as a falling back of the person generally (Ps. xlv. 11), or of the sword (held by the right hand, Ps. lxxxix. 44). [OWEN (in a note on CALVIN): "GATAKER, HENRY, BLAYNEY, and HENDERSON, consider the right hand as that of Israel—that God drew back or restrained the right hand of Israel, so that he had no power to face his enemies. But SCOTT agrees with CALVIN; and favorable to the same view are the early versions, except the Syr., for they render the pronoun his own, suam; the Targ. also takes the same view. Had the word been hand, it might have been applied to Israel; but it is the right hand, which commonly means protection, or rather God's power, as put forth to defend His people and to resist enemies. This is farther confirmed by what is said in the following verse, that God stood with His right hand as an enemy. See Ps. lxxiv. 11." GATAKER's argument, in Assembly's Annotations, on the other side, is very strongly put, and agrees in its main points with NAGELSBACH's. Yet, for the following reasons, it seems necessary to stand by the versions and interpreters that refer the pronoun to God. 1. The pronoun usually belongs to the subject of the verb where its personal object is not specified. By adhering to this rule, we would often escape uncertainty and confusion. 2. After such an introduction as in ver. 1, How hath the Lord done all this, and the subsequent use of His with reference to God (ver. 1, His anger, twice, His footstool; ver. 2, His wrath; ver. 4, His bow, His right hand, His fury, etc.), it certainly seems arbitrary and violent in this instance to refer it to another subject. 3. It is awkward, to say the least, to make his right hand in ver. 3 mean one thing, and in ver. 4 another. 4. Throughout this whole passage, vers. 1-10, the people of Israel are represented as passive objects of Divine wrath, and no allusion is made to the slightest activity on their part in resisting the instruments of wrath, as would be done here if his refers to Israel. 5. This makes excellent sense, and preserves the continuity of the thought, verging as usual towards a climax. God breaks off the horn of Israel, that they can no longer oppose their enemies; He bends back

His own right hand, and thus withdraws His own opposition to those enemies; and while Israel lies thus helpless in themselves and deprived of God's help. He pours down upon them the fiery fury of His own wrath, and becomes Himself like an enemy fighting against them. The bending back of His hand may be intended to express God's resistance to His own merciful impulses towards His own people. He forcibly bends back the hand He had already stretched out in Israel's behalf.—W. H. H.]—And he burned against Jacob like a flaming fire, which devoureth round about—And He set Jacob on fire, as a flame of fire which devours round about [i. e., He, as a flame of fire which consumes all around it, set Jacob on fire]. אֵשׁ with אֵשׁ of the object is so often used in the signification of setting on fire, then of consuming by fire (Num. xi. 1, 8; Is. xxx. 33; xlii. 25; xlii. 2; Jer. xlv. 6; Job i. 16; Ps. cvi. 18), that we may take it here unhesitatingly in the same sense. This, indeed, is the only admissible sense. For should we take in Jacob, אֵשׁ, in a local sense, we must still understand אֵשׁ of the kindling of the fire, in which sense only is the Piel used (comp. Ex. xxxv. 3; Jer. vii. 18; Ezek. xxi. 4). Then, too, we see the force of the particle of comparison, כְּאֵשׁ, like a flame. Evidently the meaning is that the Lord had become to Jacob as a flaming fire. He had become so by kindling the consuming fire of war in the land. See Deut. xxxii. 22.

Ver. 4. He hath bent His bow like an enemy. The Lord attacks Israel with all kinds of weapons: and so with the bow. Comp. Ps. vii. 13; Deut. xxxii. 23. [CALVIN: "Stating a part for the whole, he includes in the bow every other weapon." KITTO: "The Hebraism for bow is like that for bread. As the latter includes all food, so does the former include all weapons." (Daily Bib. Ill., Vol. 3, p. 295.)—He stood with His right hand as an adversary. He stood at his right hand as an adversary. We cannot take his right hand as the subject of the verb (עָמַד)—erecta est manus ejus instar hostis (KALKAR) [His right hand stood erect like an adversary, BLAYNEY]—for neither does the verb mean to be erected, raised up, nor does its gender allow this construction. I think it also incorrect to take his right hand as the accusative of the instrument, as TRENIUS, VAHINGER and others do. For to stand with the right hand as an adversary is an unusually odd expression, with no example to sustain it. EWALD would give to the verb עָמַד the meaning of taking aim at something. [So HENDERSON: He hath steadied His right hand like an adversary. "The point of the comparison here is obviously that of the care taken by the archer to obtain a steady aim."] EWALD appeals to Ps. xi. 3, but the phraseology in that place is entirely different. I think that passages like Ps. cix. 6; Zech. iii. 1 illustrate this. In those places the enemy is represented as standing at the right hand. As it is said elsewhere that the friend and helper stands at the right hand, in order to support and strengthen the right hand (Ps. xvi. 8; lxxiii. 23; cix. 31; cx. 5; cxxi. 5; Is. xli. 13), so it is also said that the enemy places himself at the right hand, in order, by hemming it in and weakening it, to overcome its resistance. That כִּינָה, his right hand, has to be taken as an accusative of place, is no objection (see my Gr., § 70, c; Ex. xxxiii. 8), though elsewhere a preposition is used (see the places above referred to, Ps. cix. 6; Zech. iii. 1 and Ps. xlv. 10). [The ingenious reference of his right hand to Israel is peculiar to our author: though CHALDÆUS, as quoted by ROSENMUELLER, adopts a similar construction, but with reference to the enemies of Israel:—"He has placed Himself at the right hand of Nebuchadnezzar, in order to assist him." Besides the absence of the preposition which this interpretation would seem to require, a very strong objection to it is the sudden change of person. For the principal reasons for supposing the right hand in ver. 3 refers to God, because God is the subject of the preceding clause, and no other person is specified, we believe the right hand in ver. 4 also refers to God; if his bow means God's bow, and not Israel's, then his right hand would naturally mean God's, and not Israel's, or Nebuchadnezzar's, or any other person's. It is not necessary, however, to violate grammar by giving to the Niphal participle an active or perfect sense, as EWALD and others have done. We can translate literally thus: He stood, or was standing, or set Himself—His right hand as an adversary. The ellipsis is characteristic of Hebrew poetry, and may be supplied by quoad, as to, or exegetically with, as in our version: He stood with His right hand as an adversary. WORDSWORTH: "The Prophet first has a general view of the awful form of the Almighty, and then beholds His Right Hand putting itself forth as an enemy against Zion." ROSENMUELLER: "He has placed Himself as regards His right hand, as if with it He would hurl at me a javelin." See GERLACH also.—W. H. H.]—And slew all that were pleasant to the eye—And destroyed all that charms or delights the eye. The delights of the eye (see i. 7, 10, 11) are evidently those in whom the eyes of parents take the greatest delight, the virgins and the young men, i. 18. [CALVIN: He slew all the chosen men. It is better to take the verb הָרַג, to kill, slay, metaphorically, as in Ps. lxxviii. 47, for destroy (HENDERSON).—W. H. H.]—In the tabernacle of the daughter of Zion. If the daughter of Zion is the body of the inhabitants of Zion, then the tabernacle of the daughter of Zion is the dwelling-place of those inhabitants, i. e., the city. [These words are connected with what follows, not with the preceding clause: In the tabernacle of the daughter of Zion poured He out like fire His fury. So BLAYNEY, GERLACH, NÆGELSBACH. CALVIN prefers it. The Masoretic punctuation requires it.—W. H. H.]—He poured out His fury like fire. The figurative idea of the outpouring of wrath, conceived of as liquid fire, is found elsewhere in iv. 11; Hos. v. 10; Jer. vi. 11; x. 25; xlii. 18; comp. xiv. 16. That the Poet would indicate the capture and destruction of the city, is clear.

II. 5.

- 5 The LORD was as an enemy: he hath swallowed up Israel, he hath swallowed up all her palaces; he hath destroyed his strongholds, and hath increased in the daughter of Judah mourning and lamentation.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 5.—אֶרְכֹן, in Lam. only here and ver. 7. Often in Jeremiah, vi. 5; ix. 20, etc.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

According to Jer. lii. 13, 14 (see also 6, 12), four weeks after the capture, Nebuzaradan had burned 'the house of Jehovah, the house of the king, all the houses of Jerusalem, and every great house,' and destroyed the walls. To these facts vers. 5-9 a seem to refer, though they relate only to the destruction of the palaces, the holy places and the walls. [The particular description of destruction of holy places begins at ver. 6.—W. H. H.]

Ver. 5. The Lord was as an enemy. The Lord became as an enemy. This is specified, first of all, as the cause of these calamities. As an enemy, see ver. 4, and כַּאֲלִמְנָה as a widow, i. 1.—He hath swallowed up (see ver. 2) Israel, He hath swallowed up all her palaces; He hath destroyed his strongholds. Israel, on the one part, and the palaces and strongholds, on the other, are to each other as the people and the city. Palaces here, as remarked, seem to correspond to "the king's house" and "all the houses of the great men," or "every great house," כָּל-בֵּית הַגִּבּוֹר in Jer. lii. 13. Strongholds, see ver. 2.—He hath destroyed his strongholds, is a quotation from Jer. xlviii. 18. Commentators differ with respect to the suffixes in אֶרְכֹנוֹתָי, her palaces, and כִּבְצָרָיו, his strongholds. Some think the feminine suffix her refers to the daughter of Zion, ver. 4, the masculine suffix his to Israel. Others think that Israel itself may be conceived of, at one time as the name of the country, at another as the name of the city. [This is the opinion of GERLACH, who refers to a very similar instance in Hos. viii. 14, where the feminine suffix is attached to the same word as here, אֶרְכֹנוֹתַי, her palaces, and where, as here the masculine would be expected.—W. H. H.] J. D. MICHAELIS would read אֶרְכֹנוֹתַי, palaces of Jehovah. THENIUS conjectures that הִיא, her, has been changed into הִי, his, by the omission of a stroke of the pen. But all the commentators, so far as I see, have overlooked the fact that the last words are a quotation. In this way we easily explain the masculine suffix, which not only disagrees with her palaces, but violates the rule by which, every where else in the Lamentations, Zion is conceived of as a female person. The word is either a very old scribal error for הִיא, thy strongholds (yet the Sept. has τὰ ὀχυρώματα αὐτῆς), or the Poet has chosen the suffix that best preserved the similarity of sound with the original text. He could do this in virtue of the greater freedom which prevails in the Hebrew with respect to denoting the gender. See my Gr., § 60, 4. As in Ezek. xxiii. 36-49, where Aholah and Aholibah are spoken of, the suffixes are constantly changed (see especially ver. 46); so here also possibly, the suffixes are changed even after a masculine or feminine idea floated before the mind of the Poet. [The mere recurrence of two not very remarkable words in succession, can hardly be regarded as a quotation. But unfortunately there is in the present instance a dissimilarity which is very prejudicial to the idea of a quotation. Here we read שָׁחַת כְּבָצָרָהּ; in Jer. xlviii. 18 it is שָׁחַת כְּבָצָרָהּ, and our author is obliged to suppose a possible scribal error, or to invent an auricular theory of quotation. It seems necessary here to adopt the opinion of those who, according to ROSENMUELLER, refer the masculine suffix to God and the feminine to the daughter of Zion. He swallowed up all her palaces, He destroyed His own strongholds. This is not to be discarded as a mere conjecture where every other mode of interpretation is purely conjectural. It is recommended by the arguments adduced for the explanation of his in ver. 8. It avoids the difficulty of supposing that pronouns of different genders refer to the same person. The her refers to the ideal person Israel, the daughter of Jerusalem. Her palaces are the habitations of the people. His own strongholds are the defences of Zion which is His habitation. Grammar and Rhetoric both commend this explanation.—W. H. H.]—And hath increased or multiplied in the daughter of Judah, see i. 15, mourning and lamentation. The last words in the original are a beautiful paronomasia, borrowed from Is. xxix. 2, הָאֵנִיָּה וְהָאֵנִיָּה. [HENDESSON: "Sorrow and sadness." VITRINGA: Mæror ac maestitia. GERLACH: Betrüb'niss und Trobsal. NAEGLSBACH: Ächzen und Krächzen]. See i. 15, הָרָה וְהָרָה, Gen. i. 2; שָׂוָאָה וְשָׂוָאָה, Job xxx. 10; שָׁמְרָה וְשָׁמְרָה, Ez. xxxv. 3.

II. 6, 7.

- 6 And he hath violently taken away his tabernacle, as if it were of a garden; he hath destroyed his places of the assembly: the LORD hath caused the solemn feasts and Sabbaths to be forgotten in Zion, and hath despised, in the indignation of his 7 anger, the king and the priest. The Lord has cast off his altar, he hath abhorred his sanctuary, he hath given up into the hand of the enemy the walls of her palaces; they have made a noise in the house of the LORD, as in the day of a solemn feast.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 6.—The verb נָשָׂא is found in Jer. xxii. 3; xlii. 22.—שָׁחַת for שָׁחַת, see Crit. note below.—The definite article in הַמִּזְבֵּחַ is in accordance with recognized philological usage. See my Gr., § 71, 4 a. DRECHSLER, Is., Vol. ii., p. 203 n. [The definite article was used in comparisons because "the Hebrew commonly conceived of the whole class of objects of which he spoke." See GREEN'S Gr., § 245, 5 d.—W. H. H.]—בְּמִקְדָּשָׁהּ, the first time is used of festal place (see Ps. lxxiv. 8; comp. 1 Sam. xx. 33), and then of the festal itself (see i. 4). [See Crit. note below.]—שָׁחַת. This Piel form is found only here. It must be taken in the accusative sense.—שָׁחַת occurs in Jeremiah only in xvii. 21-27, where the profanation of the Sabbath is referred to.—נָשָׂא, in Lamentations only here; in Jer. xiv. 21; xxiii. 17; xxxiii. 24.—נָשָׂא, in Lamentations only here; in Jer. x. 10; xv. 17; i. 25.

Ver. 7. נָשָׂא, three times in Lam., ii. 7; iii. 17, 31, never in Jeremiah.—נָשָׂא, see i. 14 [Introd. Add. Rem. p. 32].—נָשָׂא. This verb is found only here and in Ps. lxxxix. 40. [BLAYNEY renders it as Niph., His sanctuary is accursed, but conjectures from Sept., ἀνετίναξεν, the true reading may be נָשָׂא. N substituted for ן, He hath shaken off His Sanctuary. As the meaning could only be conjectured from the ancient versions (see ALEXANDER, Ps. lxxxix. 40), it is not improbable that the Sept. gave it the sense of נָשָׂא. So BROUGHTON, cast off, and CALVIN, reputit vel reject procul ab animo suo. The fundamental signification of the verb is to reject, to repudiate. FUERST gives the Piel sense, to cast down entirely, to repudiate, to reject. This agrees with the accepted translation of Ps. lxxxix. 40. The sense of abhor, derived from a cognate Arabic root, would suit that place, as well as this; and is more agreeable to the corresponding word in the first clause, נָשָׂא, if the fundamental idea of נָשָׂא is to be foul, to stink, as GESNIUS says, though FUERST, with good reason, denies this. The idea of abhorring or of rejecting with disdain or disgust, is given to both these verbs by NAEGLSBACH and GERLACH. NAEGLSBACH translates, The Lord rejected with disdain His altar, He abhorred His sanctuary, and GERLACH just reverses the expressions, The Lord abhorred His altar, He rejected with disdain His sanctuary.—W. H. H.]—שָׁחַת, see i. 10; ii. 20, twice in Jeremiah, xvii. 12; ii. 51.—הַמִּזְבֵּחַ, see 1 Sam. xxiii. 20; Ps. xxxi. 9, is not found in Jeremiah. The only part of the verb he uses is the Pual, and that only once, xlii. 19. [NAEGLSBACH translates this verb "verschloss," shut up, see marg., R. V.

He makes no remark upon its meaning. FUEBSTER regards כָּנַר to surround, enclose, Hiph. to shut up, and כָּנַר to flow out, Hiph. to deliver up, as entirely distinct verbs, and says that "all attempts to unite their meanings must be regarded as failures."—W. H. H.]. אֶרְכָּנוֹתֶיהָ. The connection requires us to understand this of the sanctuary, although no place can be cited in which אֶרְכָּנוֹן is used of the Temple; for Jer. xxx. 18, to which some appeal, is to be explained otherwise: See notes on that place. J. D. MICHAELIS would read, אֶרְכָּנוֹת יְהוָה, palace of Jehovah. קוֹל נְתָנוּ, see Jer. xxii. 20.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

[Vers. 6-10 describe particularly the destruction of the holy places. Here God claims a special property. Everything is His. The emphatic use of the pronoun, shows that it is also significant in ver. 5, his strongholds as distinguished from her palaces.—W. H. H.]

Ver. 6. And He hath violently taken away His tabernacle (marg., hedge) as if it were of a garden. And He laid waste as a garden His tabernacle. The meaning of the verb is to use violence, to offer violence. To do violence to a garden is to lay it waste. The laying waste of a garden has these peculiarities; it is easily done, it is in some sense a crime against nature, and for that reason a garden laid waste is a revolting as well as a sad spectacle.—But what is the meaning of the word שָׁן, translated tabernacle

(marg., hedge)? That it stands for כֶּכֶּן, cannot be doubted. כֶּכֶּן constantly denotes that sort of (hütte) hut, cot, bower, that is made of wicker-work [or plaited twigs, boughs], also lairs of beasts similarly constructed, Jer. xxv. 38; Ps. x. 9. [J. A. ALEXANDER: "The Hebrew word is commonly applied to any temporary shed or booth, composed of leaves and branches." But, according to FUEBSTER, the word is derived from כָּכַן=to protect, and means properly, "the covering, protecting, screening thing (not a thing woven together out of branches) hence a covering, hut, tent; a covert, lair."—W. H. H.] Then it denotes a house generally, and especially the holy tabernacle, Jehovah's house, Ps. lxxvi. 8; as does also כֶּכֶּן, Ps. xviii. 12; Job xxxvi. 29; comp. כֶּכֶּן; Am. v. 26.—If now it is said, that the Lord hath done violence to His tabernacle as to a garden, the tertium comparationis, the point of the comparison, consists in the facility with which the end is accomplished and in the contrast between the proper condition of things and that which the laying waste has produced. As easily as one might root up plants, fell trees and plough the ground, has the Lord overthrown the firm walls of His sanctuary; and as sad and incomprehensible as the appearance of a devastated pleasure garden is the spectacle of the sanctuary in ruins. The comparison is the more apt, because the city of God, with her joyous fountains, springing from the dwelling-place of the Most High (Ps. xli. 5; comp. lxxiv. 1-4), could with truth be called יְהוָה's garden (Is. li. 3), παράδεισος εὐλογίας, a Paradise of glory (Sirach xl. 27). [On the whole, our English Version seems best to express the true sense of this difficult passage, "and He hath violently taken away His tabernacle as if it were of a garden," i. e., as if it were but such a cottage in the garden as vinedressers were accustomed to build till the vintage was past. So CALVIN. This interpretation involves a play on the word שָׁן, as properly meaning a garden house, and also denoting God's tabernacle.—W. H. H.]—He hath destroyed His places of the assembly. He destroyed His place of assembly (Festort). [So HENDERSON. NOTES: place of congregation. BLAYNEY: His congregation. It is better (see note below), to translate, He abolished His appointed services, or solemnities.—W. H. H.]—The LORD hath caused the solemn feasts and Sabbaths to be forgotten in Zion. Jehovah exterminated [caused to be forgotten] in Zion festival [appointed times of Divine service] and Sabbath.—The result of the destruction of the place for holding festivals is, that the festivals themselves can no longer be celebrated and are forgotten. By Zion, not Mount Zion, but the holy city generally is meant [on the contrary, in the strictest sense the holy places are intended].—W. H. H.]—And hath despised, in the indignation of His anger, the king and the priest. And rejected [so FUEBSTER also] in the fury of His wrath King and Priest. Since the festivals are no longer celebrated, those persons who were appointed to officiate in them, are by their omission removed from active service. That the kings belonged to this class of persons is evident, because they were, not only God's representatives to the people, but also intercessors with God in behalf of the people. "The Israelitish king (especially in the persons of David and Solomon) bore a certain priestly character, in that the king at the head of the people and in their name worshipped God and, on the other hand, brought back to the people the Divine blessing (2 Sam. vi. 17, 18; 1 Kings iii. 4; viii. 14, 15, etc.; 55, 56, etc.; 62, 63, etc.; ix. 25; 1 Chron. xxix. 10, 11, etc.; 2 Chron. i. 6; comp. Ex. xli. 1-12)." OEHLER in HEBZ., Real-Enc. VIII., pp. 12, 13.

שָׁן. That this word stands for כֶּכֶּן is evident, because, 1. ש and כ frequently are interchanged, especially in the later language (see שָׁן and שֹׁן, 2 Sam. i. 22, רָפַשׁ, פָּרַשׁ and רָפַשׁ, רָפַשׁ, Ges. Thes., p. 931. EWALD, § 50 a). 2. We find in Ex. xxxiii. 22 the verbal form שָׁפַתִּי for שָׁפַתִּי, and in Is. v. 5 מְשֻׁפָּה for מְשֻׁפָּח, Mich. vii. 4. 3. Since שָׁן and שֹׁן occur only in the places cited, and שָׁן is found only here, it would appear that these forms are not so much indications of an independent root שָׁן, as merely different ways of writing כֶּכֶּן. [When GERLACH says that כֶּכֶּן never means hütte, a cot, tent, or tabernacle, he overlooks Ps. lxxvi. 8, where it undoubtedly describes the holy Temple as God's tabernacle house or dwelling-place. To his argument that שָׁן would be an unsuitable designation of the Temple, because if it means a house at all, it can only mean such a house as a cot or bower made of twisted branches of trees, it may be replied; 1. the Temple might be so called in allusion to the ancient tabernacle which was temporary and movable; 2. שָׁן may be derived from שָׁן in the generic sense of enclosing, and not in the particular sense of enclosing with a hedge or fence, as שָׁן to weave. Indeed GERLACH seems to give up the very point for which he so ably contends, that שָׁן cannot mean a house, when he gives it here the sense of an enclosure (Gehege) and applies it to the whole sacred enclosure, including of course the Temple. HENDERSON, also, translates the word His inclosure.—W. H. H.] The Sept. translates καὶ διεστράσεν ὡς ἀμπελον τὸ σκηνώμα αὐτοῦ [He tore up as if it had been a vine His tabernacle]. It would seem that Job xv. 83 was in the mind of the translator, where it is said, $\text{יִחְמוֹס בְּנֶפֶךְ כִּרְמִי}$ [He shall shake off his unripe grape as the vine, E. V. EWALD accepts (in his 3d ed.) the Sept. translation, and supposes בְּנֶפֶךְ , instead of בְּנֵי , to be the true reading. To this GERLACH objects—1. That כִּרְמִי cannot mean to tear up, to pull out; 2. The conjecture that בְּנֶפֶךְ may have existed in the text is unnecessary, since the Sept. translator may have interpreted בְּנֵי as a vineyard and translated it by ἀμπελος=a vine, as כִּרְמִי is translated by the Sept. in Lev. xxv. 3, 4.—W. H. H.] The explanation of PAREAU, ROSENMUELLER and KALKAR, et violenter abripuit sicut sepe horti sepe suam [NOYES: He hath violently torn away His hedge, like the hedge of a garden], according to which בְּנֵי would be taken for בְּנֵי שָׁן , is not grammatically allowable, since such an omission of the governing word, after the particle of comparison, could only occur where the context necessarily required the word to be supplied,—as, for example, when it is said, Is. lxiii. 2, $\text{בְּנֵי קִרְבָּיִךְ בְּנֵי}$ [thy garments like the garments of him that treadeth in the winevat], we supply the idea of בְּנֵי before בְּנֵי , because the garments could not be compared to the person of the man treading the wine-press. So Gen. xviii. 11 and other passages which might be adduced here, are to be explained. See my Gr., § 65, 3, note 103, 2. But in our passage there is no necessity for supplying שָׁן before בְּנֵי , because the laying waste of the house can very well be compared to devastation of a garden. The explanation of THENIUS, “He injured that which was, in respect to His house (בְּנֵי), standing in an entirely subordinate relation), the garden, by which is meant the Temple courts,” is altogether too artificial. If the courts could be called the garden of the Temple, for which, however, THENIUS adduces no evidence, why did not the Prophet at once call it simply בְּנֵי ? [GERLACH: “The translation of THENIUS, He injured as the garden of His tabernacle, i. e., that which was the garden with respect to His Tabernacle, speaking analogically (whereby the two courts surrounding the Temple-edifice and connected by terraces, would be designated, which might be poetically regarded as the garden belonging to the Palace of the King of Israel), requires בְּנֵי to be taken in the construct case in spite of the article—an anomaly, for the justification of which (see EWALD, § 290, d; GRSÆNIUS, § 108, 2, n) something more is demanded than the remark, ‘ בְּנֵי stands in an entirely subordinate relation,’ for in point of fact it absolutely determines the meaning of בְּנֵי ,”—the garden of His tabernacle.— בְּנֵי . This word occurs six times in Lam., i. 4, 15; ii. 6, bis, 7, 22. Our translators render it in five different ways, and in this verse, where it occurs twice, in two different senses. In i. 4; ii. 6 they call it the solemn feasts; in i. 15, an assembly; in ii. 6, places of the assembly; and the phrase $\text{בְּנֵי יוֹם מִן הַיּוֹם}$, they translate in ii. 7, as in the day of a solemn feast, and in ii. 22, as in a solemn day. That the word could have such variety of meaning in such close connection is improbable. The word is derived from עָרַן , to appoint. It means something fixed, determined upon, appointed. It is used in the sense of a set time, an appointed place, a time or place appointed for meeting together, especially for purposes of religious worship, and hence the regularly appointed and observed ordinances or services of worship. As connected with the assembling of the congregation for worship, it is not unlikely that the word acquired some ambiguity in its use, like our English word church, referring sometimes to time or place of service, sometimes to the people engaged in the service, and sometimes to the service itself. But we can always trace in the use of the Hebrew word its original signification of a set or appointed time, place or service: and never, perhaps, has it the simple unqualified meaning of an assembly, a congregation, a festive occasion. There is no necessity of ascribing to it so many significations in the Lamentations, and two entirely different meanings in two successive lines of this one verse. In i. 15 it may have its primitive meaning of a set time. In ii. 7, 22 the phrase $\text{בְּנֵי יוֹם מִן הַיּוֹם}$ may mean a day appointed, fixed upon, predetermined, for any especial occasion. In the other three places, where it occurs, it refers to the services appointed to be celebrated in the Temple. The reference is probably to the daily services of sacrifice, praise and prayer. The cessation of the annual feasts and greater festivals, which were of infrequent occurrence, would not be so remarkable as the abrupt and entire cessation of morning and evening prayer which had been observed, without intermission, for nearly five hundred years, or ever since the Temple was first consecrated.—There is, therefore, no real difference in the use of this word in the Prophecies of Jeremiah and in the Lamentations.—W. H. H.]

Ver. 7. The Lord hath cast off—The Lord rejected with disdain—His altar,—He hath abhorred—He abhorred—His sanctuary. The altar and sanctuary are recognized as the central points and chief places of Divine worship. By this it is obvious that $\text{בְּנֵי קִרְבָּיִךְ}$, sanctuary, here must signify, not in its widest sense the Temple generally, which has been already sufficiently indicated by שָׁן , tabernacle, and בְּנֵי , place of assembly, ver. 6, but in its narrower sense the sanctuary proper, the Temple which contained the Holy place and Holy of Holies. This sense best corresponds with $\text{בְּנֵי קִרְבָּיִךְ}$ [an altar, in the widest sense, or place where offerings are made.—W. H. H.], for not the altar alone, but the holy place and the holy of holies were places of offering (Ex. xxx. 1-10).—He hath given up—He gave up—into the hand of her enemy the walls of her palaces. The connection requires us to understand by the walls of her palaces the walls of the sanctuary. [The altar is treated with contempt, the holy places are defiled, the edifice itself is given into the power of the enemy, and where we once heard the voices of a worshipping people, is heard now the wild clamor of heathen idolators.—W. H. H.]—They have made a noise—they shouted, or raised a cry or clamor—in the house of the LORD—in the house of Jehovah—as in the day of a solemn feast [lit., like a day—a time appointed, which can only refer to some regularly appointed festival of the church, and is here to be so translated, though we might render in conformity with ver. 6 and ch. i. 4, 15, a day of appointed religious services, with reference, however, to the great festivals of the church.—W. H. H.]. A clamor, loud as a festival jubilee, but of a different origin and character, is heard in the temple. It is a festival for their enemies, not for Israel (i. 15). At this feast Israel is the victim sacrificed. [WORDSWORTH: “a noise, a cry of jubilee. There is a contrast between the former shout of festal joy of worshippers in the Temple, and the cry of exultation of the Chaldeans, ‘Down with it!

Down with it to the ground!’” GERLACH: “קול” (cry) is not to be understood, with PAREAU and ROSENMUELLER, of the war-cry, but of the shouts of joy and triumph on the part of the enemy, as the comparison with the jubilee-festival shows (see Is. xxx. 29).” See crit. note, ver. 6.]

II. 8, 9.

- 8 The LORD hath purposed to destroy the wall of the daughter of Zion; he hath stretched out a line, he hath not withdrawn his hand from destroying: therefore 9 he made the rampart and the wall to lament; they languished together. Her gates are sunk into the ground; he hath destroyed and broken her bars: her king and her princes are among the Gentiles: the law is no more; her prophets also find no vision from the LORD.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 8.—וְהָיָה, often in Jeremiah, ii. 30; iv. 7; xxxvi. 29, etc.; in Lam. only here.—קָל, Jer. xxxi. 39, K'ri.—כַּל in Jer. xii. 11; xiv. 2; xxiii. 10; Hiph. only in Ez. xxxi. 15 and here.—וְהָיָה, not in Jer.—וְהָיָה is used in a precisely similar way in Jer. xiv. 2.

Ver. 9.—וְהָיָה, Piel, in Lam. only here, in Jer. often, xii. 17; xv. 7; xxiii. 1; ii. 55.—וְהָיָה, in Lam. only here and iii. 4, in Jer. xliii. 13, comp. ii. 30.—וְהָיָה, Jer. xlix. 31; ii. 30.—וְהָיָה, Jer. xiv. 14; xxiii. 16.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Ver. 8. The LORD hath purposed—Jehovah purposed—to destroy the wall of the daughter of Zion. As has been remarked, we are explicitly informed, Jer. lii. 13, 14; 2 Kings xxv. 9, 10, that four weeks after the capture of the city, Nebuchadnezzar had destroyed the Temple, the houses and the city walls. Of the destruction of the walls the passages cited speak with special emphasis (Jer. lii. 14 and 2 Kings xxv. 10), “and all the army of the Chaldeans, that were with the captain of the guard, brake down the walls of Jerusalem round about.”—He hath stretched out a line—He stretched out the measuring-line. The architect employs the measuring line in order to build correctly. Jehovah applies it in order to level the wall to the ground in the most literal manner. This figure substantially occurs in Amos vii. 7-9; the expression first occurs in Is. xxxiv. 11; 2 Kings xxi. 13 and Job xxxviii. 5 [see Zech. i. 16. GERLACH: “The use of the measuring line denotes that the destruction of the building will be executed with the same rigorous precision with which an architect carries out his preconceived plan. MICHAELIS’ explanation is too artificial; ‘a line, as it were, designated the extent of the destruction, that the devastating punishment might be proportionate to the guilt.” J. A. ALEXANDER: on Is. xxxiv. 11. “The sense of the metaphor may be, either that God has laid this work out for Himself and will perform it (BARNES), or that in destroying He will act with equity and justice (GILL), or that even in destroying He will proceed deliberately and by rule (KNOBEL), which last sense is well expressed in ROSENMUELLER’S paraphrase, ad mensuram vastabitur, ad regulam depopulabitur,” it is laid waste by measure, it is depopulated by rule. While the idea of the thoroughness and completeness of the work of destruction, as indicated by GERLACH, suits better here than any of the other explanations suggested above, and is undoubtedly included in the meaning of the words, yet the main thought is, that God Himself predetermined the extent of the destruction; Jehovah purposed it and He stretched out a line to mark its beginning and its end. Human instruments were both incited and restrained by Him. It was a line stretched out, not after, but before the destruction, not to show its extent, but to define its limits, “designed to point out what was to be destroyed” (OWEN).—W. H. H.]—He hath not withdrawn His hand from destroying (marg., swallowing up). He with- drew, or averted not, His hand, see ver. 8, from devouring, destroying, swallowing up, see ver. 2. [What He had designed, He executed. He withdrew not His hand till the full measure of destruction indicated by the line was complete.—W. H. H.].—Therefore He made—Then made He—the rampart and the wall to lament—rampart and wall mourn. The two words, rampart and wall, are united as here in Is. xvi. 1. “Rampart,” חָל (see 2 Sam. xx. 15; Ob. 20) is the pomærium, the circumvallation, or the smaller wall in front of the chief wall. [FUEBSTER: “The outermost fence of fortifications, the glacis, the (outermost) rampart around the city walls, pomærium, πορτειχισμα, antemurale.” In 2 Sam. xx. 15 it is rendered in E. V. by “trench.” In Ob. 20, not expressed in E. V., it means, according to FUEBSTER, a province.—W. H. H.].—They languished together. A prosopopœia, as in the preceding expression, “He made rampart and wall mourn,” and in i. 4. Comp. vers. 18, 19.

Ver. 9. [In vers. 1-8 the Lord executing His wrath has been constantly before us. Now the work is done: and in vers. 9, 10, we are afforded a brief glance at the results, after the catastrophe was over.—W. H. H.] The first part of this verse may be taken as a continuation and conclusion of the foregoing description; or as merely a recapitulation, by way of transition to what follows. If the latter is correct, then the gates are to be regarded as a part of the walls, and with the walls sunken into the ground. But, since the gates constituted the most important part of the walls, and were in fact the very centres of public life (see their use as Forums, Deut. xxi. 19; Ruth iv. 1; 2 Sam. xix. 9; 1 Kings xxii. 10) and were moreover the keys to the city, we may regard them as representative of the city itself, and so understand the first part of ver. 9, as a comprehensive conclusion of the preceding description.—Her gates are sunk into the ground. The sense of the verb by itself (סָכַן) is not to sink down, but to sink into, as well as the prefix שִׁ, shows that שָׁכַן is not to the earth, but into the earth. The ruined gates sink into the earth, and on account of the accumulation of ruins are buried beneath the level of the ground. [ASSEM. ANNOT. “The Jewish Doctors upon the place, out of their Talmudists, tell us strange stories of the gates of Jerusalem sinking down into the ground, that they might not come into the enemies’ power, because they were the work of David’s hands: and some of ours run as wildly wide another way, expounding it of the Priests and Judges that were wont to sit in the gates, see v. 14. I conceive no more to be meant than that the gates were thrown down to the ground, and lying along there (such of them and such parts of them as had escaped the fire, i. 4; Neh. i. 8; ii. 3, 13, 17), were buried in the rubbish when the walls were demolished. See Neh. ii. 13, 14; iv. 10.” GERLACH: “This is said of the gates because they were so completely destroyed (PARKAU, THENIUS, buried under rubbish), that no more trace could be seen of them than if they had sunk into the ground, not because (as MICHAELIS says) the gates overthrown by the enemy sunk into ditches dug under them.”]—He hath destroyed and broken.—He destroyed and broke in pieces [literally and phonetically shivered, שָׁבַר]—her bars

[the bars that secured the gates, see Ps. cvii. 16.—W. H. H.].—Her King and her Princes are among the Gentiles, the heathen. From this point the discourse relates to persons instead of things. If the king and princes were already among the heathen, then the transportation into exile had already taken place.—The law is no more—there is no law, (Kein Gesetz ist mehr vorhanden). תּוֹרָה, law, may denote by itself the whole law, a particular part of the law, or the law as a rule of conduct, considered, however, subjectively with respect to the theory, i. e., as the matter of instruction (institutio, doctrina is in fact the fundamental meaning of the word).

Add to this that אֵין תּוֹרָה, there is no law, may grammatically refer to the whole preceding sentence (“there they cannot practise the law,” LUTHER) [the King and Princes are among the Gentiles, where they cannot observe the law]; or merely to תּוֹרָה, among the Gentiles (“who have no divine revelation,” KALKAR), [“among the Gentiles” who are “without law,” which would be a correct translation of the Hebrew. HUGH BROUGHTON gives this sense and refers to Rom. ii. 14, “Her King and her Princes are among the heathen that have no law.”—W. H. H.]; or it may be taken as an independent proposition. If we compare such passages as Jer. xviii. 18

princes," she is deprived of "the law." This agrees substantially with NAEGLSBACH's interpretation, but he has erred in making two wholly independent sentences of what is really only one, though consisting of two poetical parts as the rhythmical structure requires. The correct translation is—Her king and her princes among the heathen—there is no law. This is recommended by the two arguments which GERLACH very forcibly urges in favor of his rendering. 1. It is in accordance with the Hebrew accents, which NAEGLSBACH entirely ignores and violates, and which connect the words without law, or there is no law with what precedes. 2. "This explanation, agreeing with the accents, is further recommended by the fact that the two last members of verse 9 describe the fate of those persons, standing to the city in the relation of Helpers and Counsellors or Comforters (her king and her prophets), of whose help and counsel, or comfort, the city had been deprived, even as (according to the first member of ver. 9) she had been deprived of the external means of protection. It is the deprivation of all these, formerly the medium of divine help, that the Poet mourns (see Hos. iii. 4; xiii. 10; Is. iii. 2)," GERLACH. Another argument for the translation suggested is, that it renders a verb in the first part of the sentence unnecessary, or helps us at least readily to supply it. If we make two wholly independent sentences, as NAEGLSBACH does, then there is not in the whole book a similar instance of the omission of a verb: and, indeed, it is somewhat conjectural what verb ought to be supplied; the simple fact, that the king and princes are among the Gentiles, is not of itself and necessarily an evil, we must add to this another idea that they are exiled, or imprisoned, or disgraced, or suffering, or dying among the Gentiles. If, on the other hand, we read the two clauses as intimately connected and interdependent, as the accents imply, then the proper verb in the first clause, if indeed any verb is necessary, is suggested by the last clause, and the construction is not wholly unparalleled in the book. Her king and her princes among the nations—there is no law, plainly means (Because), her king and her princes (are) among the nations—there is (for her) no law. So in i. 2. And her tears on her cheek, there is no comfort to her from all her lovers, means undoubtedly, and her tears (are) on her cheek (because) there is no comfort, etc. In both cases the two clauses are related as cause and effect, and in both the use of the Hebrew לֵּאמֹר , which contains in itself the verb "to be," prevents what would be the case otherwise and what would be an anomaly in this book, the occurrence of a whole sentence without a single verb expressed. In the other instances in this book, in which our English translators have thought it necessary to supply the verb to be, its omission in the original is highly poetical and very expressive. I. 4. "And she is in bitterness," $\text{וְהָיָה בִּרְעָדָהּ}$, lit. and she—bitterness to her, and i. 20, "for I am in distress," בְּצָרָה , lit. for trouble to me, are Hebrew idioms quite synonymous with the old English forms "woe's her," "woe's me!" In i. 22, "for my sighs are many, and my heart is faint," lit. for many my sighs, to my heart sickness, the omission of the verb, while it does not mar the sense, intensifies the expression, when these words are read in their close connection with the preceding prayer. So in our text, the absence of the verb is due to the broken, rapid, vehement style of the poetry of passion; Her king and her princes among the heathen—there is no law. But if we take the first clause as a complete and separate statement of the mere fact that her king and her princes are among heathen, the omission of the verb must be regarded as a blemish and a carelessness of which the writer of the Lamentations is nowhere else guilty.—The meaning of law, according to this interpretation is obvious. The law of the land, which was the law of God as especially revealed for the government of the Jewish theocracy, is no longer observed and administered, for its guardians and administrators, the king and the princes are in exile. All "legal observances" were swept away (HENDERSON). The law, moral, ceremonial and judicial, as regarded its administration in Judea, "was no more" (OWEN).—W. H. II.]—Her prophets also find no vision from the LORD. Also her prophets receive no longer vision [revelation from God, divine communication] from Jehovah. These words have been taken as evidence that the Poet, in the whole of the foregoing description, had in mind only the condition of the Israelites remaining in the land. But if Jeremiah received an answer to the question which he put to the Lord ten days after he asked it (Jer. xlii. 4, 7), then it could not be said that the prophets could receive no vision from the Lord. I believe, therefore, that the Poet here had in mind the great body of the people who had been carried into exile. Those who, with their king, princes and priests, were "among the heathen," and on that account "without law," were the ones who were also without prophets. [Not the people as such, whether in exile, or remaining in Judea, but the ideal person of "the daughter of Zion" (see vers. 1, 4, 8, 10) is the subject of this description. That her gates were sunken into the ground and her bars broken into pieces, localizes the scene depicted in Jerusalem. It is, further, her king and her princes who are "among the heathen," so that she is left "without law." In strict reference to this mystical personage, representing the genius of the theocratic people mourning amid the ruins of Jerusalem, it is now added "also her prophets find no vision from Jehovah." To suppose the Poet in the first clause of the verse to speak of Jerusalem, and in the two following clauses of the people in exile, is to cause an abrupt transition from one subject to another subversive of all unity of construction, and to cover with a cloud of rhetorical confusion, in addition to the cloud of Divine anger, the unique and beautiful conception of the daughter of Zion sitting solitary and forlorn, weeping, helpless and comfortless, amidst the ruins of the theocratic city. If, as NAEGLSBACH argues, it could not be said that the people remaining in the land were without "vision from Jehovah," because Jeremiah received an answer to his question as related in Jer. xlii. 4-7, much less may it be affirmed that the exiles were without "vision from Jehovah," since at that very time Ezekiel was exercising his prophetic office in Babylonia.

In point of fact, however, the time of which the Poet speaks is subsequent to the period referred to in Jer. xlii. 4-7: a time, not only succeeding the destruction of the city and the transportation of the mass of the people to Babylonia, but posterior to the flight of the fugitives to Egypt, carrying the Prophet with them, as is evident especially from Lam. iv. 17-20; v. 6, 9. At this time, doubtless, Jeremiah himself in Egypt, and Ezekiel and perhaps Daniel in Babylonia, and not improbably other prophets, whose names have not come down to us, were speaking to the people as moved by the Holy Ghost. How then could it be said that the prophets of the daughter of Zion found no vision from Jehovah, since whatever was spoken by a prophet of God, whether in Jerusalem or at any distance from it, was, according to our theocratic idea, intended for the whole church, however its members might be scattered? The answer is that her prophets found no vision from Jehovah which had for its object her deliverance from her present sorrows. Her material defences were broken down, her natural guardians and the administrators of her laws were in captivity, and her prophets had no word from the Lord for her relief, her help, her comfort. Indeed the words of her prophets at this time, as these very Lamentations show, while not without intimations of a future deliverance, destroyed every vestige of hope of any immediate interposition of God in her behalf. Jeremiah delivered no encouraging prophecies to the Jews after the city was destroyed. There is nothing in Ezekiel of an encouraging character, after this event was fully consummated, if we except the obscure visions relating to a remote future in the last chapters of his book. Daniel delivered no prophecy containing any promise of temporal blessing to the Jews, till towards the very close of the captivity. As SCOTT remarks, "There seems to have been at this period a very peculiar suspension of that information and encouragement, which the prophets had for many ages been employed to communicate to the people. Except Jeremiah, Ezekiel and Daniel, no prophet is mentioned from the beginning to the end of the captivity, when Haggai and Zechariah were raised up. This chasm was an evident token of divine displeasure, and must have been a very sensible aggravation of the suffering endured by the pious remnant."

II. 10.

- 10 The elders of the daughter of Zion sit upon the ground, and keep silence: they have cast up the dust upon their heads; they have girded themselves with sackcloth: the virgins of Jerusalem hang down their heads to the ground.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 10.—יָשְׁבוּ לָאָרֶץ. See דָּרְדְּרוּ לָאָרֶץ, Jer. xiv. 2 [they lie mourning on the ground].—The form יָדְכוּ (see OLSH., § 143, d, 265 c) is not without analogies in Jeremiah, for he says יָדְכוּ, viii. 14; יָדְכוּ, xiv. 17. [FURBER makes the word Niph., DAVIDSON, Kal.]—עָפָר does not occur in Jeremiah [nor any equivalent for it.—W. H. H.].—חֲנָנִי שָׁקִים, see Jer. iv. 8; vi. 26; xlix. 3.—הָרִירִיד, Jer. xlix. 16; li. 40.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Ver. 10. To the dignitaries of the Theocracy there belonged two classes, in whose sorrow the grief of the people found its most eloquent expression,—these were the elders and the virgins. See i. 4, 18, 19. [These are now introduced as mourning over the devastated Zion, the absence of the law and of prophetic vision.—W. H. H.]—The elders of the daughter of Zion sit upon the ground and keep silence [lit. They sit on the ground, they keep silent, elders of daughter Zion]. The elders, formerly called together to give counsel, now are silent without any counsel to give. [They are speechless, not only counselless. They have no words even for sorrow. "Small griefs are eloquent,—great ones dumb." (CLARKE).—W. H. H.]—They have cast up dust upon their heads—they sprinkle dust on their head. [Lit., They cast up, or throw up dust upon their head.] See Josh. vii. 6; Job ii. 12; Ez. xxvii. 30.—They have girded themselves with sackcloth—they gird on [or put on] sackcloth [or sacks]—The virgins of Jerusalem hang down their heads to the ground—The virgins of Jerusalem sink to the earth their head The virgins also, who were wont to be called officially to act as the mouth-piece of the people, when the feeling of general joy was to be expressed, now are dumb and hang down their heads to the ground.

PART II.

II. VERS. 11-22.

- 3 VER. 11. Mine eyes failed with tears,
 My bowels were troubled,
 My liver was poured on the ground,
 For the ruin of the daughter of my people,—
 Because child and suckling fainted away
 In the streets of the city !
- 4 VER. 12. To their mothers they say—
 Where is corn and wine?—
 Whilst they fainted as the wounded
 In the streets of the city,—
 Whilst they poured out their soul
 Into their mothers' bosom.
- 5 VER. 13. What can I testify to thee?
 What liken to thee, thou daughter of Jerusalem?
 What compare to thee,
 That I may comfort thee, daughter of Zion?
 For great as the sea is thy ruin!
 Who can heal thee?
- 6 VER. 14. Thy prophets predicted for thee
 Falsehood and delusion,
 And uncovered not thy guilt
 To avert thy captivity.
 But then they predicted for thee
 False burdens and expulsions !
- 7 VER. 15. All that passed by the way
 Clapped their hands at thee;
 They hissed and wagged their head
 At the daughter of Jerusalem.
 Is this the city of which they used to say—
 Perfect in beauty,—Joy of the whole earth?
- 8 VER. 16. All thine enemies
 Gaped at thee with their mouth,
 They hissed and gnashed the teeth;
 They said,—We have utterly destroyed—
 Yea, this is the day we have looked for—
 We have found [it]—we have seen [it] !
- 9 VER. 17. Jehovah did what He purposed:
 He fulfilled His word
 That He commanded in the days of old.
 He demolished and pitied not.
 He made the enemy joyful over thee;
 He exalted the horn of thine adversaries:
- 10 VER. 18. Their heart cried out unto the Lord.
 O wall of the daughter of Zion,
 Let tears run down like a river
 Day and night,
 Give thyself no rest,
 Let not the daughter of thine eye cease.

- ק VER. 19. Arise—cry in the night—
In the beginning of the night watches;
Pour out thy heart like water
Before the face of Jehovah:
Lift up thy hands to Him, for the life of thy young children,
That faint for hunger, at the head of every street.
- ך VER. 20. See, Jehovah, and look!
To whom hast Thou done this?
Should women eat their fruit—
Children whom they have nursed?
Should Priest and Prophet
Be slain in the sanctuary of the Lord?
- ש VER. 21. The boy and the old man
Lay on the ground in the streets.
My virgins and my young men
Fell by the sword.
Thou hast killed—in the day of Thy wrath—
Hast slain—hast not pitied!
- ת VER. 22. Thou callest together, as on an appointed day of solemnity,
My terrors from round about.
And there was not, in the day of Jehovah's wrath,
One that escaped or was exempt.
Those I have nursed and brought up—
My enemy consumed them.

ANALYSIS.

[These verses, strictly speaking, constitute the lamentation, for which the preceding description has prepared the way and furnished the theme.—W. H. H.] In ver. 11 the Poet describes his own suffering, especially as produced by the terrible fate of the starving children and their mothers, ver. 12. In vers. 13, 14 the Poet seeks to inform us of the extent, and, at the same time, of the moral cause, of their misfortunes. In vers. 15, 16 he describes the malicious rejoicings of their enemies. In ver. 17 he draws attention to the fact that the great catastrophe was simply the punishment of disobedience, which God had long determined upon and predicted. Vers. 18, 19 are an exhortation to a prayer of wailing, addressed to the personified wall of Jerusalem [Zion]. To this exhortation vers. 20–22 are the response. So this chapter closes, like ch. 1., with a sort of prayer, which, however, is not a direct prayer, but only upbraids God by asking how He could have permitted such horrible and outrageous crimes!

II. 11, 12.

- 11 Mine eyes do fail with tears, my bowels are troubled, my liver is poured upon the earth, for the destruction of the daughter of my people; because the children and 12 the sucklings swoon in the streets of the city. They say to their mothers, Where is corn and wine? when they swooned as the wounded in the streets of the city, when their soul was poured out into their mothers' bosom.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 11.—עֵינַיִם, in Jer. xiv. 6.—The plural רִמְעוֹת, only here and Ps. lxxx. 6. Jer. uses only the Sing., viii. 23; ix. 17; xlii. 17; xiv. 17; xxxi. 16.—[The Niph. שָׁפַךְ cannot have active sense, which NAREKLSBACH gives it, nor is this necessary to his interpretation of the passage.—W. H. H.] כֶּבֶד, the liver (never in Jer.), see Ex. xxix. 13, 22; Lev. iii. 4, etc., so called because omnium viscerum et gravissimum et densissimum est (GALEN, de usu partium, 6, 7, in Ges. Theol., p. 656). [Sept. translates it ἡ δόξα μου, my glory. But the undoubted use of the word as meaning the liver, and its connection here with eyes and bowels, are conclusive.—W. H. H.] שֶׁכַּר בֶּת־עֵינַיִם, is entirely Jeremiac, vi. 14; viii. 11, 21. Again in Lam. iii. 48; iv. 10.—Verb עָטַף, three times in this chap., vers. 11, 12, 19; never in Jer.—עוֹלָל וְיוֹנֵק. Comp. Jer. xlii. 7.—חֹכַךְ, קִרְיָה, not unusual in Jer., v. 1; ix. 20; xlix. 25.

Ver. 12.—The Hithp. הִשְׁתַּפַּךְ, besides here, only in iv. 1 and Job xxx. 16.—חֵיק, Jer. xxxii. 18.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

In vers. 11, 12 the Poet proceeds to describe his own grief. Ver. 11. Mine eyes do fail with tears—mine eyes have become dim in consequence of tears [mine eyes failed with tears; Old English, were epent, BROUGHTON. The eyes are represented as exhausted, worn out, by weeping.—W. H. H.]. See Jer. xiv. 6; Lam. iv. 17; Ps.

lix. 4; cxix. 82, 123.—My bowels are troubled—my bowels are tumultuously moved. See i. 20. He depicts his sorrowful emotions by showing how his eyes and bowels have become affected by them. [Bowels, here as elsewhere, are used in a sense entirely figurative. His eyes, literally, wept. But the poet never intended to indicate the literal movement of his bowels as an evidence of his grief. The bowels, according to Hebrew habits of thought and expression, were the seat of mental emotions, especially of a painful nature. His tears kept pace with his agony of mind. A correct translation would be, my soul was greatly moved. See notes on i. 20. The verbs in this verse are preterites, and ought to be so rendered—W. H. H.]—My liver is poured out upon the earth—my liver has fallen out to the earth [lit., was poured out on the ground]. The pouring out of the liver cannot be understood as if it were emptied of its fluid contents, for it has no such contents. Nor can we say that, properly speaking, the flowing out of the bile, caused by compression of the liver, is intended. So FUERNST, who explains this text by Job xvi. 13. For in that case, the bile should be designated as being poured out. Rather, the Poet would say, that the liver itself falls out from him, as it were; as we say that a man's heart falls out from him [that he loses heart?]. The liver is thus evidently regarded as the seat of emotions, the reverse of those which at that time controlled the Poet. The liver is described as the seat of pleasure and courage (see DELITZSCH, Psychologie, IV., § 13, p. 228, 1st ed.; p. 268, 2d ed.). The falling out of the liver, then, denotes the loss of all joyousness and courage; and is conceived of, it would seem, as the consequence and climax of the fermentation of the viscera in general, described in what precedes. The whole phrase is peculiar to this passage. [The physiological explanations of many commentators (see BLAYNEY, HENDERSON) require us to regard the Poet as suffering from bilious diarrhoea. The Hebrews (probably not so well versed in physiology as the commentators imagine) identified the physical life with the substance of the soul, and associated mental activity with the organs and functions of physical vitality, locating intellectual action in the head and heart, and purely emotional in the heart and lower viscera, as the liver and the bowels. Remembering this, we may dismiss the unpleasant suggestions of the movement of the bowels and ejection of bile from the liver, in the literal sense, and, escaping the painful presumptions of colic and jaundice, allow our Poet to express the anguish of his soul in the metaphorical language of his race. The liver is here regarded, says NOYES, as the seat of feeling, and its being poured out on the ground, remarks GERLACH, is explained by such analogous expressions as Ps. xlii. 5, I pour out my soul; Job xxx. 16, My soul is poured out. "Here, as with regard to many other of the bodily organs as mentioned in Scripture, there is not only a literal sense capable of universal interpretation, but a metaphorical import that cannot be communicated by any literal version, unless when the same metaphorical signification happens to exist also in the language into which the translation is made. Dr. J. M. GOOD touches on this subject in the Preface to his Translation of the Song of Songs, and is disposed to contend that such allusions, in order to convey their real signification, should be rendered, not literally, but equivalently; and we so far agree with him as to think that the force and delicacy of many passages must be necessarily impaired and their true meaning lost, when the name merely is given, in a language where that name does not involve the same metaphorical idea. * * * Among ourselves the spleen is supposed to be the region of disappointment and melancholy. But were a Jew to be told, in his own tongue, that the inimitable COWPER had long labored under the spleen, he would be ignorant of the meaning of his interpreter; and, when at last informed of it, might justly tell him that, although he had literally rendered the words, he had by no means conveyed the idea" (The Pictorial Bible).—W. H. H.]—For the destruction—on account of the ruin—of the daughter of my people, because the children and the sucklings swoon (marg., faint) in the streets of the city. [Lit., in the languishing or fainting of child and sucking-babe in the streets of the city.] The Poet's grief was caused by the ruin of his people in general, but especially by the frightful sufferings of the poor children, which he represents as the very acme of the calamity.

Ver. 12. The Poet describes, in a manner graphic and true to nature, what he had said in a general way (ver. 11) of the wasting away of the children. The strokes of his pencil are few in number, but suffice to place before our eyes an exact picture of those heart-rending scenes.—They say to their mothers—To their mothers they said. The imperfect (יָאָמְרוּ) is used to indicate an act in the past often repeated. Comp. my Gr., § 87, f. For it is evident the Poet describes a past condition of things, namely, that ensuing on the capture of the city. At that time, when neither the famished city (see Jer. lii. 6), nor the conqueror, who had no time then to think of it, furnished the means of subsistence, the famine must have been at its highest stage. [The word, which is future in form, should undoubtedly be translated by our present. So E. V., CALVIN, BROUGHTON, BLAYNEY, HENDERSON, GERLACH. It is an instance of the future used, as our present is, in graphic descriptions. See ver. 1, יָעִיב, covers. To their mothers they say.—W. H. H.]—Where is corn and wine? Corn (כֹּמֶן) which usually occurs in connection with grapes (בִּירָשׁ, see Jer. xxxi. 12), here denotes, neither baked bread alone, as most commentators think, nor only roasted corn, parched corn, as THENIUS would have it. For the hungry children longed only for food in general [not for a particular kind of food]. Corn, here, is to be taken, therefore, in the general sense, which לֶחֶם, bread, formerly had, a meaning which the word seems to have in Ps. lxxviii. 24 also, where the manna is called corn of heaven, כֹּמֶן שָׁמַיִם. The Poet does not say, but every one feels, how this question, which they could not answer, must have cut into the hearts of those mothers.—When they swooned—whilst they fainted [lit., in fainting].

The prefix בְּ, in, here has a temporal sense: they said so whilst they were wasting away. [So in the last clause. In breathing out their soul, i. e., they said so, whilst they were dying. CRANMER'S Bible gives a free translation, but admirably expresses the sense of the whole verse. "Even when they spake to their mothers: where is meat and drink? For while they so said, they fell down in the streets of the city, like as they had been wounded and some died in their mothers' bosom."—W. H. H.].—As the wounded in the streets of the city. Although not wounded, yet they died a painful death as the wounded do. [The idea rather is, not necessarily that they died, all of them at least; but, overcome with weakness and suffering, many of them fell suddenly in the streets as if wounded, whilst others died in their mothers' bosom.—W. H. H.].—When their soul was poured out—whilst breathing out their soul—[lit. in breathing out].

The soul pours itself forth, whilst the breath streams out. It is also the same as expire,—into their mothers' bosom—in the lap of their mothers. THENIUS would understand the bosom. But the mothers are regarded as sitting on the ground, and the children lying in their laps. [Bosom is better. There were children of all ages among those alluded to. Some old enough to seek for food themselves and fall down in the streets of the city. Some able to ask in words for food and drink. Others sucklings, ver. 11, and these doubtless are especially meant as breathing out their soul in their mothers' bosom while vainly seeking nourishment at the breast.—W. H. H.]. THENIUS rightly draws attention to the Hithpael forms of the verbs in the second and third clauses (וַיִּשְׁתַּכְּסוּ and וַיִּשְׁתַּכְּסוּ). These indicate how the children struggled, and how intense the conditions of their struggling away and expiring were.

II. 13-14.

- 13 What thing shall I take to witness for thee? What thing shall I liken to thee, O daughter of Jerusalem? What shall I equal to thee, that I may comfort thee, O virgin daughter of Zion? for thy breach is great like the sea; who can heal thee?
14 Thy prophets have seen vain and foolish things for thee; and they have not discovered thine iniquity, to turn away thy captivity; but have seen for thee false burdens, and causes of banishment.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 13.—The K'tib אֲעִידָה is certainly wrong, since עֵיד is never used in Kal. We must read, therefore, according to the K'rī אֲעִידָה. The meaning of אֲעִידָה is to give testimony, bear witness. The person whom the testimony concerns is usually indicated by בְּ. Yet there are three places where the accusative in the form of a suffix stands in the place of בְּ. Of the witnesses who were brought forward against Naboth, it is said, 1 Kings xxi. 10, וַיִּעֲרָדוּ, and in ver. 13, וַיִּעֲרָדוּ. In Job xxix. 11 it is said, and here in a good sense (bonam partem) וַיִּעֲרָדוּ. According to these and other analogies, which are placed together in my Gr., § 78, we may take the suffix here as denoting the remoter object in the dative case. [So SEPT.: Ti μαρτυροῦσθαι σοι. CALVIN: Quid contestabor tibi. BUTHROYD: What shall I testify to thee? The words have been variously rendered. CRANMER'S Bible: What shall I say of thee? BISH. Bible: "What shall I say unto thee?" BROUGHTON: What testimony shall I bring for thee? BLAYNEY: What shall I urge to thee? HENDERSON: What shall I take to witness? carelessly overlooking the suffix. NOTES: How shall I address thee?—The Piel אֲעִידָה is comparare, conferre, to compare one thing with another. See Is. xlv. 5; xl. 18, 25; Song Sol. i. 9. Only the Kal occurs in Jer. vi. 2.—The Hiphil הִשְׁוִה, which occurs only here and Is. xlv. 5, has the same signification, no form of the verb הִשְׁוִה is found in Jeremiah.—

וְהָיָה. In the Lamentations only here and v. 16, never in Jeremiah. [The definite article here is emphatic, and is well rendered by NAEGLSBACH, "thou daughter of Jerusalem."—W. H. H.].—וְהָיָה. The Piel וְהָיָה in Jer. xvi. 7; xxxi. 13. [The force of וְ here is to express the end or design, that I might comfort thee. CALVIN:—וְהָיָה, see i. 15.—כִּי-נִדְוִל כִּים. The expression is found only here: yet comp. Jer. vi. 23; i. 42.—שָׁכַר. Very frequent in Jeremiah, see ver. 11.—רָפָא. Jeremiah uses frequently, iii. 22; viii. 22; xvii. 14, etc., but never in construction with ל. [The future form of the verbs, which NAEGLSBACH renders as simple presents, express an optative sense, what may, can or shall I testify, etc.—W. H. H.].

Ver. 14.—Verb חָזַק Jeremiah never uses.—נָלַךְ, which Jeremiah uses not infrequently, xi. 20; xxxiii. 6; xlix. 10, is construed with עַל only here and iv. 22. The significance of this construction is, the disclosing of a matter before concealed. [The phrase is elliptical; they had not removed that which covered their iniquity as a veil (CALVIN, GRELACH, ROSEN-MUELLER, etc.). BLAYNEY: "For עַל the Syr. seems to have preserved the true reading לָךְ." Besides the lack of authority for this emendation of the text, the recurrence of this verb with עַל in iv. 22, seems conclusive.—W. H. H.].—עָוִן. Jeremiah often uses ii. 22; iii. 13; xiii. 22, etc.—The singular כִּשְׁמָה, in sense of effatum, is found in Jeremiah only in the familiar passage xxiii. 33-40, where he forbids the use of this expression. The plural occurs only here.—שָׁאָה in Jeremiah only in the adverbial expression שָׁאָה, ii. 30; iv. 30; vi. 29; xviii. 15; xlv. 11; whilst in Ezekiel we find שָׁאָה, xii. 24; כְּדָוָה, xiii. 17; כִּכְסֵּם-שָׁאָה, xxi. 28.—כִּדְהָרִים is ἀν. λεγ.; דָּהַר means detrusit, Ps. v. 11, expulit, Jeremiah viii. 3; xxiii. 8, 8; xxix. 14, 18, etc., dispulit, disiecit, Jer. xxiii. 2; i. 17, but also abduxit, Deut. xiii. 6, 11, seduxit, Deut. xiii. 14; 2 Chro-

xxi. 11: Prov. vii. 21. [OWEN: "There seems to be a mistake in this word of a \aleph for a κ , two letters very similar; for the Targ. the Syr. and the Arab., must have so read the word, as they render it in the sense of what is deceptive, fallacious, or imaginary. It is in the last rendered phantasms. The word occurs in Jer. xxiii. 14, and is applied to chambers through which air or wind passed freely. It may be rendered here winds or airy things. Such was the character of their prophecies. This is far more suitable to the passage than expulsions or rejections, as given by the Sept. and Vulg." As the verb \aleph sometimes, though rarely, has the sense of misleading, seducing, may not the idea of fallacious have been derived from \aleph ? There is no necessity, however, for imposing such a meaning upon it here.—W. H. H.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

In these two closely connected verses, the Poet expresses the thought that the true prophets cannot repair the injury the bad prophets have caused. He greatly desires to comfort Zion, by way of prophetic testimony in her behalf, and by way of comparison to her advantage with other sufferers. But it is impossible: for immeasurable and irretrievable injury has been done by the false testimony of her prophets.

Ver. 13. What thing shall I take to witness for thee? What testify I to thee? [What can I testify to thee?—W. H. H.] The Poet means prophetic testimony (see \aleph , testimony, Is. viii. 16), and that in the sense of instruction, warning, correction, (see Jer. vi. 10), not in the sense of comforting by promises. See below, next clause of this verse, on the words that I may comfort thee. [While the word signifies prophetic testimony, to bear witness in behalf of God, it may signify divine testimony either for or against a person, and here the former is intimated both by the construction (see critical note below), and by the following words that I may comfort thee. Besides the Prophet was actually testifying against the people in the name and by the Spirit of God. But He received no favorable message in their behalf. There is an allusion to ver. 9, "her prophets also find no vision from Jehovah."—W. H. H.] What thing shall I liken to thee—What liken to thee,—O thou daughter of Jerusalem? What shall I equal to thee—what compare to thee,—that I may comfort thee, O virgin daughter of Zion? It is a comfort for the unfortunate to know that others have endured equal suffering. This comfort cannot be given to Zion. The idea of comforting can be referred to all three of the preceding verbs, although to testify \aleph , never means prophesying in order to comfort and make happy, but has always the sense of warning, correction: yet even warning, correction and instruction may be a comfort. [Where this Hebrew verb occurs in the sense of warning or protest it is always connected with its object by the significant preposition \aleph or \aleph . Here the word may be taken simply in the sense of bearing witness, in which sense it is favorably used (even in Hiphil) in Job xxix. 11, see also Mal. ii. 14. The meaning is, What can I, as a prophet of God and in the name of God, testify for God in thy behalf, in order to comfort thee? WORDSWORTH: "What prophetic testimony shall I utter in God's name, in order to console thee? I have no message of comfort for thee: and thy misery is so great, that I can find no likeness or parallel to it, wherewith to assuage thy sorrow."—W. H. H.]—For thy breach is great like the sea—for great as the sea is thy ruin, or injury; who can heal thee?

That is to say, Zion's hurt is immeasurable, and incurable. [BLAYNEY: "The breach or wound, which Jerusalem had received, is by an hyperbole said to be great, deep or wide, like the sea, which is, as it were, a breach made in the earth." HENDERSON: "He cannot find any object to put in parallel with the lamentable condition of Jerusalem. The only exception is the sea, which, on account of its vast dimensions, alone furnished a fit emblem of the magnitude of the devastation effected by the Chaldeans." ASSEM. ANN.: "Such a breach, as not some small river, but the sea is wont to make, when it hath rent asunder and got thorow the sea-walls, that before kept it out; such as cannot be made up again. See Jer. li. 42; Ez. xxvi. 8; Job xxx. 14." CALMET: Un océan de maux, un déluge de douleurs, une mer d'affliction, A sea of miseries, a flood of troubles, an ocean of sorrow.]

Ver. 14. Thy prophets have seen vain and foolish things for thee. Thy prophets foretold to thee deceit and white-wash. [Thy prophets prophesied to thee falsehood and delusion. The last word (\aleph) has been variously translated, though NÆGELSBACH alone can claim the unique and parabolical idea expressed by white-wash. This meaning is suggested by the use of the word in Ez. xiii. 10-15; xxii. 28, rendered in our version untempered mortar. Whether Ezekiel meant white-wash, or not, which is doubtful, the word can have no such meaning here. To daub a wall with white-wash is feasible. To prophesy white-wash is impossible. The Hebrew word (\aleph) seems to have suggested the idea of something viscous, sticky, slimy; hence applied to lime, mortar, as by Ezekiel; or to the white of an egg (Job vi. 6), from which comes the idea of insipidity, want of savor, which is the sense adopted in our text by BROUGHTON: The prophets have looked out for thee things vain and which have lost the saltiness, and by CALVIN, insipiditatum, vel insipidum, tastelessness or insipidity; this sense easily suggests the idea of folly, in which sense the word in our text is rendered by most of the versions; SEPT.: ἀποσύννη; VULG.: stulta; LUTHER: thörichte Gesichte; E. V.: foolish things. The word as thus used would imply more than mere absurdity, which is the sense BLAYNEY and BOOTHROYD give it. It means a folly that is chargeable with guilt, in which sense the cognate word \aleph is used in Job i. 22 (see BARNES' Notes), xxiv. 12: a folly especially that is deceptive, that does not fulfil the expectations it excites, in which sense the same word \aleph is applied to false prophets in Jer. xxiii. 13.—We have not in English a word that will express both these ideas,—delusive folly or foolish delusions. GERLACH uses the word Blend-werk, false-show, delusion, but acknowledges that it expresses only the effect, and not the contemptible character of what the prophets did. The word stuff, adopted by HENDERSON, "thy prophets see for thee vanity and stuff," is hardly equivalent to the Hebrew word. He borrowed it from GATAKER, who says, "They took upon them to be seers, but saw not what they should see, and told what they saw not, nothing but vain and frivolous stuff, the froth of their own fancies, Jer. xxiii. 16, 26; xxvii. 14, 15."—W. H. H.] The expression חֲזֹן שָׁוָה [saw rain things; E. V., prophesied falsehood], is found five times in Ezekiel and only in Ezekiel, xiii. 6, 7, 23; xxi. 34 [E. V. 29], xxii. 28. The expression חֲזֹן שָׁוָה [E. V., here, foolish things, in Ezek., untempered mortar], is also Ezekiel's, for it is used by him emphatically four times, in the same chapter that contains the phrase (חֲזֹן שָׁוָה) just referred to, xiii. 10, 11, 14, 15; and it is used again by him, and that, too, in immediate connection with the same phrase (חֲזֹן שָׁוָה) in xxii. 28. The thirteenth chapter of Ezekiel is directed against the false prophets. Ezekiel in that denunciatory discourse has before his eyes what Jeremiah had said relative to the same subject (chap. xxiii.). Now in Jer. xxiii. 13 occurs the expression חֲזֹן שָׁוָה, in the prophets of Samaria I saw חֲזֹן שָׁוָה [E. V., folly, marg., an unsavory, or an absurd thing]. חֲזֹן שָׁוָה [the word in our text] never occurs in Jeremiah. Besides here, it occurs only in Ezekiel at the places above cited, and in Job vi. 6. For its meaning see the thorough discussion of HAEVERNICK in his Comm. on Ezekiel. The whole passage in which Ezekiel uses the expression חֲזֹן שָׁוָה in the sense of white-wash, and to which xxii. 28 afterwards refers, bears throughout the peculiar characteristics of Ezekiel's metaphorical style. We cannot, therefore, doubt that Ez. xiii. was written earlier than our chapter: and also that the words from חֲזֹן שָׁוָה to חֲזֹן שָׁוָה originated from the above cited places of Ezekiel. See the Introduction, § 3. [The inference contained in the Introduction and implied here, that if this is a quotation from Ezekiel, Jeremiah could not be the author of the Lamentations, is entirely gratuitous. The thirteenth chapter of Ezekiel must have been written before the final destruction of Jerusalem; "about five years" before "Jerusalem was taken and destroyed," according to WORDSWORTH. Even if the prophecy of Ezekiel had been nearly or quite contemporaneous with the destruction of Jerusalem, it is a mere assumption, incapable of proof, that Jeremiah could not have possessed a copy of that prophecy, even if we are obliged to believe that he wrote these lamentations immediately after the destruction of the city. With the close intercourse that must have subsisted at the time between Babylonia and Palestine, with an invading army constantly flowing in and meeting detachments guarding captives and spoils going out, and with the lively sympathy that must have existed between Ezekiel and Jeremiah, and between the pious Jews in exile and the pious Jews in Judea, it would be neither impossible nor unlikely that the utterances of those prophets should be interchanged as rapidly as they were committed to writing.—In point of fact, however, it is by no means clear that this passage is a quotation from Ezekiel. As to the first expression, it is composed of two words only, both in frequent use in the earlier Scriptures and in the prophets who preceded Jeremiah. And as to the second, it is used in a connection entirely different from that in which it occurs in Ezekiel, and very obviously in a different sense. How prophesying חֲזֹן שָׁוָה could be suggested by daubing a wall with חֲזֹן שָׁוָה, it is difficult to see. How the word can mean the same thing in both places, is also beyond the power of ordinary perception. There would be as much propriety in giving the word the meaning of white-wash or mortar in Job vi. 6 as here. This is no more a quotation from Ezekiel, than Ezekiel's use of the word is a quotation from Job. —W. H. H.]—And they have not discovered thine iniquity, to turn away thy captivity—And uncovered not thy guilt, to turn thy captivity [i. e., to prevent it, or avert it. So the Syr. translates it.] The expression, turn thy captivity, founded on Deut. xxx. 8, is frequent in Jeremiah (see xxxii. 44; xxxiii. 7, etc.), and with Ezekiel (xvi. 53; xxix. 14, etc.). But in the connection in which it here occurs, it does not mean, as it does in the places referred to, vertere captivitatem, i. e., reducere captivos [turn the captivity, i. e., bring back the captives], but can only mean avertere captivitatem [avert, or prevent the captivity]. By open exhortations to repentance, the prophets would have averted the captivity (see Ez. xxii. 30, 31). The words are connected with what precedes. [ASSEM. ANN.: "They laid not thy sins before thee, to bring thee to repentance, whereby thy present miseries might have been prevented, Jer. vi. 13, 14; viii. 11; xxiii. 17, 22." GERLACH and others understand this to mean that, after the captivity was a fact, the prophets had not led the people to a repentance that would have delivered them from it, see Ps. xiv. 7; Job xlii. 10; Jer. xxx. 18. But this sense would not be pertinent here. Our text looks back to one of the original causes of the present misery. What her prophets might have done to prevent it, they cannot now do, even if by doing it they could terminate that misery; for now her prophets can find no vision from Jehonah, ver. 9. If they had exercised their power aright when they possessed it, the captivity would have been averted. This is the idea now in the Poet's mind.—W. H. H.]—But have seen for thee false burdens and causes of banishment—And they foretold to thee sayings of deceit and of seduction. [But then they saw for thee burdens of falsehood and expulsions.—W. H. H.] The connecting thought is, And so prophesied they, etc.—False burdens—oracles of deceit*, שְׁמוֹת שָׁוָה, are declarations of delusory purport, which result not felicitously, but ruinously.—Causes of banishment, seductions, מִדְּוָחִים, can signify, ambiguously indeed, either seductions or banishments. Both predicates may refer to the discourses of the false prophets. LUTHER makes the last feature only conspicuous. "But they have preached to thee wantonly, in that they have preached thee out of the land." THENIUS rightly draws attention to the fact that Jeremiah, xxvii. 10, 15, in a passage where he warns of the false prophets, expresses emphatically and exactly the same thought which is contained in our verse, "Hearken not ye to your prophets * * * for they prophesy a lie unto you, to remove you far from your land; and that I should drive you out (וְהִדְרִיתִי אֹתְכֶם, comp. ver. 16, לִכְנֹן דְּרִיתִי אֹתְכֶם), and ye should perish." It is therefore very possible that the Poet, by the choice of this word, seemingly invented ad hoc for his present purpose, would give us to understand that he had in view not only the declarations of Ezekiel, but also those of Jeremiah pertaining to this matter. Thus the verb נָחַץ [from which the Hebrew noun is derived] is, as seen from the examples adduced, especially current with Jeremiah. It is found in this prophet nineteen times, elsewhere in the old Testament thirty-four times, ten of which are in Deuteronomy. But that it may be used here ambiguously, its connection with שָׁוָא indicates. [There are three objections to the translation of NAEGLSBACH. 1. It makes the last clause of the verse a mere repetition of the first clause. 2. It is very doubtful if the last word, rendered seduction (NOYES, seductions), can have that meaning. WORDSWORTH gives its literal meaning as drivings away, and explains it consistently with the general idea adopted by our author, "the prophecies of thy false prophets, to which thou didst hearken, instead of listening to God, have banished thee, and driven thee away from thy home." 3. The word rendered by NAEGLSBACH, WORDSWORTH, NOYES and others, prophecies, and in E. V. burdens, cannot mean any prophecy, without reference to its subject or character, but designates a prophecy of a threatening or minatory nature. The correct translation then is, But they saw for thee burdens of vanity and expulsions or banishments. But how could this be true of the false prophets? HENGSTENBERG (on Zech. i. 9) understands the vain burdens and exiles or dispersions, which the false prophets predicted as referring to the enemy. "The false prophets endeavor to make themselves beloved by the people, by predicting a great calamity, which should come upon their powerful oppressors." (So also DIODATI.) The objection to this is that it does not naturally follow the second clause of the verse, and is, after all, only a repetition of the first clause. HENDERSON takes the word burdens as meaning the causes of punishments, as our version has rendered the last word causes of banishment. "The false prophets, in their attempts to account for the captivity, invented any one but the true one,—the apostasy of the Jews." This preserves the logical connection between the three clauses of the verse, but is philologically untenable, for the idea of causes of punishment is not suggested by the words used. The probable explanation is suggested by the use of the future with \dagger conversive, which, while it makes the verb a preterite, suggests a time posterior to that to which the preceding preterites referred. Her prophets having predicted vain and foolish things, and failed to bring the people to repentance, and so save them from captivity, then at last, after the captivity occurred, themselves predicted for her burdens of misfortune and of banishments. Those very prophets who once prophesied so many things full of flattery, overwhelmed and panic-stricken in the hour of calamity, see nothing but evil for the daughter of Zion, and were loudest in their predictions of punishments and misfortunes. This would agree with the interpretation already given to the words in ver. 9. Her prophets also find no vision from Jehovah, i. e., no vision of good, of blessing, they have only visions of evils, prophetic burdens full of apprehensions and fears. Another explanation suggests itself from the double meaning of the verb to see, רָאָה, which may mean merely to see, or to see by prophetic inspiration. It may be taken in the former sense, with a satirical purpose. These prophets did see prophetically, or pretended to do so, visions from God that were vain and delusory, but they afterwards actually saw in course of fulfilment the burdens of misfortune and banishment pronounced by Jeremiah and formerly derided by them. The use of the word שָׁוָא, if it necessarily means false (though it may possibly mean simply misfortune, see Job vii. 3; Is. xxx. 28; Hos. xii. 12), would be a valid objection to the last interpretation, but not to the other, for in that case the burdens were false burdens, suggested by their own excited and terrified imaginations. The force of the future with \dagger conversive, following verbs in the preterite, may be expressed here thus, but then, i. e., after the captivity, they saw false burdens and expulsions.—W. H. II.]

The thought is entirely Jeremiatic. See ii. 8; xiv. 13-16; xxvii. 14-16, etc. In Lamentations it occurs only once again, iv. 13.—[נָחַץ. After all that has been asserted to the contrary, the evidence from its derivation and use is, that this word means simply a burden, and, as applied to prophecies, an announcement of punishment or vengeance imposed on its object as a burden. The verb נָחַץ never means to pronounce, except in a figurative sense, as if the voice were lifted up in loud outcries or shouting: and its derivative נִחָץ is not used in a single instance where it can only mean a simple declaration or announcement, or where we cannot trace at least a figurative allusion to something that is borne or carried as a burden. It is used twenty-four times of a literal material burden (Num. iv. 15, 19, 24, 27 twice, 81, 82, 47, 49; 2 Kings v. 17; viii. 9; 2 Chron. xvii. 11; xx. 25; xxxv. 8; Neh. xiii. 15, 19; Is. xxii. 25; xxx. 6; xlvii. 1, 2; Jer. xvii. 21, 22, 24, 27); ten times of a literal mental burden or care (Num. xi. 11, 17; Deut. i. 12; 2 Sam. xv. 83; xix. 36; 2 Kings ix. 25; 2 Chron. xxiv. 27; Job vii. 20; Ps. xxxviii. 5; Ez. xxiv. 25); twice where it seems to refer to usury laid as a burden on the unfortunate (Neh. v. 7, 10), once for punishment as a burden (Hos. viii. 10), twenty-four times with reference to prophecies that may fairly be regarded as of a minatory character, laying burdens on their objects (Is. xiii. 1; xiv. 28; xv. 1; xvii. 1; xix. 1; xxi. 1, 11, 18; xxii. 1; xxiii. 1; Jer. xxiii. 83 twice, 84, 86 twice, 88 thrice; Ezek. xii. 10; Nah. i. 1, Hab. i. 1; Zech. ix. 1; xii. 1; Mal. i. 1), three times where it is translated by E. V. song, and in the margin carriage, where the idea of the care of religious services involves the idea of a burden

(1 Chron. xv. 22 twice, 27), and twice where it may mean a solemn charge laid as a burden on those to whom it is given (Prov. xxx. 1; xxxi. 1). A careful examination of these passages, the only ones except our text where the word occurs, will strongly confirm the opinion that נִשְׁעָה never means simply effatum, a declaration, an ordinary oracle or prophecy, but always one implying a burden of evil foretold or imprecated. —W. H. H.]

II. 15, 16.

- 15 All that pass by clap their hands at thee; they hiss and wag their head at the daughter of Jerusalem, saying, Is this the city that men call The perfection of beauty, The joy of the whole earth? All thine enemies have opened their mouth against thee: they hiss and gnash the teeth: they say, We have swallowed her up: certainly this is the day that we looked for; we have found, we have seen it.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 15.—נִשְׁעָה וְנִיחַ. Num. xxiv. 10; Job xxvii. 23. See Jer. xxxi. 19 (Ez. xxi. 17); xlviii. 26.—Jer. nowhere uses the expression נִשְׁעָה. He says instead נִיחַ בְּרֹאשׁ, xviii. 16, comp. Ps. xlv. 15.—The ש, relativum, which is used here, and in ver. 16, evidently because words from the common colloquial dialect are quoted, occurs in Lam. only in these two verses and in iv. 19; v. 18, and not at all in Jer. The from. rel. must be regarded as in the accusative of the nearer relation (in reference to whom they said it, see my Gr., §70, c. f.), since אָכַר never directly means to call (see Is. v. 20; viii. 12; Eccles. ii. 2). The Imperfect here indicates repetition in past times; see on אָכַר, ver. 12.—כִּלְכִּלֹת. This word-form and its variations are frequent in Ezekiel (see xvi. 14; xxiii. 12; xxxviii. 4; xxvii. 24); Jeremiah never uses them. See Ps. l. 2, כִּלְכִּלֹת is mentioned as going out of Zion.—Jeremiah (xlix. 25) and Ezekiel (xxiv. 25) use נִשְׁעָה by itself, each only once.

Ver. 16.—With reference to the transposition of the initial letters נ and פ in chaps. ii., iii., iv., see the Introd.—Jeremiah never uses פָּצַח: in Ez. it is found once, ii. 8.—שָׁרַקוּ. See ver. 15.—The verb שָׁרַק occurs only in Job xvi. 9; Ps. xxxvii. 12; xxxv. 16; cxli. 10, and is used only of grinding the teeth, gnashing with the teeth.—בִּלְעָנָי, vers. 2, 5, 8.—Jer. often uses the Pliel נִקְרָה, viii. 15 (xiv. 19); xiii. 16; xiv. 22: it is not found in Ezekiel.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

In these verses the Poet depicts the scornful triumph of heathen and inimical nations over the ruin of Jerusalem. [Scott: "The idolaters took the words out of the mouth of the Jews, and derided them for glorying in their holy city and its peculiar protection and privileges. The combination of scorn, enmity, rage and exultation, which the conquerors and spectators manifested, when gratified by the destruction of Jerusalem and the temple, are set before the reader with peculiar pathos and energy. The whole scene is presented to his view as in some exquisitely finished historical painting: and the insulting multitudes, who surrounded the Redeemer's cross, can hardly be forgotten on the occasion."] Ver. 15. All that pass by clap their hands at thee; they hiss and wag their head.—They clap their hands over thee all who pass by the way. They hiss and shake their head. [All that passed by the way clapped their hands at thee, they hissed and wagged their head. OWEN: "Jeremiah relates what had taken place, the verbs being in the past tense. Our version is not correct in rendering the verbs in the present tense. The old versions follow the Hebrew."—W. H. H.] Some (OTTO, THENIUS) interpret this verse as the expression, not of mockery, but of amazement. They say not all who passed by would have mocked. That may be. But the number who would not was certainly decreasingly small.

For by the עֲבָרֵי הַדֶּגֶל, passers of the way, we must understand travellers and strangers. The Israelites were no longer in that empty land, and if there were some, yet to them the destruction of the city was only too well known. But clapping the hands is a gesture especially of surprise. Besides, it is further said, that they hiss. The Hebrew verb שָׁרַק signifies, it is true, primarily to whistle, and does not always express scorn and mockery (see Is. v. 26; vii. 18). שָׁרַקוּ with ל, Is. v. 26; vii. 18; Zech. x. 8, does not express scorn and mockery, but with עַל it always does, 1 Kings ix. 8; Job xxvii. 23; Jer. xix. 8; xlix. 17; l. 13; Ez. xxvii. 36; Zeph. ii. 15. We whistle to a person to call his attention, but to whistle at or over a person implies derision.—W. H. H.] But the connection here decidedly favors the sense of 'scornful hissing.' For שָׁרַק, to hiss, must be taken in the same sense in which it is immediately used in the next verse, which is closely connected with this verse. There it undoubtedly has this sense. Add to this, that the shaking of the head is always an expression of scornful wonderment; Ps. xxii. 8; cix. 25; Job xvi. 4; Is. xxxvii. 22 (2 Kings xix. 21).—At the daughter of Jerusalem. See ver. 13. [Mark the distinction between thee in the first clause, and the daughter of Jerusalem in the second clause. In the first chapter the city itself is prominent and foremost, and Zion appears as an accessory to her past grandeur, once her crowning glory, but now in ruins, the cause of her deepest disgrace and anguish. In this chapter the relations of the two are reversed. Zion here stands forth in ideal personification as the conspicuous figure, and the city, the daughter of Jerusalem, once her chief honor and her joy, is now the chiefest cause of her shame and grief.—W. H. H.]—Saying, Is this the city that men call—Is that the city of which it used to be said.—The perfection of beauty—Perfect in beauty. The expression is borrowed from Ezekiel, xxvii. 3, where the prophet so calls the city of Tyre, and xxviii. 12, where he indicates the king of Tyre as “perfect in beauty.”—The joy of the whole earth. This expression is used of Zion in Ps. xlviii. 3. [ALEXANDER: “It is called the joy of the whole earth, as a source of spiritual blessing to all nations.”] See Is. xxiv. 11. Jerusalem is called the joy of the whole earth, and not merely of the whole land [i. e., the land of Israel (OWEN)], as is evident, because that which is perfect in beauty must be all this, and because all the strangers and travellers passing by it are represented as moved at first with astonishment. Joy at her beauty can be reconciled with envy and hatred of her inhabitants.

Ver. 16. This verse enters into very close connection with the preceding one. It treats of the same malicious rejoicings of the enemies over the downfall of Jerusalem. But it proceeds farther in its statements, for while in ver. 15 only the passers-by, in ver. 16 all her enemies are represented as rejoicing and exulting.—All thine enemies opened their mouth against thee.

All thine enemies gape their mouth at thee [lit., All of thy enemies opened at thee wide their mouth]. The gaping, or distorting of the mouth, in behoof of scornful laughter, is indicated again in iii. 46, where these words are almost verbally repeated, and with the expressions here used in Ps. xxii. 14.—They hiss [lit., they hissed] see ver. 15—and gnash [lit., gnashed] the teeth. As this is elsewhere an expression of suppressed rage, so here it is an expression of satisfied rage. See Ps. xxxv. 16, 21, 25.—They say [lit., said], we have swallowed her up—we have devoured [i. e., completely destroyed]. Not only those enemies who had personally taken an active part in the destruction of Jerusalem, are intended, but all had a share in what some actually achieved,—so far, at least, that all could say, “We have destroyed.”—Certainly this is the day that we looked for—Yea, this is the day we have expected. It is evident that the restriction involves an assertion; if only this day (as the day of total destruction), and no other, could afford satisfaction to the enemies, then certainly that day afforded satisfaction in the highest degree. See Jer. x. 19.—We have found, we have seen it.—Finding, מָצָאנוּ, is the antithesis to seeking, striving. Seeing, רָאִינוּ, which involves the idea of certainty on the ground of seeing with the bodily eyes (see Ps. iv. 7; lxxxv. 8), is the antithesis to merely wishing and hoping. The heaping together of words arranged asyndetically [we have looked for, we have found, we have seen,—the original can hardly fail to remind us of the famous Veni, vidi, vici] portrays the intensity and the completeness of their satisfaction.

II. 17.

- 17 The LORD hath done that which he had devised; he hath fulfilled his word that he had commanded in the days of old: he hath thrown down, and hath not pitied: and he hath caused thine enemy to rejoice over thee: he hath set up the horn of thine adversaries.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 17.—עָשָׂה אֲשֶׁר זָכַרְתָּ. See Deut. xix. 19.—The verb בָּצַע, in Jer. only in Kal and in the connection בָּצַע בָּצַע, vi. 13; viii. 10. In the sense of absolere, filling up, it is found Is. x. 12; Zech. iv. 9.—אֲמָרָה is found no where else in the Old Testament. The form אֲמָרָה, once very frequent, especially in Ps. cxix., is found neither in Jer. nor Ez.—Piel אָמַר Jer. uses very frequently. מִיָּמִי קָדָם, see i. 7.—Piel שָׂמַח, twice in Jer.; in Lam. only here.—קָרָן. This expression is not found in Jer.; he only once uses the word קָרָן, see on ver. 3.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Ver. 17. [In ver. 17 the direct address to Zion is resumed, and is continued through vers. 18, 19.—W. H. H.] The ruin of Zion, as above described, was not a fortuitous event. God had for a long time foreseen and decreed it as eventually inevitable. Hence the historical catastrophe is nothing else than a realization of a divine purpose. It was, then, God Himself who destroyed the holy city and afforded to her enemies the rejoicings of which vers. 15, 16 speak. To those verses this verse refers throughout.—The Lord hath done that which he had devised Jehovah accomplished what He had decreed. See Jer. li. 12, “for Jehovah hath both devised and done that which He spake.” Zech. i. 6 expands the same thought by the emphatic expression of the middle term, “Like as Jehovah of hosts thought to do unto us, according to our ways, and according to our doings, so hath H. dealt with us.” [HENDERSON: “However the enemies of the Jews might tauntingly exult in their destruction of the Jewish metropolis, that disastrous event was ultimately to be referred to the purpose of Jehovah to punish its inhabitants for their sins "] —He hath fulfilled his word that he had commanded in the days of old. The Lord had, in very ancient times, when He founded the Theocracy, commanded His servants to warn His people that in case of disobedience they would have to suffer the punishment of destruction. See Lev. xxvi. 14-39; Deut. xxviii. 15-68. [SCOTT: "This reference to the ancient predictions against Israel for their sins, is of great importance; both as it shows that these prophecies were then extant and well known among the Jews, and that they were understood by the pious remnant exactly as we now explain them." — BLAINEY, followed by BOOTHROYD, divides the verse thus: Jehovah hath accomplished that which he had devised; he hath fulfilled his word; what he constituted in days of old, he hath destroyed and not spared; and says, "To this construction we are determined by the metre. The sense is good, and perfectly adapted to the place, and corresponds nearly with what is expressed Jer. xlv. 4." All this is true. But, on the whole, the Hebrew accents rather favor the common division, the metre does not demand the change, and the repetition of the pronoun אֲנִי directly before its governing verb has a poetical and rhythmical effect, according to the common division, not to be overlooked. — W. H. H.] — He hath thrown down—He demolished, or destroyed.—And hath not pitied—And pitied not. See ver. 2.—And he hath caused thine enemy to rejoice over thee—He made the enemy joyful over thee. [CALVIN: exhilarated their enemies.] — He hath set up the horn of thine adversaries—He exalted the horn of thine oppressors. This expression is purely poetical. See in particular 1 Sam. ii. 10; Ps. lxxv. 11; xcii. 11; cxlviii. 14; 1 Chron. xxv. 6.

II. 18, 19.

18 Their heart cried unto the Lord, O wall of the daughter of Zion, let tears run down like a river day and night: give thyself no rest; let not the apple of thine
19 eye cease. Arise, cry out in the night; in the beginning of the watches pour out thine heart like water before the face of the Lord; lift up thy hands toward him for the life of thy young children, that faint for hunger in the top of every street.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 18.—חֲזֹקֶתָ. BOERMAAL would altogether erase this word. HOUBIGANT reads: אֲדֹנִי אֶל-בְּתוּלַת בֵּית צִי. HENDER: חֲזֹקֶתָ [or חֲזָקָתָ, i. e., exardescere [servido selo corripere. So BLAINEY: Their heart cried out, before Jehovah with ferrency, O, etc.]. DATH, after the Syriac: אֶל-אֲדֹנִי חֲזֹקֶתָ בֵּית צִי. J. D. MICHAELIS: אֲדֹנִי אֶל-אֲדֹנִי, i. e., clamat cor eorum ob fundamenta murorum. Tu filia Zion descendere fac, etc. THENIUS would read חֲזֹקֶתָ instead of חֲזֹקֶתָ. Ewall, in his later editions, reads צִיָּקִי לָךְ. He compares Ps. lxxii. 2, and translates, indefatigably cry to Jehovah, O wall of the daughter of Zion! The reading חֲזֹקֶתָ, however, is confirmed by the SEPT. For this translates, Ἐβοήσῃ καρπία αὐτῶν ἐπὶ τοῖς τοίχοις: Τείχεα Σιών καταγέγυρε ὡς χειμάρρους ὅδεα, etc. JEROME does not change the text, but he translates, Clamavit cor eorum ad Dominum super muros filie Zion.—The verb פָּנָה in the sense torpidum, languidum esse, Niph. examinatum, emervatum esse, Gen. xlv. 26; Hab. i. 4; Ps. lxxviii. 3; xxxviii. 9. The substantive פִּנְיָה occurs only here: הפִּנְיָה lili. 49. The construction לָךְ פִּנְיָתָ is a very strong, perhaps the strongest, example of the use of the construct case for the mere purpose of the external connection of words. See EW., §287, d, 2; 289, b. פָּנָה is used here in the general sense of cessare. See Josh. x. 12, 13; Jer. xlvii. 6.

Ver. 19.—קִוִּיָּי. See Jer. li. 27; xliii. 4, 6; xlviii. 2.—רִנִּי. See Jer. xxxi. 7; Prov. i. 20.—בְּלִילִי. See i. 2.—לִרְאֵשׁ, an expression only found here.—נִכְהָ פִנְיָ. See Jer. xvii. 16.—[אֲדֹנִי. HENDERSON: "Instead of Adonai forty of KENNICOTT's, and forty-eight of DE ROSSI's MSS., together with seven more of his originally, and the Hagiographa printed at Naples, read Jehovah. The Venetian Greek version has τοῦ θεοῦ. On these authorities I have not scrupled to follow this reading in the translation." BLAINEY, BOOTHROYD, NOTES, adopt this reading.—W. H. H.]—פָּנָה, not in Jeremiah.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Ver. 18. Their heart cried unto the Lord—The first words of ver. 18 have given the commentators great trouble. Various readings have been invented. I believe that neither a different reading, nor an artful construction is necessary. Only we must not regard the words, Their hearts cried unto the Lord, as an independent sentence (LUECKENBUSSER, THENIUS) thrown in by the way. Rather, these words constitute the introduction and means of transition to all that follows down to the end of the chapter. First of all, let it be observed, from the second clause of ver. 18, the Poet lets Zion herself speak with reference to what he had been saying in vers. 13-17. This change in the method of recital he precedes with the brief word of introduction above indicated. But what he now puts into the mouth of Zion, as an outpouring of the heart to Jehovah, he divides into two parts. First of all, in vers. 18 b, 19, they to whom the pronoun their (the suffix in לָךְ, their heart) refers address the wall and summon it to prayer. In vers. 20-22 the prayer itself follows, which accordingly must be regarded as the prayer of the wall of Zion. They of whom it is said, Their heart cries unto the Lord, are evidently particular individuals. But these persons would not appear before God in their individual capacities, but rather seek the mediation (der idealen Gesammtheit) of the whole church, regarded in its ideal or mystical unity. Thus the cry of their heart comes to God through the mouth (der Gesammtheit) of the united people [theocratically and by personification regarded as a unit]. Thus it is explained why the words, Their heart cried unto the Lord, are not immediately followed by words addressed to God, but by an appeal to the wall of Zion, which by answering this appeal brings before the Lord that which filled their heart, as mentioned in ver. 18 a. That those individuals should thus seek the mediation of the whole church (Gesammtheit) is very natural. For not the individual Israelite, but Israel is the universally historic reservoir and organ of the redeeming grace of God. With Israel is the covenant of grace made, and only as covenant members of Israel have individuals any claim on covenant grace. Now, therefore, as in the Psalms (cxxxv. 19; cxlvii. 12; cxlix. 1-3, etc.) the congregation is often summoned to offer praise and thanks to the Lord, so here it is summoned to make its complaint to the Lord. If this is done here in a very peculiar fashion, by summoning to prayer the wall of Zion as if it were the symbol of the theocratic unity (der Gesammtheit), yet this is justified by the historical circumstances out of which our Song originated. Zion stood as long as the walls held together. But as soon as these were broken through, Zion was lost (see Jer. lii. 7, הָרָגוּ וְהָרָגוּ אֶת הָעִיר then the city was broken up). Is it surprising that an Israelite, who had experienced the siege and capture of Jerusalem, should take the wall for all that it enclosed? This trope is, on the whole, no more bold, than where elsewhere the frontiers are taken for the country they bound, the house for its inhabitants, the purse for its contents. The pre-eminent importance of the wall may be clearly perceived from the fact that in Nehemiah's time everything depended on its restoration. See Neh. vi. 15, 16; xii. 27-43; comp. Ps. cxxii. 3. If the wall of the daughter of Zion is thus taken for the daughter of Zion herself, it should not surprise us that the same activities are attributed to the wall which belong properly to the daughter of Zion, and that it is exhorted to weep and to pray for its children. Mourning and exhaustion have already been attributed to it in ver. 8 above, and in i. 4 the ways of Zion are represented as mourning. Further, Is. iii. 26 and xiv. 31 have been correctly referred to, where the predicates of mourning, lamenting and howling are imputed to the gates. [The first words of the verse must refer to the enemies who are the subject of the preceding verse. There is no other nominative expressed to which the pronoun their (the suffix in הֵנָּה) can belong. To refer it back to the pauser by in ver. 15, as BLATNEY does, is unnecessary and unnatural. To suppose that it refers to the pious Jews is to suppose an abrupt ungrammatical, and awkward transition, to which there is no parallel in the Lamentations. The pronominal suffixes in these Songs are employed with singular accuracy. If we keep in mind the proper meaning of the verb rendered cried, which is to cry out, to vociferate (Deut. xxii. 24, 27; Is. xlii. 2), we readily see the connection. Even these heathen enemies recognized the hand of God in the destruction of Jerusalem, and their heart expressed this conviction in loud outcries and shouts addressed to the Lord.—Adonai the Lord of the heathen, as well as of Israel. This may throw additional light on the words in ver. 7, “They have made a noise in the house of Jehovah, as in the day of a solemn feast.” (It is not impossible that the choice of a proper initial word may have led to this continued reference to the heathen.) After the word Lord there ought to be a full stop. This is indicated in the Hebrew by the accent Anthonah, which rarely occurs so near the beginning of a verse. What follows is not what the enemies cried, nor indeed can it be, for the Hebrew word so translated is intransitive. Whenever that word, קָרָא, is followed by anything spoken or said, the verb קָרָא, to say, is introduced, Ex. v. 8, they cry, saying: 15, xvii. 4; Num. xii. 13; 2 Kings iv. 1; vi. 28, cried—saying: 1 Kings xx. 39; 2 Kings iv. 40; vi. 5, cried—and said. The only seeming exception to this construction, 2 Kings ii. 12, where Elisha cried, My father, my father! etc., is due, probably, to the broken disconnected ejaculations of the prophet, that could hardly be preceded by the verb קָרָא, as if he had said something with deliberation. It must be observed, too, that they were only ejaculations, outcries that he uttered, and the verb is not followed by לָא as it is here. But here, where לָא is used, a long and connected address, like this to the walls of Zion, could not be the object of the verb קָרָא, to cry. Had the prophet intended to tell us what the enemies said to God, he would have followed the word קָרָא, they cried with the usual phrase and said. We must take therefore the following touching address to the walls, as the words of the Prophet. We thus avoid the exceeding awkwardness of introducing a long address to the walls of the city with the singular announcement that they cried to the Lord, when there is not, according to NAEGLSBACH, a single word actually addressed to the Lord, for the prayer in verses 20-22 is the prayer of Zion. We moreover dispense with the necessity of the laborious distinction between the individual members of the church and the mystical unity of the untranslatable Gesammtheit. We have here an eloquent poetical address by the prophet to the ruined walls, which by personification and synecdoche represent the afflicted daughter of Zion.—WORDS-WORTH: “O wall of the daughter of Zion. The Prophet appeals to the wall of Jerusalem, as that which once encircled her with defence, but now lies prostrate, and which, being reduced to ruin, was the fittest representative of the city in her desolate condition. He gives a voice to the stones of the wall, and makes them weep for her sorrow. We need not be surprised by such a prosopopoeia as this, any more than by his exclamation, O earth, earth, earth (xxii. 29), or by the language of Hab. ii. 11: The stone shall cry out of the wall, and the beam shall answer it; or by our Lord's words (Luke xix. 40), If these should hold their peace, the stones would cry out." Comp. GERLACH, p. 75.—W. H. H.]—Let tears run down like a river day and night. The expression, precisely as it is here, is found no where else. For similar expressions, see iii. 48; Jer. ix. 17; xlii. 17; xiv. 17.—Give thyself no rest; let not the apple of thine eye cease [or leave off, i. e., shedding tears (NOVES)]. The daughter of thine eye. This expression is found elsewhere only in Ps. xvii. 8. בַּת, daughter, is here apparently an abbreviation of בֵּית, entrance, door, gate, Zech. ii. 12. The pupil is the door, the opening of the eye, because in it lies the power of sight. See FURST Lex., GEREN. Thes., p. 841. DELITZSCH on Ps. xvii. 8. [ASSEM. ANN.: "That which we call the ball, or apple of the eye, from the spherical figure of it, that the Hebrews call the daughter of the eye, either as the dearest and tenderest part of it, Deut. xxxii. 10; Prov. vii. 2, or from the figures that seem to appear in it, whence also it is termed by the Greeks the damsel, by the Latins the babe of the eye." See Deut. xxxii. 10; Prov. vii. 2, and ALEXANDER on Ps. xvii. 8. BLAYNEY understands the tear as so called "with great propriety and elegance;" but this is supported by no evidence, and is rendered improbable by analogous terms applied to the pupil of the eye, by Hebrews, Greeks and Romans, as indicated above.—W. H. H.] Ver. 19. Arise, Rise up.—[GERLACH: "Up." OWEN: "The meaning as stated by GATAKER, is, Rise from thy bed; for she is exhorted to cry in the night. The Hebrew word is familiar and precious to us as the same our Saviour uttered, Mark v. 41. "Talitha cumi," κοῦμι, קִיּוּם.—W. H. H.])—Cry out in the night, in, or at the beginning of the watches. The Hebrews divided the night into three watches ["the first, commencing at sunset and extending to what corresponded to our ten o'clock; the second, from ten till two in the morning; and the third from that time till sun rise" (HENDERSON)]:

the middle one was called הַשְּׁמִיטָה הַתְּיָכָנָה, the middle watch, Judges vii. 19; the last אֲשֶׁמֶת הַבֶּקֶר, morning watch, Ex. xiv. 24; 1 Sam. xi. 11. Since in Judges vii. 19 the beginning of the middle watch is called רֹאשׁ אֵת הַתְּיָכָנָה [lit., head of middle watch], so רֹאשׁ אֲשֶׁמֶת [lit., head of night watches], the beginning of the night watches generally, would be the time of the first watch. See WINEY, R. W. B., s. v., Nachtwachen. [The opinion that this was the name of the first watch, seems to rest entirely on its use here. Yet there is much reason to doubt if it has here that sense. To rise in the first watch of the night, which began before ordinary bed-time, is not very suggestive of sleepless grief and anxiety. The passage in Judges favors GERLACH's conjecture, that the expression denotes the beginning of each successive watch in the night. He refers to the similar use of רֹאשׁ, head, beginning, in this same verse, and quotes the remark of MICHAELIS, that רֹאשׁ חִיצוֹת means, not the first of all the open-places, but the beginning or head of every one of them. So רֹאשׁ אֲשֶׁמֶת means not the first of the night watches, but the beginning of each successively. At every watch, or as often as you hear the watchman announce the hour, cry out to God in prayer.—W. H. H.] The preposition used here in Hebrew, לָ, means towards or about that time (see Gen. iii. 8; viii. 11). The sense is, About the time, when formerly every one resigned himself to his first sleep, the one here addressed should rise up to painful mourning.—Pour out thine heart like water. This seems to denote, first of all, the melting, dissolving of the heart by grief (see Ps. xxii. 15; lviii. 8; comp. 1 Sam. vii. 6), and then, the open unreserved outpouring of the heart (see Ps. lxi. 9; xlii. 5; cii. 1).—Before the face of the Lord [Jehovah, see Textual note above].—Lift up thy hands toward him. Lift up to him thy hands. See Ps. lxxiii. 5; cxix. 48. [CALVIN: "The elevation of the hands, in this place and others, means the same thing as prayer; and it has been usual in all ages to raise up the hands to Heaven, and the expression often occurs in the Psalms (xxviii. 2; cxxxiv. 2); and when Paul bids prayers to be made every where, he says, 'I would have men to raise up pure hands without contention' (1 Tim. ii. 8)."]—For the life of thy young children, lit., for the souls of, etc. As is seen by the words following (that have fainted, etc.), the object of holding up the hands is, not to save the children (ROSENUELLER), but to mourn over their loss. See at vers. 11, 12. Besides, the children are designated, also, as in the verses just named, not as the only, but as a principal object of lamentation. See vers. 20-22. [GERLACH: "To raise the hands is, according to the fixed use of words, the same thing as to pray, iii. 41; Ps. xxviii. 2; lxxiii. 5; cxxxiv. 2 (see 1 Tim. ii. 8), and therefore cannot be understood, with THENIUS, as a gesture of the deepest distress. If he would confirm this opinion by the fact, that according to the whole train of thought their fate is already determined and can only be mourned over, and therefore an exhortation to pray for the life of the languishing ones would no longer be in place; then we answer, that in that case no prayer in behalf of the city would any longer be proper, for its fate was fulfilled; yet it would be proper for those who are found surviving in great want, as in fact a prayer immediately follows on the thought of this calamity in i. 11, 20: See, Jehovah, how I am distressed. And, further,

עַל-נַפְשׁ [for the soul] does not indicate the already ended life (THENIUS, DE WETTE), for which נַפְשׁ (the life principle) would be a singular expression; and, further still, it would be inconsistent with the descriptions given in ver. 11 and iv. 4, 5, where not the death of those who have fainted, but the distress of those still living, rends the hearts of their mothers." GERLACH's opinion is confirmed by the words to Him, אֵלֵי, lift up thy hands to him, i. e., to God in prayer.—W. H. H.]—That faint for hunger in the top [lit., at the head] of every street—Who have fainted for hunger at the opening of every street. See iv. 1; Is. li. 20; Nah. iii. 10. That the wall, in the poet's conception, strictly and only represents Zion, is plainly evident from this, that the Israelitish children are designated as the children of the wall. This could be done with the more propriety from the fact that the wall had a certain motherly character. Did it not embrace the people with its arms? Did it not truly, in a certain mother-like manner, bear them on its bosom? [WORDSWORTH: "The wall, which girdled Jerusalem, is regarded as a mother, which nurses the inhabitants, her offspring, in her bosom; and she laments for the children which lie at the end of the streets, extending from one side of the city to the other."]

II. 20-22.

20 Behold, O LORD, and consider to whom thou hast done this. Shall the women eat their fruit and children of a span long? shall the priest and the prophet be slain in the sanctuary of the Lord? The young and the old lie on the ground in the streets: my virgins and my young men are fallen by the sword: thou hast slain them in the day of thy anger; thou hast killed and not pitied. Thou hast called, as in a solemn day, my terrors round about; so that in the day of the LORD's anger none escaped nor remained: those that I have swaddled and brought up hath mine enemy consumed.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 20.—עוֹלֵל. See i. 12; iii. 25.—[D^N. HENDERSON: "D^N is twice used in this verse with the force of a demonstrative interjection." He translates, Behold! women eat their fruit, infants of a span long; Behold! priest and prophet are slain, etc. This is manifestly wrong. In the very few instances in which D^N has the force of an interjection, it retains a conditional sense, and never introduces an unqualified affirmation, or statement of an unquestioned matter of fact (see Hos. xii. 12; Job xvii. 13, 16; Prov. iii. 34; Jer. xxxi. 20). Besides, the future form of the verbs requires here a conditional or potential sense.—W. H. II.].—קָרָנָה. See ii. 4. [HENDERSON: "The nominative to יִהְיֶה is קָרָנָה and נִכְאָה taken singly." The German enables NAEGLERBACH to preserve the Hebrew construction, Soll erwürgt werden Priester und Prophet?—W. H. II.]—נִכְאָה. See ii. 7.

Ver. 21.—שָׁכַבְנָה. Jeremiah uses שָׁכַב only once, נִשְׁכַּבְנָה iii. 25; but we find K'ri (decidedly arbitrary) in iii. 2, שָׁכַבְנָה.—לֹאֲרִי. See vers. 2, 10, 11.—דְּחוּצוֹת. Acc. loc. See my Gr., §70, a, β. ["The accusative is used after verbs of rest, in answer to the question where?" NAEGLERBACH. Gr.].—נֶעֱרַ וְנִקָּח. See Jer. ii. 22.—טַחְחַת. See Jer. xi. 19; xxv. 34; li. 40. The expression seems to involve an antithesis to טַחְחַת, ver. 20.

Ver. 22.—תִּקְרָא. The imperfect, when compared with the preceding and following perfects, seems to be due entirely to the necessities of the acrostic. [Perhaps, the future here, as in ver. 20, has a conditional or potential sense. So OWEN, who connects it with the words, See, O Jehovah, and consider. In this case the following would have the sense of for; or as in E. V.: so that. Shouldst Thou call together, as on a festival, all my terrors from round about! For there was not, etc. BLAYNEY, in his emendation of the text, overlooks the necessity of a ת initial.—כִּיֹּם מֵעַיִן. See ver. 6.—W. H. II.].—רַבִּיתִי. Piel not in Jeremiah, nor does he use the verb in this sense. See Ezek. xix. 2.—כָּלָם. See Jer. v. 3; ix. 15; xiv. 12; xlix. 37, etc. [BLAYNEY (followed by BOOTHROD) takes this word for כָּל with suffix, and translates: Those whom I had fostered and made to grow were all of them my enemies. The pointing, כָּלָם not כָּלָם, the Versions, and the sense, are all against this.—W. H. II.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

The opinion of CHR. B. MICHAELIS (which ROSENMUELLER seems to adopt), that the following prayer is set forth by the prophet himself, as a form of prayer (instar formularis), in behalf of the daughter of Zion, who is exhorted to pray in vers. 18, 19, hardly needs refutation. That the wall of Zion, i. e., Zion herself, utters the prayer in vers. 20-22, is evident, both from the exhortation to prayer in vers. 18, 19, and from the substantial agreement of vers. 20-22 with what vers. 18, 19 had indicated as the subject matter of this prayer of lamentation.

Ver. 20. Behold, O LORD, and consider—See, O Jehovah, and look. This exact formula occurs i. 11. The prayer in i. 20-22 (comp. i. 9) also begins with See, Jehovah.—To whom thou hast done this. [As the pronoun is interrogative, that form should be preserved: to whom hast Thou done thus? The question thus interposed between the appeal to God to look, and the description of what He will see if He look, is very forcible and does not mar the sense as the ordinary construction does, but makes it more apparent.—W. H. II.] The Lord had done this, not to a heathen nation, but to the people of His own choice, to whom all the promises of His blessing were given (comp. Gen. xii. 2, 3; xv. 5; xviii. 18; xx. 17, 18; xxvi. 3, 4; xxviii. 14, etc.).—Shall the women eat their fruit and children of a span long?—Should women eat their fruit, the children whom they nursed? This is a single indirect question, although it is contained in two members. D^N, if [literally translated, the question is, if—shall eat women their fruit, etc.] is dependent on יִהְיֶה, see [see if this is so, or should be so]. The sense of the question, moreover, is not, whether it had ever been heard of that mothers had been driven by hunger to eat their own offspring? (ROSENMUELLER), for then the perfect tense ought to have been used. But what is asked is, whether that thing, speaking in a general way, may be supposable, possible, or right; and to express this the imperfect must be used. The explanation of THENIUS, "Had they then been obliged to eat, etc., i. e., Had Thy judgments gone so far, that, etc.," is not sufficiently grammatical. What is asked is, whether this thing, generally speaking, would be allowed to happen? The answer to this question would involve another, whether it had been suffered to happen at that time? But the latter question is not directly contained in the words used.—The crime here mentioned is clearly designated as a punishment to the rebellious people; Deut. xxviii. 53; Jer. xix. 9. See 2 Kings vi. 28, 29; Lam. iv. 10.—Shall the priest and the prophet be slain in the sanctuary of the Lord—Should priest and prophet be slain, etc. [ASSEM. ANN.: "Should God endure to see His own house polluted with the blood of His own priests and such as bore the name at least of His prophets."]

פִּרְיָם, their fruit. The masculine suffix has induced most interpreters unnecessarily to change the reading. [As the Sept. has καρπὸν κοιλίας αὐτῶν, and Chal. and Arab. similar readings, it has been conjectured that the original text was פִּרְיָם, of which the י changed into ו is all that remains in the present text. BLAYNEY suggests פִּרְיָם. OWEN has an original device of his own to meet this presumed difficulty. He says, "Fruit, in the sense of offspring, is applied to men as well as to women. We may take the final mem in פִּרְיָם as a pronoun, their wives; the same are meant as in verse 18, their voice [heart?], i. e., the citizens of Jerusalem. Thus the construction will be quite grammatical. Should their own wives eat their offspring." That would mean their wives ate, not their own, but their husbands' children. This would furnish preachers with a text against polygamy, or the cruelty of step-mothers! HENDERSON is satisfied with a magisterial appeal to euphony: "The masculine suffix is adopted instead of the feminine, to agree in form with פִּרְיָם preceding."—W. H. H.] It is not even necessary, with CHR. B. MICHAELIS, to keep in mind mothers and fathers. The masculine, as the more comprehensive and higher sex, includes the feminine too. See my Gr., § 60, 5; Jer. ix. 19; xlv. 19, 25; Gen. xxi. 9; Ex. i. 21, etc.—פִּרְיָם occurs only here. It is the abstract of the verb פָּרַץ, which is found only in ver. 22 below. The latter (different from פָּרַץ, Is. xlviii. 13) is a denominative from פָּרַץ, palm, the hand-breadth, palm of the hand, and seemingly signifies palmis gesture (the Latins say ulnis gesture). KIMCHI, VITRINGA, KALKAR would understand the expression of the smoothing of the limbs, as of the swaddling clothes and bands, with the palm of the hand. [With E. V., children of a span long, agree VULG.: parvulos ad mensuram palmæ; LUTHER: die jüngsten Kindlein einer Spanne lang; BROUGHTON: infants that may be spanned, and HENDERSON: infants of a span long. The idea of children carried in the hands is adopted by BLAYNEY: children of palms, i. e., "little ones dandled on the hands;" ROSENMUELLER: infantes quos suis manibus tractant; GERLACH: die Kinder, die man auf Händen trägt; and NOYES: children borne in the arms. The marginal reading in E. V., children swaddled with their hands, is thus explained in ASSEM. ANN.: "Because the verb means to mete or to stretch out aught with the hand, as Is. xlviii. 13. Hence both the Chaldee Paraphrast and the Rabbins here expound it the children of swaddlings; the children whose limbs the mothers were wont to stretch out and stroke, as if they were meting or measuring them with their hands, to fashion them and make them grow straight and proportionable; and to the same purpose also to make them up with swathing bands; for this word ariseth from a root frequent in the Talmudists, for a wrapper of linen, wherewith to wrap up aught; as also, for a veil, or apron, or the like, in Scripture, Ruth iii. 15; Is. iii. 22; and this interpretation receiveth further strength from what followeth here, ver. 22." CALVIN translates parvulos educationis, which OWEN translates, infants while nursed, the children of nursings, or nurturings (educationum). BOOTHROD: their little nursings. The Sept.: those sucking the breasts. After examining these various translations and interpretations, it is obvious that NAGELSACH has expressed the true meaning of the word, whatever is its fundamental primitive idea,—the children whom they nursed,—taking the last word in its most comprehensive sense.—W. H. H.]

Ver. 21. The young and the old lie on the ground in the streets—Boy and old man lie on the ground in the streets. [So GERLACH. BLAYNEY, NOYES: The boy and the old man. HENDERSON: Boys and old men.—The verb is preterite, and ought to be so translated. He is describing what was then past. The boy and the old man lay on the ground. BLAYNEY: have lien.—W. H. H.]—My virgins and my young men. See i. 4, 18; ii. 10; v. 11.—Are—have—fallen by the sword. See Jer. xix. 7; xx. 4; xxxix. 18. [BLAYNEY imagines the metre needs improving, and translates, My virgins and my young men are fallen; with the sword hast thou slain them, in utter disregard of the accents, besides the necessity of supplying a pronoun not expressed.—W. H. H.]—Thou hast slain them in the day of thine anger; thou hast killed and not pitied—Thou hast killed in the day of thy anger (see ver. 2); hast slain and not pitied (ver. 2). [The asyndetical construction, as in ver. 16, is vehement and forcible. Thou hast killed, hast slain, hast not pitied. To supply the conjunction and or personal pronoun them weakens the sentence.—W. H. H.]

Ver. 22. Thou hast called—Thou callest together—as in a solemn day—as on a feast-day. See ver. 6.—My terrors round about [lit., from round about, from every direction, so that they were surrounded by them. So BROUGHTON. CALVIN: "Here he uses a most appropriate metaphor, to show that the people had been brought to the narrowest straits; for he says that terrors had on every side surrounded them, as when a solemn assembly is called. They sounded the trumpets when a festival was at hand, that all might come up to the Temple. As, then, many companies were wont to come to Jerusalem on feast-days—for when the trumpets were sounded all were called—so the Prophet says that terrors had been sent from every part to straiten the miserable people." OWEN: "My terrors mean my terrifiers, according to the Vulg., the abstract for the concrete."—W. H. H.]—So that in the day of the LORD'S anger none escaped or remained—And there was not on the day of Jehovah's wrath an escaped one or a survivor. [The two words rendered escaped and remained seem to express the same idea; namely, to escape. As there were multitudes who survived the slaughter and still remained on earth, we cannot translate the second word by either of these terms, unless we regard them as merely hyperbolic. Probably the meaning is that none entirely escaped the effects of God's wrath, and we may translate thus, there was not one that escaped or was exempt. This is consistent with the meaning of the verb from which the noun is derived (שָׁרַר, elabi, to escape, to get clear, i. e., of condemnation or punishment), and is confirmed apparently by Jer. xlii. 17, "they shall die by the sword, by the famine, and by the pestilence: and none of them shall remain or escape," i. e., shall escape or be wholly exempt (comp. Jer. xlii. 14),—"from the evil that I will bring upon them." We may understand the phrase in our text as elliptical for the fuller expression as we find it in Jer. xlii. 14, remain or escape from the evils, שָׁרַר וְיָלִיט מִכָּפֵי הָרָעָה. We may translate the sentence impersonally, there was not that escaped or was exempt. The wrath of the Lord descended on all things and all persons. The city and Zion, the walls and the gates, the sanctuary, palaces and houses, and all the inhabitants, without regard to age, sex or condition, were involved in a common ruin.—W. H. H.]—Those that I have swaddled—Those I have carried or nursed, see ver. 20—and brought up, hath mine enemy consumed—my enemy destroyed them. It is evident that the prayer is a prayer of lamentation, and with respect to its object responds to the exhortation contained in ver. 19 by giving the first place to the principal subject of that verse, without restricting itself to that subject, which is, besides, rather intimated than expressed.

כְּבֵרִים, terrors, every where else means shelter, place of accommodation, dwelling, commoratio, peregrinatio (Gen. xvii. 8; xxviii. 4; xxxvi. 7; xxxvii. 1; Ex. vi. 4, etc.), granary (Sing. כְּבֵרִי, Ps. lv. 16). None of these meanings suits here. It is better therefore to derive it from כָּוַר, terrifying, which occurs frequently in Jeremiah, vi. 25; xx. 3, 4, 10; xlii. 5; xlix. 29. [GERLACH: "This word is certainly a designation of the enemy (Vulg.: qui terrent me), but is not to be restricted to them, see i. 20, since the formula so frequent in Jeremiah (vi. 25; xx. 4, 10; xlii. 5; xlix. 29) is a general expression for a position threatened on all sides with dangers and the terror prevailing therein."—EWALD, according to GERLACH, takes the word in its more common signification and insists that it relates to the same persons named in the second and last clauses of the verse. "The word denotes my villagers round about, and the inhabitants of the defenceless country towns and villages are intended, who were related to the chief protecting city as farmers, מְרִירִי (Sept. παροικίαι). Thus the whole verse plainly alludes to a great event in the days of the siege. All the inhabitants of the country rushed into the principal city (as happened similarly under Titus) as if a great feast as of old were to be held in this city,—but alas! it would be in the end for them, at the final capture, the great festivity of murder." This makes excellent sense of the whole verse, and is recommended by preserving the same subject throughout the three clauses of the verse,—which cannot be said of BLAYNEY'S translation, Thou hast convoked, as on a set day, such as were strangers to me round about, which gives us a new theme in each clause. But, as GERLACH remarks, the analogy of i. 15, the fact that the authority of the Sept. is weakened by its evident mistranslation of the formula in the prophetic book—fear on every side, and the difficulty of supposing that the flight of the country people to the city could be designated as a summons from the Lord, should confirm us in the usual translation of this passage.—W. H. H.]

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. Ver. 1. "Olim erat regnum Israelitarum in sublimi, jam sub timo." FÖRSTER.

2. Ver. 1. "When Jeremiah says throughout, the Lord has done it, disregarding what Babel did, he would teach us, when injury is inflicted upon us by the world and men, that we should regard, not the instruments, who could not injure the least hair of our heads, but God, who does and ordains it (Lam. iii. 37; Am. iii. 6; Is. xlv. 7; Sir. xi. 14), that He (1) is impelled to it by our sins, and (2) that He prepares His punishments in Heaven, before they are inflicted on transgressors. This serves to make us patient. Example: Job says not, The Devil, the Chaldeans, the Arabians, did this, but God has done it." CRAMER, according to EG. HUNNIUS, Ser. I., ch. 2, p. 45.—[Ver. 1, etc. How hath Jehovah, etc. "The grief is not so much that such and such things are done, as that God has done them; this, this is their wormwood and gall." "To those who know how to value God's favor, nothing appears more dreadful than His anger; corrections in love are easily borne, but rebukes in wrath wound deep." MATT. HENRY.]

3. Ver. 1. "Bellarmine is not wise in attempting to establish the worship of images from this text, and especially from Ps. xcix. 5 (Lib. II. de cultu imaginum, cap. 12). For the Psalmist would not have the pious worship the temple of the Lord, or the ark of the covenant, or mercy-seat. . . . Therefore, in Hebrew it is not said. Worship His footstool, but Worship at [or toward] His footstool. AUGUSTINE understands this as said with reference to the human nature of Christ, in which the Logos is adorned with Divine worship (λατρεία). But this interpretation rather strengthens than weakens the argument of the Jesuit." FÖRSTER.

4. Ver. 1. "If men themselves are not worthy,

He rejects all their ceremonies. He inquires nothing about stone houses with their splendor, nothing about the external form of the church, but He will prepare for Himself the souls of individuals in the fire for all eternity." DIEDRICH.

5. Ver. 2. "The Abbot RUPERT, in his commentary on the books of Kings (B. V., ch. 14) understands the fall of Jezebel out of the window (2 Kings ix. 33),—as well as the passage before us, which is expressed in the Vulgate thus, "the Lord hath cast down headlong . . . all that was beautiful in Jacob,"—as a prophecy of the vengeance which Israel has incurred, for the shedding of the blood of Christ; and he then says, 'That fall has been heard of throughout the whole world. Lo! that synagogue which slew Christ, where is it? Truly, whatever seems to remain may be compared to what the dogs left of Jezebel's body.'" GHISLER, p. 70.

6. Ver. 2. "PASCHASIUS RADBERTUS observes on this passage, that kingdom, king, priest, Temple, stronghold, etc., may be nothing else than 'as it were, some great prophet or prophecy' contained in earthen vessels. 'But now that Christ has come, since the various predictions concerning Him, which were contained in those vessels, have been fulfilled, they have all been cast down and broken, destroyed and scattered, polluted and profaned, that all the mystical and unutterable secrets which were concealed in them should be made apparent to the whole world, being revealed more clearly than light.'" GHISLER.

7. Ver. 2. He hath polluted, etc. "This is, truly, the result of the profanation of the Divine name and majesty, which was at times extremely common even among the chief men; and this result is in accordance with the rule of divine justice in Wisdom xi. 17—Wherewithal a man sinneth, by the same also shall he be punished." FÖRSTER. "The secret of their strength was taken away from the people in the persons of their princes, as Samson lost his strength when he had violated his vow." DIEDRICH.—[Ver. 2. PRAYER. "Grant, Almighty God, that as Thou settest before us at this day those ancient examples by which we perceive with what heavy punishments Thou didst chastise those whom Thou hadst adopted,—O grant, that we may learn to regard Thee, and carefully to examine our whole life, and duly consider how indulgently Thou hast preserved us to this day, so that we may ever patiently bear Thy chastisements, and with a humble and sincere heart flee to Thy mercy, until Thou be pleased to raise up Thy Church from that miserable state in which it now lies, and so to restore it, that Thy name may, through Thine only-begotten Son, be glorified throughout the whole world. Amen." CALVIN.]

8. Ver. 3. "This consideration can and ought to check pride and arrogance, and prevent us from fiercely erecting our horns, being mindful of that notorious saying:

Cornua qui faciunt, ne cornua ferre recusent.

And from Zech. i. 18-21 we learn, that the Lord can easily raise up smiths to break the horns of those who are fierce and insolent." FÖRSTER.

9. Ver. 5. "God has made Christ a horn of salvation to His church, that it should receive from His fulness grace, blessing, strength and power. Whoever will not make use of Christ for this purpose, his carnal ability will soon go to wreck and ruin. Luke i. 69." STARKE.

10. Ver. 5. "When Judea denied the mystery of our Lord's incarnation, which the Gentiles believed, the princes of Judea fell into contempt, and these Gentiles, who had been oppressed while guilty of unbelief, were elevated into the liberty of the true faith. But Jeremiah, foreseeing long before it happened this fall of the Israelites, says, The Lord has become as if He were an enemy, He has overthrown Israel, He has overthrown all his walls, He has overthrown His defences." GREG. PAPA, Lib. XI., Moral. Cap. 10, quoted by GHISLER, p. 76.

11. Ver. 5. הַחֲמִינָה הַחֲמִינָה. "The VULGATE version has, humiliatam et humiliationem [one humbled and humiliation]. AVENARIUS interprets invecum et invectionem [attack and assault by sea] and explains it as relating to naval conflicts and the various methods of assaulting an enemy: since both words are from anah, which properly signifies to be carried in ships." FÖRSTER. [NOTE.—FÖRSTER either misquoted the Vulgate, or intended only to give the sense, in his understanding of it. The Vulgate is humiliatam et humiliatam; which the Douay translates "and hath multiplied in the daughter of Judea the afflicted, both men and women." The VULO. is a translation of the SEPT.: καὶ ἐπλήθυνεν τῇ θυγατρὶ Ἰουδα ταπεινώμενον καὶ τεταπεινωμένην.—W. H. H.]

12. Vers. 4, 5. "Here a distinction between the evil of crime and the evil of punishment is to be observed. God is not the efficient cause of the evil of crime. The opinion of PETER MARTYR, in his Commentary on the first chapter of Romans, is, therefore, impious and horrible,—'I cannot deny that God is in every way the cause of sin.' God is, however, the chief cause of the evil of punishment, being a just Judge and the avenger of crimes. In this sense the inimical acts of the Babylonians are here attributed directly to Him." FÖRSTER.

13. Vers. 6, 7. "The Lord, who never suffers Himself to be forgotten 'causes our solemn feasts and the Sabbaths of our rest to be forgotten,' not because the rites of our religion do not please Him, but because the former tabernacle of God or the temple of the Holy Ghost in us is profaned, and there is now no place in which those rites may be so offered as to please God." PASCHAS. RADBERTUS by GHISLER, p. 79.

14. Vers. 6, 7. "The Romanists, therefore, err when they pretend that Rome is the fixed and immovable seat of the church. For although the Catholic and universal church cannot cease to exist (Matt. xvi. 18), yet that particular churches have perished and can perish, experience testifies, yea Rome herself testifies by an example in her own history. . . . What is here related of the temple at Jerusalem, that it should assuredly be demolished and overthrown, has happened to temples of Christ at the hands of the Turks. It is a fact also especially memorable, that on the 29th day of May, in the year 1453, the Turks having assembled and taken Constantinople, the temple of Sophia, esteemed so sacred, was turned into a horse-stable. And this is what was long ago written in Ps. lxxviii. 59-64, and also Ps. lxxx. 13, 14." FÖRSTER.—[Ver. 7. "Had he only spoken of the city, of the lands, of the palaces, of the vineyards, and, in short, of all their possessions, it would have been a much lighter matter; but when he says that God had counted as nothing all their sacred things,—the altar, the Temple, the ark of the covenant, and festive days,—when, therefore, he says, that God had not only disregarded, but had also cast away from Him these things, which yet especially availed to conciliate His favor, the people must have hence perceived, except they were beyond measure stupid, how grievously they had provoked God's wrath against themselves; for this was the same as though heaven and earth were blended together. Had there been an upsetting of all things, had the sun left its place and sunk into darkness, had the earth heaved upwards, the confusion would have hardly been more dreadful, than when God put forth thus His hand against the sanctuary, the altar, the festival days, and all their sacred things. But we must refer to the reason why this was done, even because the Temple had been long polluted by the iniquities of the people, and because all sacred things had been wickedly and disgracefully profaned. We now, then, understand why the Prophet enlarged so much on a subject in itself sufficiently plain." CALVIN.]

15. Ver. 7. "Wherewith one sins, therewith is he punished (Wis. xi. 17). But because the most heinous sins had been perpetrated at the altar and Divine worship, so now at the altar the severe chastisement is inflicted, that they must be deprived of it." CRAMER.—[Ver. 7. They have made a noise in the house of Jehovah.—"Why did He grant so much license to these profane enemies? even because the Jews themselves had previously polluted the Temple, so that He abhorred all their solemn assemblies, as also He declares by Isaiah, that He detested their festivals, Sabbaths and new moons (i. 13, 14). But it was a shocking change, when enemies entered the place which God had consecrated for Himself, and there insolently boasted, and uttered base and wicked calumnies against God! But the sadder the spectacle, the more detestable appeared the impiety of the people, which had been the cause of so great evils. * * * That the Chaldeans polluted the Temple, that they trod under foot all sacred things, all this the Prophet shows was to be ascribed to the Jews themselves, who had, through their own conduct, opened the Temple to the Chaldeans and exposed all sacred things to their will and pleasure." CALVIN.]

16. Ver. 9. "God is careful to punish contempt of His word by taking away that word. The curse which they chose, that is come to them; the blessing they did not choose, that is far from them, Ps. cix. 17." CRAMER.

17. Vers. 1-10. "Although God, properly speaking, allows Himself to repent of nothing, and His gifts and callings admit of no change (Rom. xi. 20), yet it is evident from this passage, that He is bound to no particular people, especially if that people prove to be godless and unthankful towards Him. He had chosen the people of Israel for His own peculiar people, Jerusalem for His dwelling, where He had, as it were His fire and His hearth (Is. xxxi. 9), and had lifted it up to Heaven; but when it became ungrateful and disobedient, He considered not all this, but cast down to the earth all the glory of Israel, laid waste His own tabernacle, destroyed His dwelling, overthrew His altar. For God is not only merciful and kind, but also an angry and just Judge, who will not let iniquity go unpunished, and makes His chastisements the more severe in proportion to the kindness He has shown to a people, when they are ungrateful and godless. This should be a solemn warning to us."

Würtemb. Summ. ["Even those doctrines, ordinances and regulations, which are most exactly scriptural, when scrupulously retained by men destitute of the Spirit of God, are but a lifeless carcass of religion: and when made a cloak for iniquity, God abhors them. So that, in the day of His wrath for national wickedness, He will despise temples and palaces, kings and priests, establishments and forms of every kind." SCOTT.]

18. Ver. 10. They have cast up dust upon their heads, etc. Luctus pro luxu. FÖRSTER.

19. Ver. 11. "Effusion of the liver is carnal mortification." BONAVENTURA, quoted by GIESLER, p. 91.

20. Ver. 13. "When God punishes His people on account of their sins, He punishes them more severely than He does other peoples. It may be said of Him, The dearer the child, the harder the rod." OSIANDRI BIBLE IN STARKE. ["When we wish to alleviate grief, we are wont to bring examples which have some likeness to the case before us. For when any one seeks to comfort one in illness, he will say, 'Thou art not the first nor the last, thou hast many like thee; why shouldst thou so much torment thyself; for this is a condition almost common to mortals.' * * The Prophet, then, means that comforts commonly administered to those in misery, would be of no benefit, because the calamity of Jerusalem exceeded all other examples; as though he had said, 'No such thing has ever happened in the world; God had never before thundered so tremendously against any people.' * * Great as the sea is thy breach; that is, 'Thy calamity is the deepest abyss. I cannot then find any in the whole world whom I can compare to thee, for thy calamity exceeds all calamities; nor is there anything like it that can be set before thee, so that thou art become a memorable example for all ages.' But when we hear the Prophet speaking thus, we ought to remember that we have succeeded in the place of the ancient people. As then, God had formerly punished with so much severity the sins of His chosen people, we ought to beware lest we in the present day provoke Him to an extremity by our perverseness, for He remains ever like Himself." CALVIN.]

21. Ver. 14. "Preachers, so soothing, are smooth-preachers and dumb dogs, who bring great and irreparable injury to a whole country, for the sun shall go down over such prophets and the day shall be dark over them (Mic. iii. 6). And although they may receive for a long time good-will and favor, money and encouragement from men, yet they lose, together with their hearers who delight in such accommodating ministers, all that they receive from the living God; Gal. i.

10; James iv. 4." CRAMER according to EG. HUNNIUS, Ser. 3, ch. 2, p. 64. ["They had wilfully drunk sweet poison." CALVIN.—PRAYER. "Grant, Almighty God, that though Thou chastisest us as we deserve, we may yet never have the light of truth extinguished among us, but may ever see, even in darkness, at least some sparks, which may enable us to behold Thy paternal goodness and mercy, so that we may be especially humbled under Thy mighty hand, and that being really prostrate through a deep feeling of repentance, we may raise our hopes to Heaven, and never doubt that Thou wilt at length be reconciled to us when we seek Thee in Thine only-begotten Son. Amen." CALVIN.]

22. Vers. 15, 16. "He who suffers an injury, need not mind mockery. It is the Devil's special delight to make a mock of the church and of all the pious, so that the godless are known by their great Ahs and Ohs (Wis. v. 3)! Let not, however, ridicule cause us to waver, but let us remain firm and faithful to God. For blessed are ye when men, for My sake, revile and persecute you and say all manner of evil against you (Matt. v. 11). For God can easily and speedily take away again such reproach and put to silence the triumphing of the wicked, and apply to them the song—Mine eyes will see that they shall be trodden down as the mire of the streets (Mic. vii. 10)." CRAMER quoted by EG. HUNNIUS, Ser. 4, ch. 2, p. 73.]

23. Vers. 14-16. "This is, in truth, the root of the calamity, that the prophets in the service of the people had preached in accordance with carnal pleasures; they had not disclosed but concealed the misdeeds of the people, and thus had preached the people out of their country, and into captivity. How then was this? Had they invented new precepts? made another catechism? No, nothing at all of this sort! But it sufficed for the purpose of destruction, that they mistook the Gospel, and exercised no control over the people in conformity therewith, but instead of that practised a false policy. Now the enemies of Jerusalem and of God's people mock and imagine that all the glorious promises of the Word of God of a kingdom of grace among men have come to naught. They imagine that they have now made it evident by their power, that the mystery of God's grace and election is naught. Poor fools! They know not that God is in all this; they know nothing of that God, who suffers with us and for us, and leads us through suffering to glory." DIEDRICH.

24. Ver. 17. "When we experience God's judgment and chastisements on account of our sins, we ought always to look back (1) on our sins, (2) on God's frequent warnings of punishment, (3) on His unchangeable faithfulness, and (4) on His great power and His right hand which can change all things, Ps. lxxvii. 11; Dan. ix. 8; Ps. li. 5." CRAMER, quoted by EG. HUNNIUS, Ser. 4, Ch. II., pp. 74 ff.—[Ver. 17. He hath fulfilled His word that He had commanded in the days of old.—"Had the Prophet touched only on the secret counsel of God, the Jews might have been in doubt as to what it was. And certainly as our minds cannot penetrate into that deep abyss, in vain would he have spoken of the hidden judgments of God. It was, therefore, necessary to come down to the doctrine, by which God, as far as it is expedient, manifests to us what would otherwise be not only hidden, but also incomprehensible; for were we to inquire into God's judgments, we would sink into the deep. But when we direct our minds to what God has taught us, we find that He reveals to us whatever is necessary to be known; and though even by His word, we cannot perfectly know His hidden judgments, yet we may know them in part, and as I have said, as far as it is expedient for us. . . . Let us then hold to this rule, even to seek from the Law and the Prophets, and the Gospel, whatever we desire to know concerning the secret judgments of God; for were we to turn aside, even in the smallest degree, from what is taught us, the immensity of God's glory would immediately swallow up all our thoughts; and experience sufficiently teaches us, that nothing is more dangerous and even fatal than to allow ourselves more liberty in this respect than what behooves us. Let us then learn to bridle all curiosity when we speak of God's secret judgments, and instantly to direct our minds to the word itself, that they may be in a manner inclosed therein." CALVIN.]

25. Ver. 18. "In this exhortation, the requisites of true and ardent prayer are shown. (1) The first of these is the cry of the heart to God, by which devoutness, or the earnest and ardent desire of the heart is denoted. For, as CYPRIAN says, in his 12th Sermon on the Lord's Prayer, God hears not the voice, but the heart. And it is commonly said, When the heart does not pray, then the tongue labors in vain. (2) Tears, i. e., by metonymy, true penitence, of which tears are signs, as appears in the case of the sinful woman (Luke vii. 38), and of Peter (Luke xxii. 62). And well-known is that saying of the orthodox Father, The tears of sinners are angels' bread and angels' wine." FÖRSTER.

26. Vers. 18-22. "Here we have a lesson,—when, to whom, and how, we ought to pray. We should pray always and not faint, as Christ teaches us by a parable (Luke xviii.), but especially when there is a great and immediate necessity, as Jeremiah did here, and David, The anguish of my heart is great, O bring me, Lord, out of my distresses (Ps. xxv. 17). To this Lord the prophet Jeremiah here points the people. God Himself calls us to come to Him only, and says, Call upon Me in the day of trouble, I will deliver thee and thou shalt glorify Me (Ps. l. 15). Not alone should your mouth pray, but, says Jeremiah, let your heart cry to God. For the Lord is near to those who call upon Him, to those who call upon Him with earnestness (Ps. cxlv. 18). We should present before Him circumstantially our necessity and solicitudes, with tears and sighs, as Jeremiah here directs. For although God well knows beforehand what distresses us and what we need, before we tell Him (Matt. vi. 8), yet the recital of our pressing necessity serves to make us more earnest in prayer; for God will have those who pray, such as those who worship Him in spirit and in truth (John iv. 23)." WÜRT. Summarien.

27. Ver. 19. Arise, cry out in the night.—"The prayer of night—how readily it rises to God the only Judge, and to the Holy Angel who undertakes to present it before the Heavenly altar! How grateful and bright, colored with the blush of humility! How serene and placid, disturbed by no clamor or bustle! And last of all, how pure and sincere, sprinkled with no dust of earthly care, incited by no praise or flattery of beholders!" BERNARD, Serm. 86 on the Canticles, in GHISLER, p. 108.

28. Ver. 20. Behold, O Jehovah, and consider.—"It is most proper, when any one is overwhelmed with affliction, that he keep it not entirely to himself, but disclose it to such persons as may come to his relief in the way either of help or of comfort. But to no one can we better and more advantageously lament our distresses and solitudes, than to our dear God, for He is our confidence, a strong tower from our enemies (Ps. lxi. 4)." CRAMER quoted by EG. HUNNIUS, Ser. 4, ch. 2, p. 78.—[PRAYER. "Grant, Almighty God, that as Thy Church at this day is oppressed with many evils, we may learn to raise up not only our eyes and our hands to Thee, but also our hearts, and that we may so fix our attention on Thee as to look for salvation from Thee alone; and that though despair may overwhelm us on earth, yet the hope of Thy goodness may ever shine on us from Heaven, and that, relying on the Mediator whom Thou hast given us, we may not hesitate to cry continually to Thee, until we really find by experience that our prayers have not been in vain, when Thou, pitying Thy church, hast extended Thy hand, and given us cause to rejoice, and hast turned our mourning into joy, through Christ our Lord. Amen."] CALVIN.]

29. Ver. 21. The young and the old.—"When general judgments proceed from God, the old and the young must suffer together: the old, because they have not rightly educated the young; the young, because they have imitated the wickedness of the old." CRAMER.

30. [Vers. 19-22. "Comforts for the cure of these lamentations are here sought for and prescribed. The two most common topics, that their case is neither singular nor desperate, are here tried, but laid by, because they would not hold. No wisdom or power of man can repair the desolations of such a broken, shattered state. It is to no purpose, therefore, to administer these common cordials; therefore, the method of cure prescribed is, to refer her to God, that by penitent prayer she may commit her case to Him, and be instant and constant in her supplications, ver. 19. 'Arise out of thy despondency, cry out in the night, watch unto prayer; be importunate with God for mercy, be free and full, be sincere and serious; open thy mind, spread thy case before the Lord; lift up thine hands towards Him in holy desire and expectations; beg for the life of thy young children. Take with you words, take with you these words, ver. 20. Prayer is a remedy for every malady, even the most grievous. And our business in prayer is not to prescribe, but to subscribe to the wisdom and will of God; Lord, behold and consider, and Thy will be done." HENRY.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

1. Vers. 1-10. As a warning against a proud confidence of security, our text can be used for a sermon on this theme.—The judgment on the members of the old covenant is a solemn warning for the members of the new covenant. I. The judgment.

1. Who judges? The Lord. 2. How does He judge? With rigorous righteousness. 3. Why does He judge? Because His wrath has been provoked by sins. II. The warning. 1. They were the natural branches: we engrafted ones (Rom. xi. 24). They had for their part only the revelation of the law; we the revelation of grace. 2. From this it follows that we have to expect a similar judgment, not only with the same, but assuredly with greater certainty.

2. Ver. 9. The blessing of a well ordered political and ecclesiastical condition of affairs. I. What belongs to such order? 1. That the civil magistracy administer the law. 2. That the teachers of God's word rightly divide it. II. What are the salutary fruits thereof? 1. In a temporal point of view, Order, Right and Righteousness, peace and general prosperity. 2. In a spiritual point of view, Glory to God in the highest, peace on earth and good will from God to men.

3. Vers. 11, 12. These verses could be preached upon in a time of severe famine. I. Describe the actual condition of things. The distress: 1, of the children; 2, of the parents. II. Exhort to lively sympathy and the actual manifestation of pity.

4. Vers. 13, 14. The hurt of the daughter of Zion. 1. Wherein it consists. 2. Its causes. 3. Its cure.

5. Vers. 13, 14. The immense responsibility of the office of the preacher. 1. To whom are the preachers responsible (and whose word have they therefore to publish)? 2. What blessings may they be the authors of by a constant consideration of this responsibility? 3. What injury may they do by not considering the same?

6. Vers. 15, 16. Warning against malicious joy in the misfortunes of others. We understand this in a double sense; whilst we (1), warn against such conduct as may make one a subject of the malicious joy of others; (2), we warn against malicious exultation over the misfortunes of others.

7. Vers. 16, 17. The impressive sermon which is contained in great calamities. I. These warn us; 1, against the pride which goes before a fall; 2, against malicious joy over the fall of our neighbor. II. They instruct us, 1, to consider the warnings of the Lord; 2, to recognize plainly His hand in the blows which befall men.

8. Vers. 18-22. The prayer of the distressed. 1. It comes out of the heart. 2. It is the expression of deep pain. 3. It is not satisfied with few words. 4. It is directed confidently to the Lord.

CHAPTER III.

THE MIDDLE SONG CONSTITUTING THE CLIMAX OF THE POEM: ISRAEL'S BRIGHTER DAY OF CONSOLATION CONTRASTED WITH THE GLOOMY NIGHT OF SORROW EXPERIENCED BY THE SERVANT OF GOD [AS REPRESENTED BY JEREMIAH HIMSELF].

This Song, which as the third one of the five holds the middle place, is the culmination point of the whole book, and thus affords a strong argument for the opinion, that the whole book is constructed on one carefully considered plan. It is the culmination point, both as to its matter and as to its form. As to its matter, because we have here the sublimest conceptions of suffering. As to its form, because here the art of the Poet displays itself in full splendor. This appears, first of all, in the alphabetical arrangement. Whilst the other songs have only twenty-two alphabetically arranged verses, this one contains sixty-six verses, arranged in triplets, the three verses of each triplet beginning with the same letter. Each verse is a distich, composed of a rising and falling inflection. The ternary division is observable not merely in reference to the verses beginning with the same initial letter, but with regard to the arrangement of the whole: for the whole Song is naturally divided into three parts. The first part embraces vers. 1-18: the second, vers. 19-42: the third, vers. 43-66.

PART I.

III. 1-18.

- ✠ Ver. 1. I am the man who saw affliction
 By the rod of His wrath.
 ✠ Ver. 2. He led me and brought me
 Into darkness and not light.
 ✠ Ver. 3. Surely against me He turned His hand
 Again and again the whole day long.
 3 Ver. 4. He caused my flesh and my skin to waste away,
 He broke my bones.
 3 Ver. 5. He built around and encompassed me
 With bitterness and distress.
 3 Ver. 6. He caused me to dwell in dark places,
 As the dead of old.
 3 Ver. 7. He hedged me in that I should not go forth,
 He made my chain heavy.
 3 Ver. 8. Also, lest I should cry and call for help,
 He shut out my prayer.
 3 Ver. 9. He hedged in my ways with hewn stone,
 He made my paths crooked.
 7 Ver. 10. A lurking bear was He to me—
 A lion in ambush.
 7 Ver. 11. He drove me aside—He tore me in pieces—
 He left me suffering and alone.
 7 Ver. 12. He bent His bow, and set me
 As the mark for the arrow.
 7 Ver. 13. He shot into my reins
 The sons of His quiver.
 7 Ver. 14. I became a laughing-stock to all my people,
 Their song all the day.
 7 Ver. 15. He filled me with bitter things.
 He made me drunk with wormwood.
 3 Ver. 16. He broke my teeth with pebbles,
 He covered me with ashes.
 3 Ver. 17. Thou didst thrust me away from peace:
 I forgot good.
 3 Ver. 18. Then I said, My confidence and my hope
 Are perished from Jehovah!

ANALYSIS.

After the first triad of verses, containing the theme, the Poet, or rather the person whom the Poet represents as speaking (and who will be understood as always intended, where the sense allows it, when for the sake of brevity we say "the Poet,") describes what he had suffered physically, vers. 4, 5; and in regard to light and freedom, vers. 6, 7; how the Lord had rejected his prayer, ver. 8; shut up his way, ver. 9; attacked and worried him like a bear or lion, vers. 10, 11; made him a mark for his arrows, like an archer, piercing into his very soul, vers. 12, 13; how he had thus become an object of scorn to the people, ver. 14; and drunk with bitterness, ver. 15; and how, as it were, they had given him pebbles to bite and covered him with ashes, ver. 16. In vers. 17, 18, he expresses the sense of these images in literal language; God has deprived him of peace and happiness, till he was well nigh compelled to throw away his confidence in God. Thus ends this first part, in which the name of the Lord is not mentioned except as the last word of ver. 18, where it appears with peculiar emphasis and, as it were, with a grating dissonance. It is to be observed, however, that in the whole of this first part, only those sorrows which God had sent upon His servant are spoken of; or rather, all sorrows which befall him are made to appear as Divine temptations. Hence the suppression of Jehovah's name till the very close; where at length it is announced, that it may be more dreadfully apparent whom it was that the Poet was on the point of renouncing.

PRELIMINARY NOTE.

The following general remarks on this section are to be observed. 1. It contains a description of the personal sorrows of one prominent man. This man was distinguished by his position as well as by his sufferings. The former is evident from ver. 14, where it is said he had become a derision to all the people; this could only happen to one who stood out conspicuously before the eyes of all the people. The second appears from the fact, that he is described as one burdened with sorrows more than all other persons (vers. 1-3). 2. We must recognize in the man thus made conspicuous the prophet Jeremiah. For not only the description beginning at ver. 52, undoubtedly refers to what befell this prophet as related in Jer. xxxviii., but also, before that passage occurs, ver. 14 plainly indicates this prophet (see the exposition). There is then no doubt that this Song is put into the mouth of the prophet Jeremiah. 3. As in chapter second, in the first nine verses, the destruction of Jerusalem is described as the act of God, so in this chapter the Poet ascribes all his sorrows to God as their author. He represents them as divine temptations. There is only this difference, that whilst in chap. ii., the name of God is frequently mentioned יְהוָה, אֱלֹהִים, vers. 1, 2, 5, 6, 7, 8), in chap. iii. God is spoken of in vers. 1-16, only indefinitely in the third person, in ver. 17 He is first addressed in the second person, and in ver. 18 He is at last distinctly mentioned by name (יְהוָה). This is evidently a designed climax. I do not think with ENGELHARDT (p. 85), that a tender conscience prevented the Poet from indicating the Lord, explicitly by name, as the author of his profound mental agitation; for what he did in chapter second, and repeats in ver. 18 of this chapter, he could have done in vers. 1-16. But this making the name of God prominent in the last verse, at the culmination point of the description of his sufferings, is due to the art of the Poet, of which this Song affords striking evidence.

III. 1-3.

1, 2 I am the man that hath seen affliction by the rod of His wrath. He hath led 3 me and brought me into darkness, but not into light. Surely against me is he turned; he turneth his hand against me all the day.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 1.—נָכַר not infrequent in Jer., xvii. 5, 7; xxii. 30; xxiii. 9, etc. In Lamentations in this chapter only, and here four times, vers. 1, 27, 35, 39.—Jeremiah never uses אָנִי see i. 13. The choice of the word here seems due to similarity of sound with אָנִי, comp. Ps. lxxxviii. 16.—שָׁכַח in Jeremiah only in the two critically suspected places, x. 16; xv. 19, where שָׁכַח נַחֲלָתוֹ is found. This exact phrase שָׁכַח עֲבֵרָתוֹ is found (as has not been before remarked, that I know of) in Prov. xxii. 8, in that part of the Proverbs, too, which is acknowledged to be the oldest and which extends from x. 1 to xxii. 16. The expression there is used in the sense of being blamed by men; here, the suffix refers to it God.—עָבַרְתָּ, see ii. 2.

Ver. 2.—נָהַן not in Jeremiah in any form.—Hiph. הוֹלִיךְ Jeremiah often uses, ii. 16, 17; xxxi. 9; xxxii. 5.—The substantive חֹשֶׁךְ never in Jeremiah. He seldom expresses this general thought, and when he does, he uses other words; נֶשֶׁךְ, עֲרֵפֶל, צֹלְמוֹת, xiii. 16, 17; ii. 6. אַפְרָה, xxiii. 12. כְּאֶפְרָיִם, ii. 31. [If he preferred here a word he never used before, euphony alone would suggest it to him. It happens, however, that of the five words in his prophecies above cited, four of them he uses only once, and the fifth, צֹלְמוֹת, only twice; and one of the five, כְּאֶפְרָיִם, is not found elsewhere in the Bible. Where such variety of terms are used to express the same idea, the introduction of another new one may be deemed as characteristic of the author. At least this word חֹשֶׁךְ, affords no evidence against Jeremiah's authorship of Lamentations.—W. H. H., see ii. 1, 2, 14, 17; iii. 7, 49; iv. 6.—With respect to the Acc. loci, see ii. 21.

Ver. 3.—יִשְׁכַּח הַפֶּךְ יָדוֹ. In regard to the peculiar idiom by which an adverbial idea is expressed by a finite verb, see my Gr., § 25, g. n. [Also GREEN'S Gr., § 269.] In Jer. xviii. 4, שָׁכַח occurs in a similar construction [see marginal reading in E. V.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Ver. 1. I am the man.—[The references to the personal experiences of the prophet Jeremiah in this chapter are too evident to be disputed. That these words were the words of Jeremiah himself must be the opinion of all who read this chapter unprejudiced by a theory to the contrary (see Introduction). But we are not to regard him as speaking here as a private person. He speaks as the Prophet of Jehovah raised up at that particular juncture, to stand between the people and their covenant God, to reveal His will to them and to present their interest to God at the throne of grace, for these were the twofold functions of the prophet's office. The Prophet therefore was a representative man. He stood for the people. He suffered for the people. He spoke for the people. Hence in this Song Jeremiah easily passes from the singular to the plural forms of speech, from I and me, to we and us. [GERLACH: "The supposition that in this chapter the personal sufferings of the Prophet are the subject of his Lamentation (MICHAELIS, PAREAU, MAURER, KALKAR, BLEEK in his Introduction), cannot be certainly proved, either from ver. 14 (see Comm. on that ver.), nor from the description contained in 53-55, where the possibility of a figurative sense cannot be denied. In opposition to this opinion are the following arguments. 1. From the fact that we imperceptibly takes the place of I in ver. 22 and vers. 40-47, we may conclude that in the rest of the chapter also, the prophet does not speak only in his own name and of his own person. 2. Unless we would destroy the whole connection of the chapter, we must allow that the calamity, recognized in vers. 42, 43, as the punishment of the sins of the people (we have sinned), is the same calamity which is described in vers. 1-18 with reference to the experience of a single individual—an opinion, which, by manifold agreements between the two sections, is shown to be correct. 3. The lamentation of the Prophet over his own past suffering, in the actual presence of a great national calamity, would be no less improbable, than the position of this chapter, in the middle of four others lamenting the national calamity, would in that case be inappropriate. The Lamentation of this chapter is then correctly understood only, when it is regarded as a lamentation of every one of the individual pious Israelites, as a lamentation which, while proceeding from self-experienced mental sufferings, has its truth, nevertheless, for all pious Israelites, in whose name the Prophet speaks. This was perceived by ABEN EZRA, when he designated the individual Israelites as the subject lamenting, and in this most modern interpreters (ROSENMUELLER, EWALD, THENIUS, NEUMANN, VAHINGER) agree."—W. H. H.]—That hath seen affliction—who saw misery, i. e., experienced it. RASCHI is of the opinion that the verb here expresses the idea of living to see the fulfilment of the destruction predicted, which would suit Jeremiah alone. But in that case it would at least have been necessary to say (לִי) the affliction, or misery. The verb may have the sense, in a general way, of experiencing or living to see, as frequently (see Jer. v. 12; Ps. xvi. 10; xlix. 10; Eccl. viii. 16; ix. 9). But the distinction between prophecy and fulfilment is too feebly indicated, to admit of RASCHI's interpretation. The Poet has rather in view the distinction between higher and comparatively inferior degrees of suffering. He would simply say that he had suffered more than all other persons. Besides, man (אִישׁ) would be too indefinite.

We would expect seer (נָחֵם), or prophet (נָבִיא): [I am the prophet, or seer, who has lived to see the fulfilment of my own predictions.]—By the rod of his wrath.—The expression can only mean, that the Poet had seen misery in consequence of God's using the rod of His wrath. Compare Is. x. 5, where the Lord calls the Assyrian the rod of My anger, and Job ix. 34; xxi. 9, where the rod of God is spoken of in a general way. [CALVIN: "At the very beginning he acknowledges that whatever he suffered had been inflicted by God's hand . . . there is included in the word wrath a brief confession, especially when it is added by the rod, or staff."]

Ver. 2. He hath led me and brought me—He led and brought me—into darkness but (or, and) not into light.—The metaphor, [of light and darkness for prosperity and adversity] is found in Am. v. 18, 20; Job xii. 25, expressed in the same Hebrew phrase.

Ver. 3. Surely against me.—The threefold prominence given to the person speaking, by the repetition of the personal pronoun three times in the beginning of the Song, is not without a reason. These introductory verses thus acquire a thematic character, i. e., it is thus indicated that the speaker intends to make his own person especially a theme of discourse. His justification in this is, that he can with good reason assume to himself the personality punished to the greatest degree by sufferings of every sort. While he was this, he was also at the same time a leader, as it were, of all punished in the same way, therefore the representative of a whole class of sufferers, —of the Israel, hated by men but beloved of God, of the Ἰσραὴλ κατὰ πνεῦμα—the spiritual Israel. This explanation would not stand, if we were to understand the whole people as indicated by the man in ver. 1. That the whole people are not so designated by the man, will be seen further on. For the present, the expression itself, the man, furnishes an argument against it: for throughout the book Zion is always spoken of as a female. See his strongholds, ii. 5, where only the masculine pronoun is used in reference to Zion, and there only because the words are a quotation. [Probably the pronoun there refers to God, not to Zion. See the Notes.—W. H. H.]—Is he turned; he turneth his hand against me all the day.—turned he his hand always again the whole day. [He turns His hand again and again the whole day long. The Hebrew is very idiomatic. The true construction is explained by the grammatical note of NAEGELSBACH above, referring to the use of a verb in an adverbial sense. The best grammarians and Versions agree in this construction. Our English Version is obviously wrong, not only because it translates both verbs transitively, but because it translates them in different tenses and is obliged to supply the words against me in the last clause. The verbs are both future and ought to be taken in the sense of the historical imperfect, because the Prophet would express the constant repetition of God's strokes, or else as a present tense, because the prophet is referring to sufferings not yet at an end.—W. H. H.] All the day.—See i. 18; iii. 14, 62. [He smote me and continues smiting me again and again, all the day long.—W. H. H.]

III. 4-9.

4, 5 My flesh and my skin hath he made old: he hath broken my bones. He hath 6 builded against me, and compassed me with gall and travail. He hath set me in 7 dark places, as they that be dead of old. He hath hedged me about, that I cannot 8 get out: he hath made my chain heavy. Also, when I cry and shout, he shutteth 9 out my prayer. He hath inclosed my ways with hewn stone: he hath made my paths crooked.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 4.—Jeremiah uses בָּשָׂר often, vii. 21; xli. 12, etc.; עוֹר, once, xlii. 23. The two words occur in connection, especially in Leviticus, xlii. 2-4; xi. 38, 39. Comp. besides Job xix. 20, Prov. v. 11; Lam. iv. 8; v. 10.

Ver. 5.—וַיִּקְרַח involves, like שָׁנַב, ver. 3, an adverbial relation to the principal verb, see ver. 3. [There is no necessity for this construction here, nor are the verbs so nearly synonymous as to render this construction likely. It is better to take the two verbs as having the same relation to עָלִי, and the same subjective accusative in וַתֵּלֶאֱחָזֵק.]

גִּשְׁמִיּוֹת: "God hath builded against me, obstructed me, shut up my way on every side so that I cannot get out."—W. H. H.] הִקְיָה, elsewhere frequently in the sense circuire, circumdare (see Jos. vi. 3; Ps. xvii. 9; xlviii. 13, etc.), means also circumponere, and that which is placed around in the accusative by itself. So also Job xix. 6. The word is not found in Jeremiah. רָאֵשׁ (in Jeremiah only in the connection כִּי רָאֵשׁ, viii. 14; ix. 14; xxxiii. 15) is of uncertain derivation, but indicates undoubtedly poison (see Deut. xxix. 17; xxxii. 32, 33; Lam. iii. 19). The word connected with it, וַתֵּלֶאֱחָזֵק, does not occur in Jeremiah, although he used the verb לָאָחַז, comparatively speaking, frequently, vi. 11; ix. 4; xli. 5; xv. 6; xx.

3. The meaning is difficulty, labor, Ex. xviii. 8; Num. xx. 14; Neh. ix. 32; Mal. i. 13.

Ver. 6.—בְּחֹשֶׁבַּיִם, not in Jeremiah.—הוֹשִׁיבִי, Jer. xxxii. 37. [This word does not imply the posture of sitting, as HENDERSON imagines, when he says the language may refer "to an ancient custom of placing the dead bodies in a sitting posture in the sepulchres."—W. H. H.]

Ver. 7.—וַיִּקְרַח, Jeremiah never uses. [Observe, this is an initial word. See Intr., Add. Rem. (6), p. 31.—W. H. H.] וַיֵּלֶאֱחָזֵק is found in Ps. lxxxviii. 9, word for word. For the construction [of וַיֵּלֶאֱחָזֵק with the future, that I could not go forth] see my Gr., § 89, 3 b, 2; § 109, 3.—וַיִּקְרַח is, to say the least, foreign to Jeremiah's style. Comp. 1 Kings xii. 10, 14.—וַיִּקְרַח, in the sense of a fetter, only here; elsewhere וַיִּקְרַח, Jer. xxxix. 7; lli. 11, etc.

Ver. 8.—וַיִּקְרַח, in the sense of crying to God, frequently with Jeremiah, for example xi. 11, 12; xx. 8; xxv. 34.—The verb וַיִּקְרַח (see Ps. lxxxviii. 14) used only in Piel, does not occur in Jeremiah; he uses only the substantive derived from it וַיִּקְרַח, which also occurs in our chapter, ver. 56.—The verb וַיִּקְרַח, thus written, occurs only here. It is merely a scribal variety of וַיִּקְרַח; see וַיִּקְרַח li. 6. Jeremiah uses neither. The sense is obstruere (of wells, Gen. xxvi. 15, 18; 2 Kings iii. 19, 25), occludere, recludere (of prophetic mysteries, Dan. vii. 26; iv. 9). [MICHAELIS, ROSENKÜLLER, GELACH: Obstruxit precibus meis viam qua pervenire ad suas aures possint.]

Ver. 9.—וַיִּקְרַח, not in Jeremiah. May there not be an allusion to stones with which the grave is built up? וַיִּקְרַח in Jer. vi. 16; xviii. 15.—Piel וַיִּקְרַח occurs only in Is. xxiv. 1. Jeremiah uses Hiph. twice, וַיִּקְרַח, lli. 21, וַיִּקְרַח, ix. 4. That וַיִּקְרַח indicates the destruction of the vias munita, as THENIUS would have it, I do not believe. For in Is. xxiv. 1, וַיִּקְרַח signifies not evertere, but pervertere. [GELACH: "וַיִּקְרַח is not a carefully constructed causeway (THENIUS), which is rather the meaning of וַיִּקְרַח, but is rather the path worn by the steps of the traveller, then any small by-road (see Jer. xviii. 15, where וַיִּקְרַח is added epexegetically to וַיִּקְרַח)."]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

It may be observed here that the speaker, having in the introductory verses 1-3 designated himself, in general terms, as the man most severely punished, now proceeds to prove this in detail.

Ver. 4. He begins with direct personal sufferings in his flesh, skin and bones. My flesh and my skin hath he made old.—He wasted away my flesh and my skin. The verb rendered he made old, in the Kal, has an intransitive signification, atteri, consumi, to be wasted away by attrition, to be consumed, especially of garments (Deut. viii. 4; xxix. 5; comp. Is. i. 9; li. 6) and of the bodily faculties (Gen. xviii. 12): in the Piel, which is used here, it means atterere, to wear out by attrition [the verb means to rub], consumere, to consume, waste away; it is found in this sense, besides here, in Ps. xlix. 15; Job xxi. 13; Is. lxxv. 22; 1 Chron. xvii. 19.—He hath broken my bones. He broke (see ii. 9) my bones [HENDERSON: Broke in pieces]. The same phrase occurs in Is. xxxviii. 13. See Ps. li. 10; Job xxx. 17, and the declaration of the contrary in Ps. xxxiv. 21. [The breaking of the bones indicate, not only the loss of physical strength, but a condition of great suffering. "The bones are often represented in the Scriptures as the seat of acute pain" (BARNES.) Job xx. 11; xxx. 17; Ps. vi. 2; xxii. 14; xxxi. 10; xxxviii. 8; xlii. 10; Prov. xiv. 30. We can only take the phrase here in the metaphorical sense. He was suffering both physical weakness and physical pain.—W. H. H.]

Ver. 5. Now follow the hindrances which have been raised against him from without. And first he says, he had been built around with poison and trouble.—He hath builded against me and compassed me with gall and travail. He built up against me and round about me poison and difficulty. [He built around me, and encompassed [me] with bitterness and distress.—W. H. H.] The image of a beleaguered city lies at the foundation of the thought here. But we are not, with the older commentators, to supply wall (כְּצֹר), or some similar word after the verb built, but rather are to take gall and travail [poison and difficulty] as the object of that verb. The connection of words and thoughts here is singular, and has not up to the present time been sufficiently elucidated. Perhaps the Poet would say that the Lord had surrounded him, not only with hardships of every sort, but with adversities in themselves ruinous. It is however possible that in the word poison, שָׁרָר, the idea of bitterness (see Ps. lxi. 22) may predominate. Any way a sudden transition, from a figurative to a literal style of speaking, is effected. [There is perhaps no more difficulty here than is created by an attempt to reduce a metaphorical expression to the terms of a literal and actual fact. To enclose and encompass one with bitterness and trouble or distress (using the abstract for the concrete, i. e., with circumstances causing bitterness and distress), as if these were obstructing walls, is undoubtedly the sense of our text, and is adopted by most of the versions and commentators.—W. H. H.]

[The SEPT., the TARG. and the ARAB. (not the VULG. as BLAYNEY says), render שָׁרָר, as if it were שָׁרָר, my head. But these and all the ancient versions translate the same word in ver. 19, by gall. The SEPT. also translates שָׁרָר as a verb, ἐμύχθησεν. BLAYNEY adopts these readings of the SEPT., but instead of elucidating the meaning, confuses it still more by a new translation of the first clause: “He hath built upon me, and encompassed my head, so that it is weary.” HENDERSON adopts partially the SEPT. translation, but discovers a new and doubtful meaning for the second verb, חָרַר, He hath builded against me and struck me on the head, and it is distressed. FUEBER proposes (See his Lex. under the word

חָרַר) to carry out the military idea suggested by the verbs, thus; He has surrounded me with fortifications and a trench. But it is hardly necessary to accept the new and unauthorized derivations of these words, when their frequent use gives us a sense, that is, indeed, metaphorical, but none the less clear and expressive, and sustained so generally by the Versions, old and new.—W. H. H.]

Ver. 6. To the obstructions of the way are added the obstructions of light. This whole verse is reproduced word for word in Ps. cxliii. 3.—He hath set me in dark places. He caused me to dwell in darkness.—As they that be dead of old.—As the dead of olden time. Ps. lxxxviii. 5-7 and 11-18, afford the best commentary on this. There are those dead before the appointed time, whom the Lord remembers no more, and to whom He shows no more the wonders of His grace. The expression is found only here and in Ps. cxliii. 3. [We may translate it either the dead of old, or the forever dead. BLAYNEY: “God had involved him in such a depth of distress, that he was as incapable of extricating himself, as those who had laid long in the dark mansions of the dead were of making their escape thence.” GERLACH: “He is thrust into the darkness of the grave (Ps. lxxxviii. 5, 6), or of Sheol (Ps. lxxxviii. 7; Job x. 21, 22)—as an image of distress, Ps. xxx. 4; lxxxviii.—like the dead of eternity, the forever dead (Vulg., mortui sempiterni).—Most commentators (MICHAELIS, ROSENUELLER, MAURER, DE WETTE, EWALD, THENIUS, NEUMANN, BÖTTCHER) explain, the dead of old—those a long time dead; but whether dead a long or a short time makes no difference, and this, as CONZ has correctly remarked, ‘would occasion an absurd ambiguity, as if the dead, who have been but a little while dead and buried, might not lie in darkness.’ The CHAL.: Mortui qui cadunt in alterum seculum (mundum).”—W. H. H.]

Ver. 7. A climax! Not only has the Lord surrounded him with obstacles and deprived him of light, but He has also taken away his freedom. He is imprisoned and fettered! He hath hedged me about, that I cannot get out. He hedged me in that I could not get out [or, that I should not escape, or go forth.—The very words of Christ in the passion psalm, lxxxviii. 9 (WORDSWORTH)]. He hath made my chain heavy,—He made heavy my chain, or fetter.

Ver. 8. The Lord accepts none of the sufferer's prayers. He hears him not. [HENDERSON: “The prophet places himself in the position of a prisoner, who is securely immured, and to whose supplications for deliverance, how earnestly soever they may be made, no attention is paid.”] Also when I cry and shout, he shutteth out my prayer. Also though I cry and call for help, my prayer has he barred or bolted. [The idea is, hindered or obstructed. He has taken means, by anticipation, to prevent my prayer for help from being heard, either by Himself, or by any other who might possibly come to the rescue. The change from the future tenses, to the preterite tense, seems to indicate this meaning.—W. H. H.] The sense cannot be that the Lord prevented the prayer from going out of the man's heart, for in fact he cried (see ROSENUELLER in loc.), but that He shut up the way of access to His own ear and heart. Comp. ver. 44; Prov. i. 28. [WORDSWORTH: “So the suffering Messiah says, Ps. xxii. 2, “O my God, I cry in the daytime, but Thou hearest not.” GERLACH: “However loudly he prays, the Lord has closed His ear; ver. 44; Job xix. 8; Is. i. 15; Jer. vii. 16; Ps. xlviii. 42; Prov. i. 28.”]

Ver. 9. The right way is built up against the Poet, so that he seems compelled to false ways.—He hath inclosed—he hedged in [same word as in ver. 7]—my ways with hewn stones. If hewn, then large stones, for we do not build with small ones. Comp. Ex. xx. 25; 1 Kings v. 81; Is. ix. 9; Am. v. 11; Ezek. xl. 42.—He hath made—he made—my paths crooked. The Poet would say that he had been forced to crooked and false paths. See crooked ways, Ps. cxxv. 5; crooked things, Is. xlii. 16. [At the first glance this would seem to be a continuation of the figure contained in verses 7, 8. This impression is due to the repetition of the word חָרַר, hedged in, and to the climax implied by hewn stone. The idea, in that case, is, that having imprisoned him and loaded him with fetters and shut out his cry for help, God proceeds, as it were, to make his imprisonment permanent and secure, by building up around him a wall of hewn stone. If this is so, then the last clause cannot mean He made my paths crooked, for one in the situation described must remain an inactive, passive sufferer; but it would mean that God had made all paths of escape impassable. The principal avenues of escape (דִּרְכֵי) are built up with hewn stones, barriers that cannot be scaled. The smaller paths (נִתְּיבוֹתַי) are broken up, turned upside down, and thus rendered impassable. This is GERLACH'S view. It is better, however, to regard this verse as introducing a new metaphor, which is continued in ver. 10. "He next conceives of himself as a traveller whose way is blocked up by a solid wall, and who, being compelled to turn aside into the devious pathways of the forest, is exposed to the rapacity of wild beasts" (HENDERSON). This view is recommended by the following considerations. 1. The figure of an immured and fettered prisoner is already complete, and could receive no additional force from what is here said. 2. The repetition of the verb נָצַר, hedged in, which in ordinary cases would indicate a continuance of the same subject, is accounted for here by the necessity of a word with the same initial letter. 3. The expressions "my ways" and "my paths," favor this construction. They are his, because he is expected to pursue them. Were they simply the ways and paths of possible escape from the place of confinement, they would not, strictly speaking, be his at all, for he could not use them. 4. This explanation makes the next verse less abrupt, and produces a regular and beautiful succession of metaphorical pictures. 5. The idea of simply breaking up or turning over the by-paths, as expressed by the Hebrew verb עָלָה, does not correspond with the security against escape expressed by building up the main avenues of escape with hewn stone. 6. The common translation, He made my path crooked, best agrees with the force of the Hebrew verb, and is adopted with great unanimity by the Versions and commentators. OWEN: "The meaning is turned aside. He had built, as it were, a wall of hewn stones across his way, and thus He turned aside his goings or his paths, so that he was constrained to take some other course." WORDSWORTH: "Not only hath He blocked up my way with hewn stones, but He has turned my paths aside from their proper direction." So E. V., BROUGHTON, CALVIN, BLAYNEY, BOOTHBOYD, HENDERSON, and NOYES.—W. H. H.]

III. 10-18.

10, 11 He was unto me as a bear lying in wait, and as a lion in secret places. He 12 hath turned aside my ways, and pulled me in pieces: he hath made me desolate. He 13 hath bent his bow, and set me as a mark for the arrow. He hath caused the arrows 14 of his quiver to enter into my reins. I was a derision to all my people, and their 15 song all the day. He hath filled me with bitterness, he hath made me drunken 16 with wormwood. He hath also broken my teeth with gravel-stones, he hath covered 17 me with ashes. And thou hast removed my soul far off from peace: I forgot pros- 18 perity. And I said, My strength and my hope is perished from the LORD.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 10.—Jeremiah never mentions bears. [The need of an initial ד would naturally suggest the bear in connection with the lion. See Intr., Add. Rem. (6), p. 31.—W. H. H.]—Jeremiah uses אֶרֶב only once, in the phrase הָאֶרְבִּים יִנְּאֶרְבֵּם, li. 12.—יִנְּאֶרְבֵּם Jeremiah uses often, xlii. 17; xxiii. 24; xlix. 10.

Ver. 11.—פָּשַׁח, ἀφ. λεγόμεν. In the Aramaic it stands for פָּשַׁח in frustra dissecuit (Lev. i. 6, 12), for פָּשַׁח dilaniavit (Job xvi. 9), for פָּשַׁח dissecuit, פָּרַק fragit (1 Sam. xv. 33; Ps. vii. 3). See CHR. B. MICHAELIS in ROSENTHAL and Ges. Thes., p. 1153.—For relation of שִׁוּכִים to Jeremiah's style and use of language, see i. 4. שִׁוּכִים Jeremiah uses not infrequently, xii. 11; xlii. 16; xvii. 5, etc. [שִׁוּכִים would be suggested here as alliterative with preceding word.—W. H. H.]

Ver. 12.—הַצִּיָּב in Jer. v. 26; xxxi. 21—בֵּית־הַצִּיָּב, in the sense of custodia, a place of custody, frequently in Jeremiah, xxxii. 2, 12, etc. In the sense of a mark, only here, Job xvi. 12, and 1 Sam. xx. 20. See GEBEN. Thes., p. 511 s. v., חָץ. With regard to its Aramaic termination אֶרֶב (see יִנְּאֶרְבֵּם, iv. 1). See OLSH., § 38 f., 108 s. [GREEN'S Gr., § 196 d]. This is no evidence against Jeremiaic authorship, since, not only analogies occur in Jeremiah (see אֶרֶב, i. 11; שָׂא, xxlii. 39), but scattered examples occur also in older books. See OLSH. as above.—חָץ, Jer. ix. 7; i. 9, 14, etc.

Ver. 13.—Hiph. הִבִּיא often in Jeremiah, iii. 14; xx. 5; xxv. 9, 13, etc.—Jeremiah also uses אֶשְׁפָּה (v. 15), but בָּנִי אֶשְׁפָּה occurs only here. The arrow is called בֵּן־קֶשֶׁת in Job xii. 20. See בָּנִי־רֶשֶׁת, sons of flame, of lightning, by which many interpreters understand arrows, others sparks, and others birds. See also צֶהָר בָּנִי Zech. iv. 14; בֵּן־שֶׁכֶן Is. v. 1.

Ver. 14.—The words הִיִּיתִי לְשֹׁחֹק כֹּל־הַיּוֹם כֹּל־לַיְלָה are taken from Jer. xx. 7, where it is said, הִיִּיתִי לְשֹׁחֹק כֹּל־הַיּוֹם כֹּל־לַיְלָה. Jeremiah never uses. See Lam. iii. 63; v. 14.

Ver. 15.—Jeremiah uses Hiph. רָרַרְתִּי, v. 7.—כָּרַרְתִּי, besides here only in Ex. xii. 8; Num. ix. 11.—Hiph. רָרַרְתִּי Jer. xxxi. 25.—לִינָה, wormwood, absinthium, Jeremiah uses in ix. 14; xxiii. 15.

Ver. 16.—The verb נָפַשׁ, contundere, comminueret, is found besides here only in Ps. cxix. 20.—The verb נָפַשׁ occurs only here. It is in Hiph., and means obruil, cooperuit. [All the ancient Versions seem to have considered נָפַשׁ same as נָשַׁשׁ (BLAYNEY); but this meaning cannot be extracted from the fundamental sense of the root (see FÜRST). The Targ. rendered it laid low, which gives good sense, and is adopted by BLAYNEY, BOOTHROYD, OWEN and C. B. MICHAELIS. The Arabic, rolled me in the ashes, which is adopted by LUTHER, E. V. MARG., J. D. MICHAELIS and EWALD. The Syr, besprinkled, or covered, which is generally accepted as the correct meaning.—W. H. H.]—אָפַר In Jeremiah only in the kindred expression הִתְפַּלֵּשׁ בְּאָפַר, vi. 26; Comp. Ezek. xxvii. 30.

Ver. 17.—נָחַ Jeremiah never uses: see ii. 7.—נָשַׁח, Jer. xxiii. 39.—נָחַ frequently in Jeremiah, xiv. 11; xviii. 10, 20, etc.

Ver. 18.—נָחַ. See ver. 54; Jer. iii. 17, 19.—נָחַ. Only נָחַ occurs in Jeremiah, and that with reference to time, duration.—הִתְפַּלֵּשׁ, Jeremiah never uses: but see Prov. xi. 7; Ezek. xix. 5; xxxvii. 11.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Ver. 10. While in what precedes we were told how the sufferer was deprived of all means of escape, what follows describes the positive weapons of offence with which he was assaulted. [By regarding ver. 9 as in close connection with what precedes, the introduction of the bear and lion in ver. 10 is abrupt and irrelevant. A prisoner, closely immured, has nothing to fear from bears and lions lurking in their coverts. Connect ver. 9 with ver. 10, however, and the sense is apparent. A traveller, prevented by barricades and stone walls from pursuing the way he would go, is compelled to follow crooked paths environed with danger of encountering lurking wild beasts. See notes on ver. 9.—W. H. H.]—He was unto me as a bear lying in wait, and as a lion in secret places. A lurking bear was he to me,—a lion in ambush. The image of a bear lying in wait occurs only here. See, however, Hos. xiii. 7, 8; Am. v. 19; Prov. xxviii. 15. The figure of a lion lying in wait occurs in Jeremiah xlix. 19; i. 14; comp. ii. 30; iv. 7; v. 6; xii. 8. Elsewhere, see Ps. x. 9; xvii. 12.

Ver. 11. Bears or lions, when they attack a flock, spring upon them, tear the sheep in pieces and leave those they do not eat weltering alone in their blood. This last has happened to the Poet. He hath turned aside my ways—he drove me aside. He hath made my ways turn aside [lit.], that is to say, He drives me from the right, direct way. And pulled me in pieces, he hath made me desolate. He tore me in pieces and cast me away lonely and miserable. Should we translate, He tore me to pieces, mutilated me, and understand this to mean that the wild beast had eaten his victim, then this would not suit the other figures used in the text. On this account, we must understand this tearing in pieces only in the sense of discerpere, of mangling, lacerating. So EWALD, mich zerrupfend. The Poet would say that the beast of prey had seized one of the scattered flock, had throttled it and left it for dead, lying alone in its misery. For we must carefully observe the two ideas expressed here in the last Hebrew word, שָׁמַם, that of desolation, destruction (see i. 4, 13, 16), and that of solitariness, loneliness (Is. liv. 1; 2 Sam. xiii. 20). [This word, שָׁמַם, may express any object of suffering forsaken of God and men, exciting, therefore, either pity or astonishment. See the use of the verb and its derivatives in ch. i.; Is. liv. 1; Job xvi. 7; xxi. 5; Ps. cxliii. 4. The fundamental signification of the root is to be motionless, filled with dread. This is the idea here. A solitary sheep, torn by the wild beast, lying alone in its suffering, and apparently dead. He made me desolate, or a desolation, may be a literal translation, but does not convey the sense which can only be done by inventing a phrase, as NÆGELSBACH has done. The idea is best condensed, perhaps, in the words, He left me suffering and alone.—W. H. H.]

סָרַר cannot be taken here in the sense it always has elsewhere, refractorius, rebellis. The word in this sense is Part. Kal. of סָרַר, and occurs only in Hos. iv. 16. Here it can only be, either Pilel of סָרַר [so DAVIDSON], or Poel of סָרַר (OLSH. § 254). It is, in either case, a verbal form, occurring nowhere except here, and meaning He made my ways turn aside, that is to say, he drove me from the right, direct way. THEODORE lays too much stress on the word, when he translates, He has dragged me aside. [The idea is, He causes me to diverge from the way, to escape the lurking beast; but in vain, for he springs upon me, rends me, and leaves me weltering in blood. BLAYNEY gives us an original translation of his own. "He hath turned full upon me." סָרַר is applied, Hos. iv. 16, to a refractory heifer, that turns aside, and will not go forward in the straight track, as she is directed. Here it is to be understood of a bear or lion turning aside toward a traveller, to fall upon him in his way." GERLACH understands the word here to signify turning back, instead of turning aside, that is, arresting the fugitive and sending him back to prison. But neither the context, nor the signification of the word allow of this sense. JARCHI, according to GERLACH, regarded סָרַר, as a denominative from סָרַר, spinis opplevit vias meas. So HUGH BROUGHTON, My ways hath He made thorny.—W. H. H.]

Ver. 12. In a new figure the Poet describes the Lord as an archer, who has made him his mark. [HENDERSON: "The idea of a hunter was naturally suggested by the circumstances just referred to. This is beautifully expressed in language borrowed from such employment."] He hath bent—He bent—his bow.—See. ii. 4

And set me as a—the—mark for the arrow. The second half of the verse seems to be an imitation of Job xvi. 12.

Ver. 18. Continuation of the figure employed in ver. 12. He hath caused the arrows of his quiver to enter into my reins.—He shot into my reins the sons of his quiver. The Lord not only aims at the mark, He hits it, and that right in the centre. The reins are here regarded as the central organs, as frequently with Jeremiah (xi. 20; xii. 2; xvii. 10; xx. 12), not in a physical sense, however, but in a psychological sense, as appears from ver. 14. See DELITZSCH Psychologie, § 18, p. 268, 2d Edition.—The expression sons of the quiver, occurs only here. ROSEN-MUELLER quotes not inappropriately the pharetra gravis sagittis of HORACE (Ode l. 22, 23).

Ver. 14. It happens here that the Poet suddenly loses the figure. But it seems as if he would indicate by means of ver. 14, that by the arrows of which he spoke in ver. 13, he meant the arrows of derision. Jeremiah ix. 7 explicitly calls the deceitful tongue (לשון כרמה), a sharpened arrow (חץ שחוט). See ls. xlix. 2.—I was a derision to all my people.—I have become a laughing stock to all my people. Altogether unnecessarily many interpreters (even THENIUS and EWALD) take עַמִּי, my people, as a rare plural form for עַמִּים, peoples, nations (as, it is asserted, in 2 Sam. xxii. 44; Ps. cxliv. 2. See EWALD, § 177 a). This rests on the presumption that the subject of the Lamentation is not the Prophet, but the people of Israel. We have already above, at vers. 1-3, declared ourselves against this opinion, and will return to the question again below, at ver. 40 sqq. [HENDERSON; “Instead of עַמִּי my people, a considerable number of MSS. read עַמִּים, and four הָעַמִּים in the plural; but this reading, though supported by the Syr., seems less suitable than the former. There is no evidence that the Prophet was treated otherwise than with respect by foreigners. Instead of meeting with any consideration from his countrymen, fidelity in the discharge of his duty to whom had been the occasion of all his personal troubles, he was made the butt of their ridicule, and the theme of their satirical songs.” See Jer. xx. 7.] And their song all the day. [The conjunction and is not in the original, and is omitted by NÄGELSBACH.—W. H. H.] The expression, their song (שִׁירָם), is from Job xxx. 9; comp. xii. 4; Ps. lxi. 8-13.

Ver. 15. After the short interruption of ver. 14, the Poet returns to the figurative style of speaking. He exhausts, as it were, his stock of images, in order to depict the adversities which befell him. He must also receive them as meat and drink, and that too in copious measure, and he must be covered with them as with ashes. [SCOTT: Vers. 14-16. “In the midst of his other troubles, the prophet was derided and insulted by the people, over whose approaching calamities he so pathetically mourned; and they made him the subject of their profane songs, for which they were at length made a derision and a song to their enemies.. Thus the Lord filled him with bitterness and intoxicated him with the nauseous cup, of which he was made to drink, instead of the cordials that his case seemed to require: and instead of nourishing, palatable food, his bread was as it were mixed with gravel, which brake his teeth, and put him to great pain when he attempted to eat: and he was covered with ashes, as a constant mourner and penitent.”]—He hath filled me with bitterness (marg., bitternesses). He satiated me with bitterness. [The Hebrew verb is used to denote satiety after eating, Deut. vi. 11; Hosea iv. 10. The connection seems to require this sense here. He was required to eat bitter things, or bitter herbs (see FUEBSTER'S Lex.), and drink wormwood till he was filled.—W. H. H.]—He hath made me drunken with wormwood.—He made me drunk with [or, made me drink to excess of] wormwood. See ver. 19.

Ver. 16. He hath also broken [lit. And he broke. Vers. 16-18 each, begin with and (or vav conversive) for the sake of the initial letter, which is translated here also. It can be omitted in translation altogether, though it may denote here an intimate connection between this verse and ver. 15, as between eating and drinking.—W. H. H.] My teeth with gravel stones.—He broke my teeth with pebbles. It is a matter of indifference whether we regard this as meaning bread mixed with stones, or stones instead of bread. He hath covered me with ashes.—He covered me with ashes. The ashes here seem to be intended as a symbol of mourning, as they are in the well-known usages of mourning. See 2 Sam. xiii. 19; Job ii. 8; Mic. i. 10.

לִפְּטָן, lapillus, a little stone, occurs besides here only in Prov. xx. 17 (Ps. lxxvii. 18). [Prov. xx. 17, “Bread of deceit is sweet to a man; but afterwards his mouth shall be filled with gravel.” seems to be an allusion to the grit that often is mixed with bread baked in ashes, and thus may explain this passage. BLAYNEY, BOOTHROYD, OWEN and HENDERSON, translate the word grit. HENDERSON's inelegant translation, He hath made my teeth cranch grit, and EWALD's er liess meine Zähne zermahlen Steine, is inconsistent with the use of the preposition בְּ, the presumptive power of the verb בָּרַץ (see GERLACH), and the apparent meaning of this passage especially when compared with Prov. xx. 17,—the pebbles were not broken by the teeth, but the teeth were broken by the pebbles.—A curious result of translating from a translation is exhibited in the VULG. The SEPT. having rendered this ἔξεβαλεν ψῆφον τοὺς ὀδόντας μου, the VULG., taking ψῆφος as calculus arithmeticus, translated Et fregit ad numerum (in full number, or by number, DOUAY “one by one”) dentes meos.—W. H. H.]

Vers. 17, 18. These verses constitute the conclusion and culmination point of the Lamentation. The speaker, dropping the metaphorical and adopting the literal style, utters a threefold declaration. 1. That the Lord had thrust him back, as it were, from the dominion of peace (שָׁלוֹם, peace, is to be taken in its broadest sense, see below). To this objective act, what follows corresponds as subjective. 2. That the speaker has been deprived of all happiness, even to the recollection of it. 3. That he—and this is the acme of his sorrow—regarded even his confidence and hope in Jehovah as destroyed.

Ver. 17. And thou hast removed my soul far off from peace.—Thou thrustest away my soul from peace. This is a quotation from Ps. lxxxviii. 15, which Psalm our Poet so often avails himself of. This explains why the Poet so suddenly addresses God in the second person. [WORDSWORTH: "By an affecting transition, the Prophet turns to the Almighty, whom he sees present, and addresses Him, Thou hast removed my soul far off from peace; adopting the language of another Passion Psalm (lxxxviii. 14-18)."]

Peace (שָׁלוֹם) is happiness in the widest sense, as often, and stands in parallelism with good (טוֹבָה). See Jer. viii. 15; xiv. 9, "We looked for peace, but no good came." I forgot prosperity (מַגֵּן, good).—I forgot good. The speaker has been deprived of all happiness, even to the recollection of it. [LOWTH: "So Joseph speaking of the seven years of famine saith that 'plenty shall be forgotten in the land of Egypt.'"]

Many old translators take נַפְשִׁי as the subject of הוֹנֵחַ. JEROME: Expulsa est a pace anima mea. VENET. GR.: 'Ἀντὶς τοῦ ἁπ' εὐφροσύνης ἣ ἐμὴ ψυχῆ. SYRIAC: data est oblivioni a pace anima mea. [CALVIN: Et remota fuit a pace anima mea. BROUGHTON: and my soul is cast off from peace.] But these translations evidently proceed from philological ignorance. For נַפְשִׁי is never used intransitively (not even in Hos. viii. 5). These translators seem also to have stumbled at the fact that here suddenly God is addressed in the second person. Among the moderns also, THENIUS and EWALD take נַפְשִׁי as the subject. But they take הוֹנֵחַ likewise in a sense it never has, namely, of loathing. THENIUS translates, so that I loathe happiness. EWALD: Happiness has become loathsome to me. To this we object, because no one ever feels a loathing of happiness,—nor is שָׁלוֹם equivalent to life, in which case it might indicate a satiety or weariness of life, but שָׁלוֹם is the enjoyment of life. They have overlooked the fact that this passage is a quotation from Ps. lxxxviii. 15, of which our Poet so often avails himself. There it is said יְהוָה הוֹנֵחַ נַפְשִׁי. This explains why the Poet so suddenly addresses God in the second person, and determines the meaning of הוֹנֵחַ, which can only be, as everywhere else, rejicere, repellere. That הוֹנֵחַ is construed with כֵּן (as elsewhere only once, in Hiphil, 2 Chron. xi. 14) need not surprise us, for there is nothing in the word itself that would make this construction appear as unauthorized or even strange. [GERLACH, while rejecting the opinions of THENIUS and EWALD, adopts the idea of the old translators, Und es ward verstossen vom Frieden meine Seele, and strangely appeals to 2 Chron. xi. 14, to justify the intransitive use of the verb.—W. H. H.]

Ver. 18. And I said, My strength and my hope is perished from the Lord.—Over and gone from Jehovah is my confidence and hope. [BROUGHTON: And I thought in myself, my state is undone and my hope from the Eternal. HENDERSON: And I said, My confidence is perished, and my hope from Jehovah. Not only had all present enjoyment been annihilated, but all prospect of future prosperity had been cut off."] The Poet here represents the sum total, as it were, of his punishment, the separate details, which he has been narrating, beginning at ver. 1, being regarded as the several items of a sum in arithmetic. The result is an alarming one. His confidence and his hope in the Lord had been almost destroyed by the unintermitted blows of the rod of wrath (vers. 1-3). But they had not been actually destroyed. This we learn from the expression, and I said, נִאֲמַר. Without this word ver. 18 would have a much more equivocal sense. But this indicates that the Poet would represent the loss of his confidence, not as an actual fact (else he would have said נִאֲמַר), but as merely an anticipatory thought. He said, i. e., he thought so to himself, as in Jer. iii. 7, נִאֲמַר represents merely a speaking to one's self, i. e., a thought, a feeling. [See instances of this use of the expression in Gen. xxvi. 9; 1 Sam. xx. 8; 2 Sam. xxi. 16; 1 Kings viii. 12, etc.—W. H. H.] That he had not actually lost his confidence is, finally, most apparent from what follows, where the Poet, with all his soul's energy, refastens the bond of confidence that had threatened to break. [HENRY: "Without doubt it was his infirmity to say thus, Ps. lxxvii. 10, for with God there is everlasting strength, and He is His people's never failing hope, whatever they may think."] נִאֲמַר followed by כֵּן, has different senses. This כֵּן often indicates the person or place suffering the loss; נִאֲמַר כֵּן הָיָה; Ps. cxlii. 5; comp. Job xi. 20; xviii. 17; Jer. xviii. 18; xxv. 35; xlix. 7, 38, etc. It can be taken thus here. For the thought that Jehovah has lost the confidence of the Poet, can be expressed in the form here used. Yet it is well to observe here that the words cannot be translated, my confidence and my hope in Jehovah are lost [as NOYES does]. For the object of confidence is always indicated by הוֹנֵחַ, or, as especially after הוֹנֵחַ, Ps. xxxix. 8, by ל. But the sense is, my confidence is perished away from Jehovah, it has lost its direction towards Him. It is a constructio prægans: my confidence is turned away from God, and thus has become destroyed. כֵּן could also be taken with reference to the efficient cause. See יִאֲבֹד כִּנְסַחַם אֱלֹהֵי יִאֲבֹד, Job iv. 9; Ps. lxxx. 17. [So BLAYNEY and BOOTHROYD: Jehovah hath caused my strength and my hope to fail.] Yet, if כֵּן had only this sense, and not at the same time the local sense of away from, we would rather expect כִּפְנֵי, as we read Ps. lxxviii. 8, אֲבִירֵי רָשָׁעִים כִּפְנֵי אֱלֹהִים, נָצַח. That this root contains the ideas of splendor, strength and endurance, is certain. Which is its original meaning is disputed. Here, as in 1 Sam. v. 23, the idea seems to be strength with the modification of perseverance, persevering steadfastness and confidence. At least this best suits the intimately connected word הוֹנֵחַ.

 THOU—hast not pardoned.

ANALYSIS.

In the second part, vers. 19-42, the Poet rises out of the night of sorrow into the clear day of comfort and hope; yet he allows, as it were, a morning dawn to precede, and an evening twilight to follow this day. Vers. 19-21 contain a transition. The Poet can again pray! He prays the Lord to be once more mindful of him, vers. 19, 20; and on his own part he sets about to seek for grounds of comfort, ver. 21. These he finds, first of all, in the fact that Israel is not completely destroyed, that there is yet a remnant, as a starting point for a return to the better fortune which is now at hand. This fact is due to the grace and mercy of God, the continuation of which the Poet recognizes with the deepest joy, vers. 22-24. From this point of view, afforded by the Divine mercy, the Poet now looks upon his sorrows:—the Lord even when He smites, always means it for good, vers. 25-27;—if it be borne patiently, with silent submission, vers. 28-30,—then the rays of Divine compassion will again appear, vers. 31-33. Viewed from this stand-point, every sorrow, even that inflicted upon us by human malignity, seems a wholesome divine ordinance,—so that not the sorrow itself, but only the sin that caused it, is to be deplored, vers. 34-39. Such a lamentation for sin, the cause of the affliction suffered, the Poet now begins, not in his own name, but in that of all the people, vers. 40-42. And as he had skilfully introduced this lamentation by the self-accusation in ver. 39, so these three verses, 40-42, serve him as a means of transition to a new lamentation over the misfortunes that had befallen the nation. With the words לֹא כָלָתָה, Thou hast not pardoned, ver. 42, he turns to the description of the common misfortune.

PRELIMINARY NOTE.

In this eminently consolatory passage, vers. 19-42, with its introduction, vers. 19-21, and conclusion, vers. 40-42, every triad of verses constitutes, as regards sense, a complete whole. The effect of similarity of construction is further heightened in vers. 25-39, by the fact that the triplets of each verse begin, not only with the same initial letter, but with the same word, or with similar words. Thus vers. 25-27 begin with טֹב, vers. 28-30 with the Imperfects יִשָּׁב יִתֵּן יִשָּׁב. Vers. 31-33 with וְ, vers. 34-36 with ל before an Infinitive, and vers. 37-39 are interrogative sentences. It should also be observed that from ver. 22 the Poet no longer speaks in the first person singular. It is as if he felt the necessity, at this culmination point of the Poem, of letting the individual step back behind the sublime and universal truth which he pronounces.

III. 19-21.

19 Remembering mine affliction and my misery, the wormwood and the gall.
20, 21 My soul hath them still in remembrance, and is humble in me. This I recall to my mind, therefore have I hope.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 19.—עָנִי. See remarks i. 3.—וְכָרַדְנִי, see i. 7. [GERLACH translates it expulsion, exile, verstossung. BLAYSEY, BOOTHROYD, OBERLIN: abatement. PENDERSON: persecution. BROUGHTON: recreation.]—יָרַדְנִי, see ver. 15.—רָאֵשׁ, see ver. 5.

Ver. 20.—לִבִּי occurs, except here, only in Ps. xlv. 26; Prov. ii. 18. The root לִב is nowhere found.—תִּשְׁיֶה. To take י in the sense of prol (ROSENMUELLER, VAHINGER, ENGELHARDT), is an arbitrary rendering that receives no support from the reference to Gen. xxx. 27.

Ver. 21.—The expression לִבִּי אֶל-לֵב, to take something to heart, is never found in Jeremiah: see Deut. iv. 36; Isa. xlv. 19; xlv. 8; 1 Kings viii. 47.—אֶחָדִי. See Jer. iv. 19. The anomalous form there found, אֶחָדִי, is traced back to חָדָל, but חָדָל in no form occurs in Jeremiah; therefore here again a difference in the use of language is apparent. Forms of חָדָל occur in Lamentations only in this chapter, namely, verb forms in vers. 21, 24, noun forms in vers. 18, 26. [If Jeremiah could coin an entirely new word in his prophecies and use it only once, we might allow him to introduce into the Lamentations words already coined and familiar to him in other Scriptures, even if he confine this use to one place or one chapter.—W. H. H.]—עַל-כֵּן has its usual signification, therefore, for that reason.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

The artistic management of the composition should be here observed. The whole preceding recital from ver. 1, constitutes a crescendo movement, which ends in ver. 18 with a shrill dissonance, enhanced by the fact that it closes with the name of Jehovah, here mentioned for the first time. But this dissonance, after ver. 21, is lost in the most agreeable harmony. The three intervening verses, 19-21, constitute the transition from discord to harmony.

Vers. 19, 20. As if shocked that so terrible a thought could come into his mind, the Poet rouses himself up and directs a cry of anguish from the depths of his heart to the Lord, that He would not forget and reject him, but would graciously remember him. [GERLACH: "The prophet is certain, that if God will only be rightly mindful of the misery poured out over him, His pity must be excited (VAH.), and this certainly is immediately expressed with assurance in ver. 20."]

Ver. 19. Remembering mine affliction and my misery, the wormwood and the gall.—Remember [so E. V., margin, all the English versions except BLAYNEY, the TARG., VULG., and SYR.] my affliction and my wanderings (see i. 7), wormwood and gall! The Poet thus represents to the Lord the most striking features of his sufferings as depicted in the preceding verses. [The repetition of the three emphatic words, in which the idea of misery is condensed, 'עָנִי affliction or misery, ver. 1, לְעֵנָה wormwood, ver. 15, גָּל וּרְגֵל gall or bitterness, ver. 15, shows that this verse is a brief and emphatic recapitulation of the whole preceding description. But with all these in view, the Prophet rejects the thought he was tempted to indulge, as expressed in ver. 18, and "does not let go his hold on the God of his life; but is convinced that if He will only regard him, all will be well" (HENDERSON).—W. H. H.]

Many interpreters stumble at the fact that the Poet, immediately after the cry of despair in ver. 18, should again address a prayer to יהוה. Many, therefore, (BÖTTCHER, THENIUS) take זָכַר and הִזְכִּיר, ver. 20, as the subject of a hypothetical proposition, Remember my misery . . . yea, my soul remembers it and humbles itself in me. [E. V.: Remembering mine affliction . . . My soul hath them still in remembrance and is humbled in me.] But to take the Inf. Constr. זָכַר in a finite sense, is altogether ungrammatical and without precedent. EWALD, indeed, takes זָכַר as an Imperative, but as an address "to the first best hearer." He also takes הִזְכִּיר, ver. 20, for the third person feminine, My soul, holds up before itself [remembers with self-reproach], it humbles itself in me. It seems to me that all these interpreters exaggerate the suddenness of the transition from the cry of ver. 18 to the prayer of ver. 19, and do not rightly apprehend it. They overlook the softening effect of אֲמַר, and I said [i. e., to myself], and they fail to observe that the prayer immediately following in ver. 19, plainly shows that the language of ver. 18 was the expression of a rash but conquered moment of despair. Thus the Poet, by the fact that he can again pray in this way, plainly gives us to understand that his despair had secured no strong foot-hold in his breast. Some regard הִזְכִּיר, ver. 20, as the second person masculine indeed, but in the Indicative sense,—truly thou thinkest thereon,—indicating the hearing of the prayer uttered in ver. 19. But in that case the sentence should not be continued with the Imperfect. It should have been, וְזָכַרְתָּ. See my Gr., § 84, n. f. ["The perfect is used to denote a fact which can only be represented as accomplished in actual reality, but which happens, as respects time, in the immediate, unconditioned future."] NAEGLSBACH'S Gr.

We not only regard זָכַר as a prayer directed to the Lord, but הִזְכִּיר, ver. 20, as an emphatic repetition of it. [Some old commentators translated זָכַר as the Inf., but regarded ver. 19, as in close connection with ver. 18. See MUENSTER: Secundum quosdam est זָכַר infinit., ut sit sensus: perit spes mea, recordante me afflictionis meae (GERLACH). The interpretation of this verse must be determined by the gender and person, or subject of הִזְכִּיר in ver. 20.—W. H. H.]

Ver. 20. My soul hath them still in remembrance, and is humbled in me.—*Remember, yea remember, that my soul composes itself in me. [Lit. Remembering Thou wilt remember, i. e., according to the familiar Hebrew idiom, Thou wilt certainly remember. CRANMER BIB.: Yea thou shalt remember them; for my soul melleth away in me. OWEN: Remembering thou wilt remember them, for bowed down within me is my soul. NOYES: Yea, thou wilt remember them, for my soul is bowed down within me. GERLACH: Remembering Thou wilt indeed remember that my soul is bowed down within me. The last is undoubtedly most literal and exact.—W. H. H.]—After the prayer, so emphatically repeated, Remember, Oh do Thou remember, what immediately follows can only indicate something favorable,—that my soul composes itself in me. The meaning of the verb שָׁחָה (see also שָׁחָה and שָׁחָה) can only be sedere, desidere, [to sit, sink or settle down]. The Kal in Ps. xlv. 26, is evidently taken in a bad sense, "For our soul is bowed down to the dust," נִפְשָׁנוּ לְעָפָר שָׁחָה. The Hiphil (for there is no apparent reason for forsaking the K'tib) is to be taken either in the indirect causative sense, denoting to cause that something sinks, sits down, or in direct causative sense, to cause sinking, to sink one's self, to sit down. Since, according to what precedes, the Poet's soul had been excited in the highest degree, furiously agitated (see הִזְכִּירָה, i. 20; ii. 11), the meaning to sink itself, sit down, become calm, would be admirably appropriate here, and the more so because, according to what precedes, the Poet had brought reproach upon his soul, by an ebullition of feeling of an unjustifiable kind, and bordering upon defiance. It is certainly seemly for such a soul to sink down, as it were, into itself, and to become still, as the ocean returning to rest after a furious storm. The expression in me, עָלַי, is used here as in Ps. xlii. 5, 6, 7, 12; xliii. 5; cxxxi. 2; cxlii. 4; Jer. viii. 18, etc. See DELITZSCH Psych., IV., § 1, pp. 151, 152. There lies in it the idea of heaviness, as if the heart felt burdened. [WORDSWORTH: "*My soul * * * sinks down upon me.* The soul (Hebr. nephesh) is the seat of the agitated affections, and it sinks down, as it were, in a swoon, upon the Spirit (Hebr. ruach), the diviner faculty, and overwhelms it. Comp. Ps. xlii. 4-6; xlv. 25; lxxvii. 3; cxlii. 3."—The commentators have succeeded in obscuring the meaning of this verse, by many possible or impossible translations, for which the curious may safely consult GERLACH, but the real meaning is expressed by the most natural translation of the words, Remembering Thou wilt remember, i. e., Thou wilt surely remember, that my soul sinks within me, or is bowed down in me, or upon me (literally, according both to NAEGLSBACH and WORDSWORTH), i. e., is humbled in penitence and overwhelmed with sorrow. So GERLACH.—W. H. H.]

Ver. 21. This I recall to my mind (marg., make to return to my heart), therefore have I hope.—This will I take to my heart, on this account will I hope. The effect of the soul's becoming submissive and acquiescent is, that it now again takes to heart those facts which, notwithstanding all hardships endured at the hand of the Lord, yet always encourage the exercise of confidence in Him. This (זֶה) cannot refer to what precedes. Still less can therefore (לְכֵן), of the second clause. For what precedes is only a prayer, with no positive promise. Ver. 21 is the immediate introduction to the impressive consolatory section which begins with ver. 22. It is shown in what follows, why the Poet still cherishes hope. See the conclusion of ver. 24, therefore will I hope in Him. [The awkward reference of the this and therefore of ver. 21, to what follows, which is rendered necessary by the translation of ver. 20, adopted by NAGELSBACH and others, is a strong argument against the correctness of that translation. 1. The position of the this, as the first word of the sentence, strengthens the likelihood that it refers to something just stated, rather than to something about to be stated. If we explain its position in the sentence by the necessity of the proper initial letter, this may show how much the style is affected by the artificial structure of the poem, and greatly weakens the argument of those who imagine they discover differences between the style of the Lamentations, and of Jeremiah's Prophecies. But 2. The this and therefore, if they refer to what follows, lead us to expect an immediate, clear and definite proposition, to which they would logically correspond. But there is no such proposition stated, but certain general truths follow, which only remotely and by a mental process of our own minds, can be made to satisfy the requirements of the this and therefore in ver. 21. 3. The attempt to establish a connection between the therefore I hope in ver. 21, and the same expression at the end of ver. 24, as if one were an index finger pointing forward, and the other an index finger pointing backward, showing that all that lies between them is the this, on account of which the prophet says therefore I hope, is open to the following objections. (a) The therefore of ver. 24, can only logically refer to the words immediately preceding. "Jehovah is my portion, saith my soul." (b) The therefore, in ver. 24, is restricted to what immediately precedes by the addition of the words "in Him." If it had been intended to correspond with and explain the declaration of ver. 21, it should have been "therefore I hope in this," i. e., in the doctrine contained in all the preceding verses, to which the this of ver. 21 refers. (c) The fact that there is as much in the verses immediately following ver. 24, as in those immediately preceding it, to afford hope and comfort, makes it exceedingly improbable that ver. 24 terminates a section begun in ver. 21. (d) If the therefore, of ver. 24, refers to a proposition preceding and not following it, it is likely that the therefore of ver. 21 does also. 4. The translation of ver. 20, as CRANMER'S BIBLE, OWEN and NOYES translate it (see above on ver. 20), or as ROSENMUELLER translates it (Enim vero reminisceris, hoc animo meo meditor), and still more as GERLACH translates it, Thou wilt certainly remember that my soul is bowed down in me, or upon me, renders the meaning of ver. 21 clear and unequivocal. This assurance, that God is mindful of the soul that is bowed down upon itself, in sorrow and penitence, the Prophet takes to heart, and therefore hope revives in his bosom. We thus have a graceful and easy introduction to the beautiful passage that follows in which the thought expressed in ver. 20, that God is mindful of the submissive patient sufferer, is expanded and reappears at every point.—W. H. H.]

* [WORDSWORTH mistranslates NAEGLSBACH,—Remember, remember Thou, that my soul sinks within me. Golenke, ja golenke, Dass meine Seele sich beruhige in mir. Sich beruhigen means to quit, compose one's self. Besides, his notes explain the Hebrew in the sense of sinking down into a state of rest after great agitation.—W. H. H.]

III. 22-24.

22 It is of the LORD's mercies that we are not consumed, because his compassions
23, 24 fail not. They are new every morning: great is thy faithfulness. The LORD is my portion, saith my soul; therefore will I hope in him.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 22.—[חַסְדֵּי] GERLACH argues that the use in Jer. xlv. of חַסְדֵּי, in ver. 18, for the first person plural, and of חַסְדֵּי in ver. 12, 27, for the third person plural, is decisive evidence of the Jeremiac use of language in the Lamentations.—W. H. H.]—The plural חַסְדֵּי, not found in Jeremiah, is frequent elsewhere, ver. 31; Gen. xxxii. 11; Is. lxiii. 7; Ps. lxxix. 2; cvii. 43, etc.—חַסְדֵּי, Jer. xvi. 5; xlii. 12.—כָּל־יִמִּי, Jer. viii. 20; xiv. 6; xvi. 4, etc.

Ver. 23.—חַסְדֵּי is in apposition to חַסְדֵּי, Jer. xxxi. 22, 31.—לְפָקִידִים, Is. xxxiii. 2; Ps. lxxiii. 14; ci. 8. Jeremiah uses לְפָקִידִים in this sense only once.—אֲכִיזָה, Jer. v. 1, 3; vii. 28; ix. 2.

Ver. 24.—The expression אֲכִיזָה נַפְשִׁי occurs only here.—לֵא. This construction with ל occurs, Ps. xxxviii. 16; xlii. 6, 12; xliii. 5; Mic. vii. 7, etc.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Vers. 22-24. It should be especially observed here that the passage which is full of the richest comfort and which includes vers. 22-42, constitutes the middle portion both of the third chapter and of the whole book. For as chapter third occupies the middle place among the five Songs, so the two decades of verses, vers. 22-42, constitute almost exactly the middle part of chapter third. Here the author skilfully introduces the sunshine. He permits the bright day of hope and resignation to follow the night of despair described in ver. 18. Immediately following these verses, however, the misery of the people and of the Prophet is again depicted in the gloomiest colors, so that this bright part is, as it were, framed in on both sides with deep darkness, which serves as a back-ground to make the colors of this picture of consolation stand out with greater distinctness. And so, as it were, the dome of the building, artistically constructed of these tearful Songs, rises up as a pyramid of light out of painful darkness, by which means the comforting truth, that for believers the sun of happiness will at last triumph over the night of misery and suffering, is placed conspicuously in the clearest and strongest light. First of all the joyful announcement is made, vers. 22-24, that, by the grace of God, Israel is not yet completely undone. There is still a remnant which can serve as a connecting link for the new order of things. This great favor Israel owes to the mercy of God, which is not yet exhausted, but rather in consequence of it the faithfulness of God renews itself every morning, so that the Poet can proclaim with assurance, as a noble anchor of hope and consolation, that the Lord is his portion, and that he may still say to his God "Thou art mine."

Ver. 22. It is of the LORD'S mercies that we are not consumed, because his compassions fail not.—Because of Jehovah's mercies we are not consumed [Gnaden Jehovah's sind es, dass wir nicht gar aus sind. So also, word for word, GEBLACH], for his compassion has no end. [The E. V. is more accurate, because his compassions fail not.—W. H. H.] The fact that the Poet here speaks in the first person plural, when elsewhere, down to ver. 40, he speaks only of himself, is explained by what has been already shown, that he fastens the cords of his own personal hope to the fact that the people still exists, even if only as a weak remnant. But that even such a kernel remains, he ascribes to the grace of God. [See these transitions from singular to plural and back again, explained in remarks introductory to the chapter.] The use of the plural in mercies involves the idea of manifestations of grace, or illustrations of grace, in the way of instruction and of example. Many acts of Divine grace shown to many individuals, combine in the result. Since the mercies (the several acts of grace) of Jehovah can only be regarded as the effluence of His compassion, we take the second ע as a causative particle, "for His compassion has no end." The compassion of God is the ground of His graciousness, in consequence of which Israel is not entirely undone.

If we could take עָנָה for the third person plural, as the CHALDAIC, SYRIAC and many moderns do (EWALD, THENIUS, DELITZCH on Is. xliii. 11), the sense of this place would be entirely clear. [We could then translate with CALVIN, The mercies of Jehovah! surely they are not consumed. In which OWEN, BLAYNEY and BOOTHROYD substantially agree.—W. H. H.] But, notwithstanding the fact that in Ps. lxi. 7, עָנָה seems even more plainly than here as if it must be taken for the third person plural [not necessarily. See J. A. ALEXANDER in loc.], yet OLSHAUSEN is certainly right when he shows, § 82 u, that the insertion of ה as a compensation for the reduplication of the consonant, is in violation of all the established rules of Grammar. It may be that at several of those doubtful places that are referred to (Is. xxiii. 11; Lam. iii. 22; Ps. lxi. 7; Prov. xxvi. 7; Ezr. x. 16) false readings have slipped in. But here this supposition is unnecessary. Here as in Num. xvii. 28, and Jer. xli. 18, עָנָה is the first person plural.

Ver. 23. They are new every morning. [They, i. e., the mercies of Jehovah, which are ever renewed because His compassion fails not: for His mercies are the fruit of His compassion (see notes on ver. 22).—W. H. H.]—Great is thy faithfulness.—Faithfulness is only a form of compassionate love. It is love enduring in all circumstances. [CALVIN: "Were God to take away the promise, all the miserable would inevitably perish; for they can never lay hold on His mercy except through His word. This, then, is the reason why Scripture so often connects these two things together, even God's mercy and His faithfulness in fulfilling His promises."]

Ver. 24. Vers. 22, 23, treated only of objective facts. From these a subjective conclusion is now drawn. Since the Lord is so gracious, merciful and faithful, the Poet esteems Him as the dearest treasure of his soul, as his best portion, and the foundation of his hope. The LORD is my portion.—My portion is Jehovah. This seems to refer to Num. xviii. 20, where the Lord, having told Aaron that he should receive no hereditary portion in the land, says to him, "I am thy part [portion] and thine inheritance." The same expression is found in Ps. xvi. 5; lxxiii. 26; cxix. 57; cxlii. 6. See Jer. x. 16; li. 19; Deut. xxii. 9. Saith my soul.—[CALVIN: "He speaks emphatically, that his soul had thus said . . . The unbelieving also confess that God is the fountain of all blessings, and that they ought to acquiesce in Him; but with the mouth only they confess this, while they believe nothing less. This then is the reason why the Prophet ascribes what he says to his soul, as though he had said, that he did not boast like hypocrites that God was his portion, but of this he had a thorough conviction."] Therefore will I hope in him.—See ver. 21.

III. 25-33.

25 The LORD is good unto them that wait for him, to the soul that seeketh him.
 26 It is good that a man should both hope and quietly wait for the salvation of the 27, 28 LORD. It is good for a man that he bear the yoke in his youth. He sitteth 29 alone and keepeth silence, because he hath borne it upon him. He putteth his mouth
 30 in the dust, if so be there may be hope. He giveth his cheek to him that smiteth 31 him: he is filled full with reproach. For the LORD will not cast off for ever.
 32 But though he cause grief, yet will he have compassion according to the multitude 33 of his mercies. For he doth not afflict willingly, nor grieve the children of men.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 25.—Kal of קוֹה is not found in Jeremiah; he uses only Niphal iii. 17, and Piel viii. 15; xiii. 16; xiv. 19, 22. Kindred expressions are found in Ps. xxv. 3; lxi. 7; Is. xlix. 23.—The expression יְהוָה אֶת יְהוָה is found in Jeremiah several times and in different senses, x. 21 (?); xxi. 2; xxix. 13; xxxvii. 7. Yet none of these places seem to have been in the Poet's eye. If some earlier declaration was in his mind, it was apparently Deut. iv. 29, where it is said יְהוָה יִשְׁכֵּן בְּעֵינֵינוּ.

Ver. 26.—[See crit. notes below.]—תִּשְׁכַּח, Jer. iii. 23.

Ver. 27.—עָלָה. See i. 14. עָלָה נִשְׁמָה occurs only here.—נְעוּרִים frequently in Jeremiah, iii. 4; xxiv. 25, etc.

Ver. 28.—נָטַל, not in Jeremiah. It occurs, besides here, only in 2 Sam. xxiv. 12; Is. lxiii. 9. יָטוּל, Is. xl. 15, is probably from נָטַל, to turn aside (see DELITZSCH at this place), of which verb Jeremiah makes frequent use, xvi. 13; xxii. 26, 28.

Ver. 29.—[This verse is wanting in the Sept.]—אֵלִי Jeremiah uses often, xxi. 2; xxvi. 3, 7; ii. 8. [CALVIN: "The particle אֵלִי expresses what is difficult; for when anything appears to be incredible, the Hebrews say, If it may be."]—The phrase יֵשׁ הַקּוֹה is found not only in Prov. xix. 18, but also in Jer. xxxi. 17.

Ver. 30.—Neither the Part. כָּרַח, nor לָחִי, see i. 2, occurs in Jeremiah: נָתַן לָחִי is found in Is. i. 6.—The expression עָלָה עֵינָי occurs only here, yet there is a similar construction [of עָלָה with בְּ, instead of Acc.] in Ps. lxxv. 5; lxxxviii. 4. The words עָלָה and כָּרַח, by themselves, are current in Jeremiah; see for the first, xxxi. 14; xlv. 10; i. 10, for the other vi. 10; xv. 15; xx. 8; xxiv. 9, etc.

Ver. 31.—Jeremiah never uses אָנֹכִי, see ver. 17; ii. 7.

Ver. 32.—אָנֹכִי, see i. 4; v. 12.—רָחֵם, often in Jeremiah, xii. 15; xxxi. 20; xlii. 12, etc.—כָּרַח חֲסָדָה is found, pointed thus, Ps. cvi. 45, besides Is. lxiii. 7.—With regard to grammatical construction, see ver. 22.

Ver. 33.—The verb עָנָה, inclinatum, depressum esse (Piel again in Lam. v. 11) Jeremiah uses in no form.—כָּלָבֹן, see Deut. xvi. 28.—נָהָה is Imperf. Piel of נָהַה, the Hiph. of which we have in ver. 32. This form occurs only here: it is shortened from נִינָה, as יִרְדָּה, ver. 53, from יִרְדָּה. See OLSEN, p. 547.—בְּנֵי אִישׁ, not found in Jeremiah; he says only once אִישׁ, xxxii. 19. [If he could use this latter phrase "only once," he was not so addicted to it that he could not use the other "only once."—W. H. H.] The phrase, besides here, is found only in Ps. iv. 3; xlix. 3; lxii. 10. At the last two places אִישׁ occurs in the immediate context.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Vers. 25-33. The thought underlying this section is,—the Lord has kind purposes towards the children of men in all circumstances; even if He chastises them, He does it for their good; men should so deport themselves in misfortune that they may ensure the attainment of the Lord's wholesome intention. Then will He permit His mercy to return again. [Here we plainly see the expansion of the assertion made in ver. 20, that the Lord will be mindful of the soul bowed down upon itself in submissive sorrow.—W. H. H.]—The three verses, 25-27, begin with the same word טוֹב, good, and evidently belong together, as in this section generally the connection of verses beginning with the same initial is very apparent. Thus in the three following triads, vers. 28-30, 31-33, 34-36, the verses begin not only with the same letter, but with homogeneous words.

Ver. 25. The LORD is good—Good is Jehovah—unto them that wait for him,—to them who trust in Him. [Wait, waiting in hope, is the correct idea.—W. H. H.],—to the soul that seeketh him.—The idea of טוֹב=good, is presented to us in three aspects in vers. 25-27. Here we have the fundamental idea, that the Lord Himself is good. This belongs to His nature. He is good even when He causes pain. Man though in trouble, perceiving the goodness of the Lord, cannot defiantly murmur or faint-heartedly despair. He must rather hope even in Him who slays him, seek even Him who seems to thrust him away from Himself.

Ver. 26. It is good that a man should both hope and quietly wait for the salvation of the LORD—Happy is he who keeping silence waits for the salvation of Jehovah. [The Hebrew construction is difficult. The authorities differ on important points. But all the translations result in the same essential meaning, which is, on the whole, as well expressed in our common English version, as in any. It is good both hopefully and silently, i. e., un murmuringly, submissively, to wait for the salvation of Jehovah.—W. H. H.] From the proposition that the Lord is good to those who wait for Him and seek Him, follows necessarily this other, that the man is fortunate, even in the midst of chastisement, who patiently and silently hopes for the salvation of the Lord. Thence it appears that טוֹב, good, here is to be taken in the sense of felix, happy, fortunate, which it undoubtedly has in iv. 9; Jer. xlv. 17; Is. iii. 10; Ps. cxii. 5.

[טוֹב. The attempt has been made to take this word in verses 26, 27 as a repetition of the statement in ver. 25, that Jehovah is good. Thus NEUMANN (see GERLACH), Good is Jehovah to those who hope in Him . . . Good—and who waits . . . Good to the man, etc. This creates a very harsh ellipsis in ver. 26, and reduces the meaning in ver. 27, down to this, that Jehovah is good to that man only who bears the yoke in his youth. BLAYNEY and BOOTHROYD avoid these two difficulties, by translating קָוָה in ver. 25 as a singular noun (which OWEN claims as the correct reading on the authority of the Syr.), and by introducing an illative particle (therefore, hence) in ver. 26, that is not in the Hebrew. BLAYNEY: Jehovah is gracious unto him that waiteth for Him . . . He is gracious, therefore let him wait . . . He is gracious unto a man, etc. BOOTHROYD: Jehovah is good to him that waiteth for Him . . . He is good, hence let him hope, etc. Besides the grammatical difficulties above stated, these two translations, by making an independent proposition of ver. 27, teaches the wretched doctrine that God is necessarily gracious or good to a man who is afflicted in his youth. They are, too, open to the grammatical objection that GERLACH brings against NEUMANN's translation, that it would require the suffix at the end of verse 26, instead of the name Jehovah. The repetition of the word טוֹב in these verses should, doubtless, be regarded merely as a sort of initial rhyme, intended to please the ear and the eye, and to fix the attention.—W. H. H.]—If טוֹב is taken in the sense of felix, the following יָחִיל explains itself. It is insufferably harsh to take this as Imperf. Hiph. as many do. EWALD refers to this, § 235 a. The examples adduced by him in that place, afford no analogy to the case before us. Why should not טוֹב here be construed precisely as it is immediately afterwards in ver. 27? The double ! is easily explained, if we take יָחִיל as a verbal adjective from יָחַל, as GESENIUS (Thes. p. 590. comp. 827). WINER, FUERST and others do, although this adjective does not occur elsewhere. An objection to this may be urged from דִּיכָם, which is only found besides here in Is. xlvi. 5, and Hab. ii. 19, where it has an adverbial signification. But the question is, whether דִּיכָם is a pure adverb, or not rather an original adjective noun (see אֵלֶּם, a forefront, porch).

EWALD affirms the latter, § 204 b. Comp. § 163 g. In this original adjective signification may דִּיכָם stand here. MAURER, indeed, proposes to take יָחִיל and דִּיכָם substantively, bonum est expectare et silere; propr., expectatio et silentium=tacita expectatio. He refers in this connection to רָכִיל. But, as EWALD shows, § 158 a, this formation occurs even where it has an abstract sense, as רָכִיל obtretractio, רָכִיל totality, yet there is always a passive idea beneath it, as, for example, retributio originally retribution, disposition originally the being disposed. So also רָכִיל was originally obtrectatum, רָכִיל consummatum. According to this יָחִיל would be expectatum. But this sense does not suit here. The connection requires the pure abstract idea of expectatio.

Therefore we take יָחִיל and דִּיכָם in the adjective sense, and the double ! for as well as, as also, or both—and. [Both hopeful and silent or submissive.]

Ver. 27. It is good—Good is it—for a man that he bear the yoke in his youth.—If that one is happy, who silently waits and endures, then it follows that sorrow itself has its good side: for it begets that silent endurance. It is the hot fire that ripens that noble fruit. Therefore in the next place the Poet calls bearing the yoke something good. He adds, it is true, in his youth. This seems to have caused the interpreters difficulty, even in old times. The Aldine edition of the Sept., and thereupon THEODORION, translated ἐκ νεότητος αὐτοῦ, from his youth. And in fact many Codices read ἐκ νεότητος, from his youth. But the idea of youth is not to be taken in too restricted a sense. By it the Poet would indicate evidently, not youth in opposition to manhood, but the period of still fresh unbroken strength, in opposition to the period of broken and diminished vitality. He would then understand manhood as included in youth. He would not exclude the thought that it may be wholesome, in a certain sense, for the old to bear the yoke. He means only that the time of vigorous strength is especially the time when bearing the yoke may be of advantage. For then a man is pre-eminently pliable. Then can he learn, in the school of the cross, things that will be of the greatest use to him in his later life. [CALVIN understands the yoke as that of instruction, instead of chastisement; submission to the teacher. So the Chaldee paraphrases explain it. But the whole context requires us to understand the yoke of affliction and submission to Divine Providence. See especially the following verses, 28-33.—W. H. H.]

J. D. MICHAELIS has concluded from this verse, that Jeremiah wrote it when a young man. It seems to me that there is some truth at the foundation of this remark. In this third chapter the person of the speaker stands out in the foreground. In the connection of this chapter, then, this expression can certainly be better understood in the mouth of a man in the vigor of his strength, than in the mouth of an old man. Since then Jeremiah, at the time of the capture of Jerusalem, stood at the very least on the threshold of old age, having a ministry of forty-two years behind him, which he had begun rather after, than before, or at his twentieth year (see Introduction to Jer. Proph., p. xiii.), therefore this place is rather against than for Jeremiah's authorship of this Song. [Is it natural for a young man to talk about patiently and silently bearing a yoke? Is it not natural for an old man, looking back upon a long experience, to recognize the benefit of early crosses and afflictions? Could we imagine anything more likely to be said by the pious Prophet in his old age, than what is here said? And is it not just what his personal sufferings that begun in his youth long before Jerusalem was destroyed, would have led him to say? And, finally, do we not recognize everywhere in these Lamentations, the spirit of one who has been long a stranger to happiness, who,—unlike the young man, strong, sanguine and self-reliant,—has lost all hope save a hope in God, looking far onwards into the hidden future, that is to be waited for in silent passive, submission?—WORDSWORTH: "The sentiment before us is very appropriate to Jeremiah, who had been chastened in early life by God, and had thus learnt a lesson of patience and cheerful resignation under the severest personal afflictions; and he here recognizes the benefit of that early discipline."—W. H. H.]

Ver. 28. He sitteth alone and keepeth silent.—The bearing of the yoke is not unconditionally wholesome for a man, but only when it is done in the right way. That is no right and wholesome way of bearing the cross, when one is impatient and perverse, and desires to shake off the yoke. Rather, the yoke should be borne in silent and patient submission.—The sitting alone is in opposition to cheerful intercourse with men. This Jeremiah himself makes explicitly conspicuous, when he says, xv. 17, "I sat not in the assembly of the joyful [E. V., the mockers], nor rejoiced; I sat alone, because of Thy hand: for Thou hast filled me with indignation." Only in silence and solitude do Divine chastisements affect the heart. Whoever permits himself to be diverted by the noise of the world, drowns the voice of God, which speaks to our heart by means of the yoke. Compare, besides, i. 1; Lev. xiii. 46.—And is silent: comp. ii. 10, 18; Jer. xlvii. 6; xlviii. 2.—Because he hath borne it upon him,—when [because] He imposed it on him. The old translators (SEPT., JEROME, SYRIAC) have taken the verb in the sense of taking upon one's self [so E. V., CALVIN and OWEN], because they thought, the subject being wanting, the subject of the immediately preceding verbs must be supplied. But the Hebrew verb (שָׁטַל) as also (שָׁטַל) means tollere, imponere [to lay upon, to impose]. The whole context readily supplies Jehovah as the subject, and the word itself gives the object. [BROUGHTON, HENDERSON, NOYES and GERLACH, all agree with NÄGELSBACH, in taking the verb in an active sense, and in making God the subject of the verb,—because, or when He laid it upon him. CALVIN, evidently dissatisfied with his own rendering, confesses that the expression does not seem natural to him, and suggests another reading. NOYES remarks that

"the name of God is understood, as often in Job," and refers to his note on Job iii. 20.—W. H. H.]

[LUTHER, PAREAU, DE WETTE, MAURER, THENIUS and NOYES, make vers. 28-30 dependent on '2, that, in verse 27, and expository of the meaning of bearing the yoke. It is good that a man bear the yoke in his youth, that he sit alone and is silent, etc., that he put his mouth in the dust, etc., that he give his cheek to him that smiteth him, etc. This gives a good sense; but the emphatic idea in ver. 27, is,—not that a man bear the yoke, but that he bear it in his youth; it is hardly possible, therefore, that vers. 28-30 can be an expansion of ver. 27, without showing why it is good for a man to bear the yoke in his youth. We are compelled, therefore, to interpret vers. 28-30, independently of ver. 27.—W. H. H.]

Ver. 29. He putteth his mouth in the dust.—This expression is found only here. It is different from the expression lick the dust (Pa. lxxii. 9; Mic. vii. 17; Is. xlix. 23). For whilst the latter denotes only the lowest degree of subjection, the former denotes likewise speechlessness, since he who has put his mouth in the dust cannot speak. Yet it is not meant that he who is humbled in the dust cannot say anything at all. Only he shall restrain himself from murmuring. Ejaculations of humble imploring prayer may be extorted from the heart. As such an ejaculation we must regard the words—if so be there may be hope,—perhaps there is hope. For if we take these as the words of the Poet, then we cannot understand why they occur just here. They would in that case stand as well or better at the end of ver. 30, in place of he is filled full with reproach. Here at the close of ver. 29, they are only in place, if they can be brought into organic union with the first member of the verse. This is done if we take them as what the humbled one is permitted to say, or rather to think, in spite of his putting his mouth in the dust. I do not on this account think, that we should supply לאמר, saying, for it would illy suit to say—he becomes dumb speaking. We must, therefore, understand the sentence, as indeed a declaration of the humbled one, but as an independent exclamation, not grammatically connected with the preceding sentence.

Ver. 30. If the three propositions, vers. 28-30, be compared one with another, a certain gradation will be perceived. For sitting alone and silent is comparatively easy. To put the mouth in the dust and yet to hope, is more difficult. But the hardest of all, without question, is to present the cheek to the smiter and patiently accept the full measure of disgrace that is to come upon us.—He giveth—offers—his cheek to him that smiteth him.—By him that smiteth him we are not to understand, exclusively and immediately, God. For God smites not immediately, but by the instrumentality of men. "The Lord hath bidden him," said David in reference to the revilings of Shimei (2 Sam. xvi. 11). For the sense, see Job xvi. 10; Matt. v. 39. [CALVIN: "There are many who submit to God when they perceive His hand; as, for instance, when any one is afflicted with a disease, he knows that it is a chastisement that proceeds from God; when pestilence happens, or famine, from the inclemency of the weather, the hand of God appears to them; and many then conduct themselves in a suitable manner: but when an enemy meets one, and when injured, he instantly says, 'I have now nothing to do with God, but that wicked enemy treats me disgracefully.' It is then for this reason that the Prophet shows that the patience of the godly ought to extend to injuries of this kind."—He is filled full with reproach.—[CALVIN: "There are two kinds of injuries; for the wicked either treat us with violence, or assail us with reproaches; and reproach is the bitterest of all things, and inflicts a most grievous wound on all ingenuous minds."]

Vers. 31-33. The triad now following states the reason why it is good not to despair in trouble, but to persevere in silent hope. The reason is contained in three specifications; or, more correctly, in two, the second of which is shown in two particulars.

Ver. 31. The first reason is a negative one. For the Lord [Adonai, not Jehovah. Yet see Intr., Add. Rem., p. 32,] will not cast off for ever.—The same expression as Ps. lxxvii. 8; comp. xlv. 24; lxxiv. 1. CALVIN: "It is certain there will be no patience, except there be hope . . . As patience cherishes hope, so hope is the foundation of patience; and hence consolation is, according to Paul, connected with patience; Rom. xv. 4."]

Ver. 32. The second reason contains two particulars. The first is a positive one: the compassion of God after He has a long time smitten, will yet appear again. But though he cause grief, yet will he have compassion according to the multitude of his mercies.—For if He has afflicted, then is He moved to compassion according to His great mercy. With regard to the meaning, see Hos. vi. 1, Job v. 18; Ps. xxx. 6 (5). [See also Is. liv. 7, 8; Ps. lxxxix. 32-34.]

Ver. 33. The second particular of the second reason is expressed in a negative form: God must, after He has smitten, have compassion again, because chastisement is not with Him an end, but a means. The essential disposition of His heart is love. Therefore chastisement is not the proper or true expression of His feeling towards us. For he doth not afflict willingly [marg., from his heart], nor grieve—yet He grieves [and grieve.—W. H. H.] the children of men.—From the heart: Not out of His heart, but if we may be allowed to speak of God anthropopathically, chastisement comes from His heart. The antithesis indicated here is not expressed in the context [willingly, see Num. xvi. 28]. For the sense, see Ps. cxix. 75; Jer. xxxii. 41; Deut. xxviii. 63.

III. 84-39.

34, 35 To crush under his feet all the prisoners of the earth. To turn aside the right of a man before the face of the Most High. To subvert a man in his cause, the Lord approveth not. Who is he that saith, and it cometh to pass, when the Lord commandeth it not? Out of the mouth of the Most High proceedeth not evil and good? Wherefore doth a living man complain, a man for the punishment of his sins?

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Vers. 34-36.—The three infinitives which begin these verses, can only depend on רָאָה. But רָאָה in connection with אָל or עַל has the meaning of intueri in aliquid, fixing the eyes on something (Is. xvii. 7; Ex. v. 21). Owing to the affinity between אָל and עַל (See Ew., § 217, c, d, f), לִי רָאָה can be used for אָל רָאָה. So Ps. lxiv. 6, and here [GERLACH refers also to 1 Sam. xvi. 7]. The necessity of choosing a word beginning with לִי, on account of the alphabetical arrangement, has here at any rate decidedly prevailed. [NEUMANN, according to GERLACH, makes these infinitives dependent on אָל of ver. 33, God does not willingly allow all that Israel suffers; but this involves great difficulty in interpreting last clauses of vers. 35, 36.—W. H. H.]

Ver. 34.—רָאָה does not occur in the Kal, Jeremiah uses it once in the Pual, xlv. 10.—The suffix רְגִלִי (the peculiar opinion of OTTO, who takes it as synonymous with לִפְנֵי, we dismiss), can only be referred to the subject concealed in רָאָה. Use the Participle instead of the Infinitive, and the reference is instantly plain.—אָמַר Jeremiah never uses.

Ver. 35.—The phrase הִטָּה הַטָּה מִשְׁפָּט פִּי never occurs in Jeremiah. [Yet he was most familiar with it, especially in his favorite book of Deuteronomy.—W. H. H.] He uses הִטָּה many times in another sense, v. 25; vi. 12; vii. 24, etc.—מִשְׁפָּט-אֱבִינִים, comp. מִשְׁפָּט אֱבִינִים, Jer. v. 28.—עֲלִיָּה as a name of God, not in Jeremiah; he uses the word only twice, in a local sense xx. 2; xxxvi. 10. [See Intr., Add. Rem. p. 32.]

Ver. 36.—עָנָה, only Piel, Pual and Hithp., occur. The word does not occur at all in Jeremiah. In Lamentations the substantive עֲנָה, ver. 69, is also found.—רִיב, Jer. xv. 10; xxv. 31, etc.—The construction אֲדָם בְּרִיבֵי seems to be chosen to vary the phrase from ver. 35; for elsewhere we find only עֲנָה מִשְׁפָּט (Job viii. 3; xxxiv. 12), צָרָה (Job viii. 3), or רִיב (Ps. cxlvi. 9).

Ver. 37.—[וְהָיָה.] NABELSBACH in his Grammar refers to a similar use of 3d Pers. Fem. Sing. of verb in Jud. x. 9; 1 Sam. xxx. 6, יִהְיֶה צָרָה לִי; Jer. vii. 31; xix. 5, עֲלֵהָ עַל-לִבִּי; Jer. xlv. 21, וְהָיָה עֲלֵהָ עַל-לִבִּי; and Josh. xi. 20; 2 Kings xxiv. 3, הָיְתָה. The last two examples show that OWEN is wrong when he says that this verb is "probably always masculine, when it has this meaning," and should, therefore, be taken here as second person masculine.—W. H. H.]

Ver. 38.—I do not think that ver. 33 depends on אִמְרָא in ver. 37, as LUTHER translates, Who then may say, that such a thing is done without the Lord's command, and that neither evil nor good comes out of the mouth of the Most High? For אִמְרָא in ver. 37 is not merely to say, but it involves here the abstract idea of command, which does not need an object following after it, in order to define it. But ver. 38 must be taken independently as a question. See Exeg. notes below on ver. 36.—רָעוֹת, Jer. xlii. 9.

Ver. 39.—אִמְרָא reminds us of the grammatical construction of אִמְרָא, Ps. xlii. 3; lxxxiv. 3; 2 Kings xix. 4, 16. Jeremiah uses the adjective אִמְרָא only in the formula of an oath, אִמְרָא; or, אִמְרָא, iv. 2; v. 2; xii. 16, etc.: in xxxviii. 2, it seems to be a verb,—see at that place.—אִמְרָא, see i. 8; Jeremiah uses neither in the singular nor in the plural.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Vers. 34-39. We have already, at ver. 30, discriminated between an indirect and an immediate chastisement. It is there left undecided, which may be intended. But this point remaining uncertain must now be made plain. All the grounds of consolation, brought together in what precedes, must be acknowledged as valid and substantial. But they apply only to such sorrows as those of which God is esteemed the immediate author. But how is it with those sorrows which the malice of men inflict upon us? The opinion might arise, that these evils befall us without the intervention of God, and that He takes no notice of them. Yet these evils are very numerous; and what consolation can be afforded against these evils from what is said in vers. 25-33, to those who are suffering under the hand of God? To this question it is now explicitly answered, in vers. 37, 38, that nothing in the world is done without God's will, that no man has the power to act with absolute creative independence, that both good and bad fortune depend on the will of the Lord. Consequently there is no reason for sighing despairingly over any calamity, whatever it may be. There is no absolute misfortune—except sin! All sorrow of the heart then concentrates itself on the source of evil, on wickedness.

Ver. 34. To crush—to trample—under his feet.—The pronoun his must refer to the subject of the infinitive to crush. [OWEN absurdly refers it to man in the last verse, where the last words literally are children of man.—W. H. H.] All the prisoners of the earth.—This cannot mean literally all the prisoners on the whole earth. This is evident from the use of the verb to see (רָאָה), ver. 36, in the perfect tense. The Poet can only have in his eye real, concrete circumstances. Only those prisoners can be intended, already spoken of above, i. 8, 5, 18. יָרֵא, earth, [improperly translated land, by BLAYNEY, BOOTHROYD and HENDERSON] is not against this; see Ps. xlii. 4; xxxviii. 3. DELITZSCH at this place, GESEN. Thez., p. 154. [BLAYNEY's arguments that the prisoners intended are those held and enslaved for debt, could satisfy no one but himself.—W. H. H.]

Ver. 35. To turn aside the right of a man—to bend the right of a man [i. e., to deprive a man of his legal rights.—W. H. H.]. See Ex. xxiii. 6; Deut. xvi. 19; xxiv. 17; xxvii. 19; 1 Sam. viii. 3; comp. Prov. xvii. 23; xviii. 5; Is. x. 2.—Before the face of the Most High.—The author thinks here of the omnipresent and omniscient God, who enthroned on high looks far down on Heaven and earth (Ps. cxlii. 5, 6).

[BLAYNEY translates עֲלֵי (the Most High) here as superior: asserting that it cannot refer to God, because no one can wrest judgment where He is the Judge. The meaning evidently is, however, to pervert judgment at earthly tribunals, though this is done, as it were, before the very face of the Most High, who sees all things and is present everywhere.—W. H. H.]

Ver. 36. To subvert.—The word means to bend, to bend down, and is used both in reference to persons (Job xix. 6; Ps. cxix. 78; Eccl. vii. 13), and things (Am. viii. 5; Job viii. 3, etc.). A man in his cause—in his law-suit. The Lord approveth (marg. seeth) not. Has not the Lord seen that? In this sentence the signification of the verb and the form of the proposition are doubtful. As regards the meaning of the verb רָאָה, I do not believe it can be taken in the sense of choosing, preferring (see Gen. xli. 33; Deut. xii. 13; 2 Sam. xxiv. 13); or in a sense derived from that meaning, agreeing to, allowing (EWALD). For where רָאָה has the meaning of choosing, there are always a number of objects placed before the sight, among which the subject, after looking round by way of examination, makes his choice. But it cannot be said that where God permits the injustice done by men, He has positively chosen it. [The learned and sagacious commentator, in the heat of his argument, has made a singular blunder. The proposition is not necessarily a question, involving an affirmative answer, but may be a direct affirmation, that God does not approve, choose, or look with favor on such injustice (רָאָה לֹא).—W. H. H.] Further, this sense would not suit the construction of the infinitive with ל depending on רָאָה (see Gram. note, vers. 34-36, above). We are obliged then to take this verb in its natural, original sense of seeing. But in that case it is clear that the proposition must be taken as a question, as in verse 38. For it were a contradiction to say, the perverting of the right before the face of the Most High, the Lord does not see. What is done before the face of the Lord, He cannot fail to see. This is the very basis of the argument. If there were anything which the Lord doth not see, we might allow that that particular thing was done without His consent. But since He sees everything, then must everything that is done, be done with His consent. The absence of the interrogation is no more remarkable than at ver. 38. See for example Job ii. 10, my Gr., § 107, 1. The perfect form of the verb, רָאָה, shows that the Poet had here especially in mind the oppression that had befallen Israel and the Prophet. He would say, Must not the Lord have seen all the misery which the Israelites had suffered as captives, or by the injustice of the mighty, all the misery especially which had extorted from the Poet the foregoing lamentation? If he had had in his eye, not the concrete and actual, but merely general and possible facts, he would, without doubt, have used רָאָה, as BÖTTCHER has remarked. See below מִצֵּי, ver. 38. [The English version, the Lord approveth not; or as BROUGHTON has it, the Lord liketh not, is undoubtedly correct, and is adopted by BLAYNEY (who translates the verb seeth not, but explains it in the sense of not approving), BOOTHROYD, HENDERSON and WORDSWORTH. It avoids the harsh and arbitrary explanation of supposing vers. 34-36, the language of an objector, who affirms the Lord doth not regard these acts of oppression and injustice, as CALVIN and OWEN suggest. It also avoids the equally arbitrary assumption of NÄGELSBACH, GERLACH and NOYES, that these words are put interrogatively. There is nothing in the form or context to suggest a question. Ver. 38 is no parallel to this case: for there the question is suggested by the question that precedes and the question that follows it: the whole triplet is in the interrogative style. It is dangerous to allow the right to assume an interrogation for the sake of surmounting a difficulty. Were this license generally accepted, the Bible could be made to teach the very reverse of what it does teach, by assuming that its positive affirmations, are interrogations emphasizing the contradiction of what is apparently asserted. The opinion that רָאָה means to view with pleasure, preference or approbation, only when followed by the preposition בְּ, has been so generally accepted, that Dr. J. A. ALEXANDER hesitated to give רָאָה followed by לְ that meaning in Is. liii. 2. Yet only that meaning suits that passage: and in 1 Sam. xvi. 7, we have רָאָה with לְ twice in this exact meaning of regarding with pleasure, with favor, with approbation,—"man looketh on the outward appearance, but Jehovah looketh on the heart." It will be found on examination of those passages where רָאָה is construed with בְּ, that the preposition intensifies the sense and seems to denote looking steadfastly at a thing, feasting the eye upon it with inward delight, or with exultation as over a prostrate foe. But רָאָה without בְּ, is also used to express the idea of looking at a thing with indulgence and allowance, where no special complacency is implied. It is thus used here, and in exactly the same sense that it has in Hab. i. 13, "Thou art of purer eyes than to behold evil," מְרוֹת רָע. WORDSWORTH: "The sense is,—For a man to crush under his feet all the captives of the earth (as the Chaldeans crushed indiscriminately their Hebrew captives, without regard to sex or age), to pervert a man's cause in the face of the Most High, to subvert a man in his cause—this the Lord does not look on with approval. For He is of purer eyes than to behold iniquity."—W. H. H.]

Ver. 37. Who is he that saith, and it cometh to pass, when the Lord commandeth it not?—Who is he that spoke and it was done, unless the Lord commanded it? [NOYES: "Who is he that can command anything to be done, so that it shall be effected, unless Jehovah permit or order it to be done?"] This verse affords the proof that the evils, enumerated in vers. 34-36, had not befallen those who suffered them, without God's consent. This verse reminds us that there is only one single absolute creative causality; for the words אָמַר יְהוָה [He said—and there was] do, without doubt, refer to the creative-word (Gen. i. 3, etc.). Were there a man of whom it could be said,—He spake and it was done, He commanded and it stood fast (Ps. xxxiii. 9), then it might be possible that those evils had befallen Israel at his command, and not Jehovah's. Evidently the Poet has in mind these words just quoted from Ps. xxxiii. 9, although he quotes from memory as appears from the substitution of יְהוָה for יָדָה. But see the femin. in such cases, my Gr., § 60, 6 b [see Gram. note above]. The second clause of ver. 37 is evidently suggested by the second clause of Ps. xxxiii. 9, only it is changed into a negative sentence, which serves likewise to define the implied negative of the first clause. There are some, indeed, in reference to whom the expression אָמַר יְהוָה [he spoke and it came to pass] might in a certain sense be used, but only when the Lord has also commanded what is done. There is no one whose will is efficient without the consent and command of the Lord. The explanation, Who then may say, that such a thing is done without the Lord's command? (LUTHER, ROSENMUELLER and others), is ungrammatical. It ignores the Imperfect with Wav consecut. [The thought is the same as in Amos iii. 6, Shall there be evil in a city, and the LORD hath not done it?—OWEN gives an entirely new version. Who is he who says, That Thou art Lord who dost not command? This is on the assumption that vers. 34-38 contain the sentiments of an objector, whose argument now is, in vers. 37, 38, "that God as a Lord or Sovereign does not command or order events, and for this reason, because both evil and good cannot come from Him." This interpretation, harsh, difficult and against authority, could only be accepted in case רָאָה לֹא, ver. 36, must mean does not see, regard or observe, and not does not approve, (see notes, ver. 36). and also in case יְהוָה in this verse, must be rendered as 2d person masculine, and not 3d person feminine (see Gram. note above).—The connection of this triplet with the preceding one, according to Dr. NÄGELSBACH's interpretation of ver. 36,—has not the Lord seen that?—is very obvious. But it is no objection to the other interpretation—the Lord does not approve, that these three verses recognize God's agency in the evils that befall men. It is the problem constantly recurring in the Bible, that God does not approve of oppression and injustice, and yet God makes sin the punishment of sin. No one can sinfully injure his neighbor with God's approbation: and yet the injury he does is God's providential chastisement of transgressors.—W. H. H.]

Ver. 38. Out of the mouth of the Most High proceedeth not evil and good?—Goes not out of the mouth of the Most High the evil and the good? If there is no one who is able to make his will efficient without God's permission, then follows necessarily the general proposition, that everything, as well evil as good, proceeds from the mouth of God, i. e., is done by God's command. It certainly is not the Poet's intention here to suggest any reflections on the origin of moral evil. He has in his eye, according to the whole context, only the contrast of prosperity and adversity. By the evil he means physical evil or misfortune, and by the good—physical good or happiness. And although misfortune is frequently a consequence of moral evil, according to vers. 84-86, yet he regards this consequence only with reference to its bearing on human welfare, and not with reference to its causation. What he wishes to say is, that the Lord permits wrong and violence, as well as those actions that tend to promote happiness, in order, according as His purpose may be, to chastise or to bless. But he did not intend to say that God had positively willed what is evil, although the significance of evil is not exhausted in the idea of chastisement.

Ver. 89. Since happiness and misfortune are both equally willed of God, both must be good, and nothing belonging to either of them should cause us to murmur. As a man who has brought upon himself wholesome sickness by means of bitter medicine, ought not to complain of that medicine, but should blame himself for having caused the necessity of using it, so a man should not complain of the evils which befall him, for these are only the necessary means of curing the sickness of sin, of which he himself is guilty. If he will lament, let him lament for his sin. See Jer. xxx. 15.—Wherefore doth a living man complain (marg., murmur).—For what sighs the man who lives? The verb, נָחַם, is respire, gemere, to sigh with the kindred idea of murmuring, Num. xi. 1, which is the only place except this, where the word occurs. The expression a living man, אִישׁ חַי, is difficult. It cannot be taken, with PAREAU and ROSENMUELLER, as synonymous with אִישׁ, a man, in which case אִישׁ חַי, would be, properly speaking, superfluous. Neither can it be taken for חַיָּה, vita, life, in which case the sense would be cur qurritur homo vitam scil. calamitosam (MAURER) [why complains man of life, i. e., because it is calamitous]? As little can it be called as long as he lives (J. D. MICHAELIS); or, although he lives, since he yet lives and could do something better than sigh (EWALD). The only sense corresponding to the context is, what does the man as a living one sigh for? As a living one, i. e., as one who still finds himself in this life's school of discipline. How should we in the time appointed for affliction mourn over our afflictions? A living man should not allow himself to be surprised by "the fiery trial" as if thereby some strange thing happened unto him (1 Peter iv. 12): only that happens to him which is natural and inevitable. A man for the punishment of his sins?—Every one on account of his sins. This can only be the answer to the question proposed in the first member of the verse, designed to rectify the evil in view, —not sufferings, but sins should be lamented.

[The difficulties of this verse are great, as is evident from the variety of translations and interpretations it has suffered. Four questions are to be answered. 1. The meaning of the verb rendered complain or murmur? 2. The force of אִישׁ, living? 3. The sense in which a man, אִישׁ, of the second member of the verse is to be taken? 4. Whether the whole verse composes one question, or includes a question and a responsive exhortation or a question and a simple answer?—1. The meaning of the verb נָחַם? ABEN EZRA derived it from נָחַם, and rendered it by נָחַם, to lie (see CALVIN, FUERST, GERLACH). Hence MÜNSTER, taking ver. 88 as a denial of Divine Providence, explains ver. 89 thus: blasphemia hæc vox est 'mentiturque homo in peccatis suis,'—this is a blasphemous saying 'and man is a liar in his sins' (GERLACH). ISAACI derived the verb from נָחַם (FUERST). From this root possibly, by some far-fetched analogy, BROUGHTON brought his unique translation, which has the sole merit of relieving us of the difficulty of explaining a living man, אִישׁ חַי, and a man, אִישׁ, by making one the subject, and the other the object of the verb,—what should living man grudge any person after his sin? But what this means the learned Hebraist has not explained. CALVIN is very positive that the word here and in Numbers, means to weary one's self. "Why should he weary himself, a living man, and a man in his sins? for as long as men thus remain in their own dregs, they will never acknowledge God as the judge of the world, and thus they always go astray through their own perverse imaginations." Others render it in a similar sense: "Why doth he afflict himself by his sins? Why doth he procure evils to himself by the committing of sin?"—"Why doth he vex himself? (to wit, by impatient carriage under God's hand), even a man in his sin, persisting still in the same" (see GATAKER). The Versions and Lexicographers, however, with great unanimity, and apparent reason, derive the verb from נָחַם, to breathe hard, to sigh, and take it in the sense of murmuring, complaining, as above. There is no room to doubt that this is its meaning. 2. What is the force of אִישׁ. PAREAU and ROSENMUELLER, deny that this word is emphatic. They claim that אִישׁ, alone, is used for man, referring to Ps. cxlii. 2, and regard אִישׁ חַי added here, as a mere redundancy of language by Jeremiah, who was not chary of words, verborum non parcior. We are then to take the expression living man, as meaning simply a man, as we often say living man, or mortal man where the adjective is superfluous: (ROSENMUELLER translates the text simply mortalis.) To this we answer 1. The word אִישׁ in Ps. cxlii. 2, is emphatic:—None living, i. e., no living man is just, or innocent in God's sight. The inference may be allowed, possibly intended, that those not now living may have passed into a state of innocency in God's sight. 2. The position of the word after אִישׁ חַי (reminding us, as NAGELSBACH says, of אִישׁ חַי, see gram. note above) and also the accent it bears* show that the word is emphatic. In this case it is difficult to assign any other

* OWEN, in utter violation of the accents, connects אִישׁ חַי with נָחַם, and translates,

Why complain should man,
Any man alive, for his sin?

meaning to it, than that which EWALD and most commentators do, why sighs man living, i. e., since he lives. DR. NAEGLSBACH says it cannot have this meaning: but he gives no reason why it cannot: and his own translation involves this sense, (what does a man sigh for who lives, der lebt?) while his explanation in the commentary, man as a living one (als ein Lebender), "i. e., as one who still finds himself in this life's school of discipline," adds to the original, and what he calls impossible idea, of one who yet lives, another and fanciful notion of his own. MICHAELIS, EWALD, GERLACH, BLAYNEY, BOOTHROYD, HENDERSON and NOYES, all agree in the sense which our English Version seems to suggest, which WORDSWORTH also adopts and explains thus: "Wherefore does a man, whose life is still spared by God's mercy, and to whom, therefore, the door of repentance and pardon is not yet closed, murmur (see Num. xi. 1, where the same word, literally signifying to breathe hard, is used), instead of using his breath and life in order to pray for forgiveness, and to amend his practice?" 8. In what sense are we to take נָכַח, a man, in the second member of the verse? While אָדָם is the generic name for man in the widest sense, נָכַח is supposed to be a more distinctive and honorable designation, as implying a man possessed of many qualities. Some suppose that it is used emphatically here in this sense, as BLAYNEY suggests. Since most languages have a variety of words signifying man, most of the Versions render אָדָם of the first member, and נָכַח of the second, by terms of corresponding significance, as if intending to express an emphasis in the last term,—ἀνδρῶτος, ἀνὴρ; homo, vir; Mensch, Mann,—a distinction that seems to be aimed at in English in a version given by GATAKER, Why should a living wight complain, or murmur, any man for his sin? This distinction, if intended, would give a good sense, Why should a living man, a truly manly man murmur at the punishment of his sins? The Arabic gives the following sense: He who dissolves himself in lamentations and sighs, is a weak man; the strong man is ashamed of his sins (Prediger-Bible). CORN. VAN WAENEN, according to ROSENMUELLER, inferred from the Arabic that וְנָכַח has the sense of being affected with shame, and joining it to נָכַח in spite of the strong disjunctive accent, translated thus: Why does the mean man (homo vilis) dissolve himself in lamentations? The noble man (vir nobilis) will restrain himself for shame on account of his crimes. But there are no proofs or analogies for this strongly contrasted use of אָדָם and נָכַח. We can, however, take נָכַח here, as DR. NAEGLSBACH does, in a sense that אָדָם often has, of every one, each man individually considered. See Joel ii. 8; Jer. xvii. 5, 7; Jos. vii. 14, 17, 18; 1 Chron. xxiii. 8. There are many other passages where the word may be rendered every man or every one. GESSENIUS gives it this meaning in our text. This rendering prevents the necessity of breaking up the verse into two separate and distinct members. 4. Does the whole verse include a single question? Many versions take the first member as a question, and the second as a responsive exhortation. So the old Geneva, which NOYES adopts: Wherefore then murmureth the living man? Let him murmur at his own sins! GERLACH's objections to this are well taken. The antithesis would then require that in the question some cause of murmuring should be stated, which the prophet would indicate as an improper one; as, 'Wherefore murmureth living man on account of his misfortunes?' Let him murmur on account of his sins.' It may be said that the cause may easily be inferred from the context. Still it would seem strange that such an important antithesis was not distinctly expressed. Besides, this rendering makes it necessary, not only to repeat the verb contained in the first member and not expressed in the second, but to change it from the Indicative mood to the Imperative, why does he murmur, let him murmur. These difficulties are overcome by taking the verse as a question and a simple answer, not expressed in a hortatory form. So DR. NAEGLSBACH: Why does the man who lives mourn? Every one on account of his sins. So MAURER, quoted by GERLACH, quid i. e., cur queritur homo dum vivit? Unusquisque ob peccata sua. Hinc illæ lacrymæ! Peccatis sibi quisque contrahit de quibus queritur mala. "Why does man mourn whilst he lives? Every one on account of his sins. Hence those tears! By his sins each one has brought on himself the evils he complains of." A great objection to dividing this verse into question and answer is, that it mars the rhythmical parallelism which is a peculiar feature of this poem [see Intr., Add. Rem., p. 23], and quite destroys the remarkable and beautiful symmetry between the several verses of each triplet, which prevails in this part of the poem. For the same reason that each verse in this triplet should be a question, if one is, each verse ought to contain a question and an answer, if one does,—or else each verse should form an entire question by itself. Besides, the connection seems to require such a construction. The declarations that God does not inflict evil willingly, from His heart, that He does not look with favor on oppression and injustice, and yet that nothing comes to pass without His permission, whether it be evil or good, prepares us for the question, Why then does man murmur when he suffers in the righteous Providence of God for his sins? Why should living man—man whose life is mercifully spared—complain or murmur, every one on account of his sins, i. e., of the effects of his sins? The idea of dividing the sentence into a question and response arose, undoubtedly, from the difficulty of taking נָכַח in the usual sense of a man. But by rendering it every one, and remembering that אָדָם is generic, like homo, ἀνδρῶτος, Mensch, and can be best expressed in English by men, as even in German LUTHER rendered it, Wie murren denn die Leute im Leben also? the apparent difficulty of construction entirely disappears. Why should living men complain or murmur, every one on account of his sins? There can be no valid objection to understanding sins as put for their effects, the sufferings or punishment they involve. So most of the versions and interpreters. Or we can take sin in the sense of guilt, liability to punishment. WORDSWORTH: "Literally, for his sins—for his own fault. Why does the sinner murmur at God for that which he has brought on himself by his own sin, and which may be removed by repentance?

See what follows."—The Future form of the verb implies here a conditional sense, why should, etc. —W. H. H.]

III. 40-42.

40 Let us search and try our ways, and turn again to the LORD. Let us lift 41 up our heart with our hands unto God in the heavens. We have transgressed 42 and have rebelled: thou hast not pardoned.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 40.—פָּשַׁע, perfidere, perestigare, is not found in Jeremiah. See Ps. lxi. 7; Prov. ii. 4; xx. 27.—חָקַר, fidere, eruere, perscrutari, occurs in Jer. xvii. 10; xxxi. 37.—[GERLACH: "The LXX have taken the forms נִחַשְׁתָּהּ and נִקְרָהּ for fem. part. niph."]—עָדָה is emphatic, EWALD, § 217, a. let us go back, not half way, but the whole. [ROSENMUELLER and THENIUS deny that it is emphatic, and represent it as equivalent to לָא. GERLACH agrees with NAEGLERBACH, and refers to Hos. xiv. 2, 3, where both prepositions stand side by side with a difference of meaning not to be mistaken.]

Ver. 41.—לָא is cumulative, as Lev. xviii. 18; Ez. xlv. 7. [Also Ez. vii. 26. The unusual use of this preposition led the Rabbins to fanciful interpretations of the text. Some have put upon it the mystical sense, lift up our heart to our hands, in order to second prayer with practice, (GATAKER).—W. H. H.]—לִבְּנוֹ לָא occurs only here. אֵל בְּשָׁמַיִם occurs not in Jer. See Deut. iii. 24; 1 Kings viii. 23.

Ver. 42.—נִחַשְׁתָּהּ, only occurs six times in the Old Testament, viz., besides here, Gen. xlii. 11; Ex. xvi. 7, 8; Num. xxxii. 33; 2 Sam. xvii. 12, seems to be chosen here only for the sake of the acrostic. [Very likely; yet, as a master of art, the Poet has made the necessity of the choice subserve the force and beauty of thought and expression. נִחַשְׁתָּהּ and נִקְרָהּ, both expressed, are emphatic and antithetical.—W. H. H.]—פָּשַׁע in Jer. ii. 8, 29; iii. 13, etc.—כָּרַדְתָּ, See i. 13, 20; Jer. iv. 17, v. 23.—כָּלָה, frequently in Jer. v. 1, 7; xxxi. 34, etc.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Ver. 39 constitutes the transition to something new. If there must be sighing, let it be sighing over sin says ver. 39. This exhortation is responded to in vers. 40-42, for these contain a penitential lamentation of the people for their sins. This shows that our explanation of the last member of ver. 39 is right. For, unless חָטָא, sin, be taken in the entirely inadmissible sense of punishment (MEIER, EWALD), [E. V. See notes on ver. 39], that second member of ver. 39 cannot be taken as a continuation of the question, but only in the sense of an affirmatory restriction, as we have done. It is to be observed, moreover, that the Poet here again speaks in the first person plural. We have shown above, at ver. 22 (תִּתְנֶנִּי), that the consoling hope, declared in the passage beginning with ver. 22, rests directly upon the fact that the people is not extinct, that there is yet a kernel remaining which can serve as a point of connection for the restoration. After the Poet, on the ground of this matter of fact, which he regarded as a pledge for the continuance of Divine grace, had made known his hope, and declared likewise his convictions that sufferings were no real misfortune, and that not on their account, but for sin, should men sigh, it is entirely natural that he utters the penitential lamentation, enjoined in ver. 39, not in his own name alone, but in that of the whole people. For the sufferings, of which he had before spoken, were not in fact punishments for his sins; but they were the righteous chastisement of the sin of the whole people. The whole people then has to join in the penitential lamentation, which the Poet begins to sing in ver. 40.

Ver. 40. All true penitence must begin with acknowledgment of sin. But the knowledge of sin with men is the result of candid self-examination. Therefore, the penitential lamentation of the people begins with an exhortation to self-examination. Let us search and try our ways. Let us examine our ways and search. [Instead of murmuring against God, let us examine and search our conduct for the causes of God's displeasure and our misfortunes, in order to correct them.—W. H. H.]—And turn again to the LORD.—And return to Jehovah. The preposition in the Hebrew is forcible. [See Gram. note above]. Let us go, not half way back, but all the way back to Jehovah. Such a half-way return was, for example, the Reformation under Josiah; see Jer. iv. 1-4, and the remarks at that place. This idea of returning to Jehovah, as is well known, plays a very conspicuous role in Jeremiah; see iii. 1, 4, 12; viii. 4, 5; xxxi. 16-22, and the comments on those passages. [HENDERSON: "From the assumption of the plural in this and the immediately following verses, it is obvious that, in those which just precede, Jeremiah has in view the punishment to which the Jews, as a people, were subjected."]

Ver. 41. Let us lift up our heart with—together with—our hands unto God in the Heavens.—Without the lifting up of heart and hands to God there is naturally no right return to God imaginable. [CALVIN: "He bids us banish all hypocrisy from our prayers. * * When affliction comes, it is a common thing with all to raise up their hands to heaven, though no one should bid them to do so; but still their hearts remain fixed on the earth, and they come not to God. * * As prayers, when they are earnest, move the hands, our Prophet refers to that practice as useful. At the same time he teaches us that the chief thing ought not to be omitted, even to raise up the hearts to God; Let us, then, he says, raise up our hearts together with our hands to God; and, he adds, to God who is in Heaven: for it is necessary that men should rise up above the world and go out of themselves, so to speak, in order to come to God." It should not be overlooked that the Prophet connects the outward forms of expression with the heart's sincerity as constituting the prayer of true penitence. There is nothing here to encourage those to think that they pray, who discard the attitude and gestures and even words of prayer, and fancy that they pray in their hearts. That prayer is an unuttered desire, a trembling emotion of the soul, a sigh, a tear, the glancing of an eye,—are only poetical truths, and, in plain prose, are only half-truths, and, as sometimes understood, half-falsehoods. The Bible never separates the prayer of the heart from its formal expression in words and acts.—W. H. H.]

Ver. 42. The first half of the verse attains the summit of the succession of thoughts begun in ver. 40, and to which the path was broken in ver. 39.—We have transgressed and rebelled.—We have sinned and have been disobedient. [Rebelled is a better rendering. The pronoun we, doubly expressed in the original, as the first word in the sentence and in the forms of the verb, "is here emphatical, as though the faithful had taken on themselves the blame of all the evils, which the greater part ever sought to disown" (CALVIN). OWEN: "To give the proper emphasis to the pronoun, the version ought to be as follows, We, transgressed have we, and re- belled."—W. H. H.]—By these words the exhortation contained in last clause of ver. 39 is complied with, for they are the expression of a deep and sincere grief for sin. The second half of the verse constitutes, in a way similar to that of the last clause of ver. 39, the transition to what follows. For the words—Thou hast not pardoned—constitute an intermediate member between the two statements, which have respectively for their subjects, guilt and punishment. Guilt is followed with punishment, if not pardoned. That it is not pardoned in the present instance, this last clause of the verse declares.—Observe the pronouns answering to each other, We—Thou. [Both doubly expressed in the Hebrew. Both, therefore, emphatic.—W. H. H.]—Hence it is evident that the Poet does not wish to reproach the Lord, but, on the contrary, to make His proceedings conspicuous. [HENDERSON: "The confession is supposed to be made while the exile still continued. There is implied a fervent hope, that now it was made, the captivity would be reversed."—The breaking up of this verse into two distinct separate propositions is not such an injury to the versification as was deprecated in ver. 39. Because we have now passed the section where the symmetrical uniformity of the verses was to be preserved: because, again, this verse is a real transition to what follows, with which it is so intimately connected that GERLACH begins the new section with ver. 40: because, again, the We, וְאֵנִי, and Thou, אַתָּה, preserve a perfect antithesis, and give us a parallelism in sentiment as well as in rhythm: and because, finally, the poetical effect of this abrupt appeal to God, like the sudden outburst at the end of i. 11, See, O Jehovah, and consider, justifies the departure from the stricter forms of construction.—W. H. H.]

ANALYSIS.

The third part, vers. 43-66, is to be compared to the night returning again after the day. From ver. 43 to ver. 48, the Poet speaks in the first person plural. The whole people unite in describing the severe calamity suffered on account of God's wrath. From ver. 48 to the end, the Poet again speaks in the first person singular. But in the first part of this passage, in vers. 48-51, the common misfortune is still the subject of his lamentation. He begins again to speak of himself in ver. 52. He first describes, vers. 52-54, the terrible ill-treatment suffered at the hands of men, according to Jer. xxxviii. 6. Vers. 55-66 contain a prayer, so that this Song, as well as the first and second, closes with a prayer. This prayer is in three parts. Vers. 55-58, thanks for deliverance from the grave. Vers. 59-63, a statement of all the injury which his enemies had done, and were constantly doing to the Prophet. Vers. 64-66, a prayer for righteous vengeance. The symmetry of the external form, which we have observed in the middle section of the Song, is wanting here, as it is also in the first part of the Song. For according to the sense, first, five verses are connected together, vers. 43-47; then, four, vers. 48-51; then, three, vers. 52-54; finally, twelve, which are again separated into subdivisions of four, five and three verses. The articulations of the discourse no longer correspond with the triplets of verses: neither is the symmetry of the initial words carried out.

As the evening twilight gradually deepens into night, so the discourse of our Poet passes over from the bright day-light of consolation, which irradiates the noble central section of our book, back again into the gloomy description of those sufferings with which Israel and the Prophet of the Lord were punished. We stand at the threshold of the last of the three sections of the third Song. If not exactly, yet almost exactly has the Poet distributed the lights and shadows, so that the first and the last of the three parts contain the shadows, and the second one affords the light. For of the 66 verses of the chapter, 22 constitute a third part. But the middle section, after the transition verses, 19-21, extends from ver. 22 to ver. 40, after which vers. 40-42 follow as another transition, corresponding to the first one as the evening twilight does to the dawning of the morning. If we add both of these transition passages to the middle section, then the first of the three sections consists of 18, the second of 24, and the last again of 24 verses.

III. 43-47.

43 Thou hast covered with anger, and persecuted us: thou hast slain, thou hast not 44 pitied. Thou hast covered thyself with a cloud, that our prayer should not pass 45 through. Thou hast made us as the offscouring and refuse in the midst of the peo-46, 47 ple. All our enemies have opened their mouths against us. Fear and a snare is come upon us, desolations and destruction.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 43.—כָּכָךְ, which does not occur in Jeremiah, is used as a direct causative, as afterwards, ver. 44; See Ps. cxl. 8. [GERLACH: "Gesenius Thea., and Otto take כָּכָךְ as a reflective verb." Otto, quoted by ROSENMÜLLER, says At reciproce verbum כָּכָךְ usurpari posse, non dubium; but he prefers here to supply nos as the object of the verb. To make the prom. suff. in תָּרַד בְּכָנִי the object of כָּכָךְ, however, is impossible, since the latter, when it has the meaning of covering, is always construed with עַל, or לְ affixed to its object.—W. H. H.]—בָּאֵן, see Jer. xxi. 5.—[אָלָה. HENDERSON: "Upwards of eighty MSS., twelve printed editions, the ALEX. copy of the LXX., the Arab., Syr., Vulg. and Targ., read אָלָה."]

Ver. 44.—Jeremiah uses only the plural of עָנָן, and that only once, iv. 13.—כַּעֲבוֹר הַפְּלִיָּה, for the construction, see my Gr., § 106, 6. [The preposition כִּן is very peculiarly used as a negative. When the idea of motion from a place is involved, then that which is denied is connected with the verb simply by כִּן. NARGELSBACH'S Gr., § 106, 6.]

Ver. 45.—כָּחִי, כָּחִי, delergere, coerrere, Est. xxvi. 4, is sweepings, dirt. It occurs only here. [In Is. v. 25 we have כָּחִי, sweeping, refuse, filth (J. A. ALEXANDER).—W. H. H.]—כָּאֵלֶּם, as a substantive, only here. See EWALD, § 240, a.—Jeremiah expresses the thought contained in this verse in another fashion, see xv. 4; xxiv. 9; xxix. 18; xxxiv. 17; xlii. 18.—הַעֲפִיִּים seems to imply the dispersion of Israel among the nations. בְּכָרֵב is nowhere found in Jeremiah, he always uses instead בְּתוֹךְ, xlii. 16; xxix. 32; xl. 1; xli. 8, etc.; once only he uses בְּכָרֵב, vi. 1, and besides בְּכָרֵב with suffixes frequently iv. 14; xiv. 9; xxiii. 9, etc. [Certainly then בְּכָרֵב is not foreign to his style.—W. H. H.]

Ver. 47.—פָּחַד וּפְחַת is a quotation from Jer. xlviii. 43; Is. xxiv. 17.—הַשָּׂאת וְהַשְׁכֵּר. The peronomasia, an imitation of פָּחַד וּפְחַת, is an invention of our Poet, for it is found only here.—שָׂאת, apparently from שָׂאָה, tumultuari, strepere, is contracted from שָׂאת. In Num. xxiv. 17, is found שָׂת. The meaning seems to be the same as that of שָׂאָן, strepitus, tumultus. See שָׂאָן, Jer. xlviii. 45, and the remarks at that place. Also וְשָׂרָה, Is. lix. 7; lx. 18.—שָׂכָר, see ver. 46; ii. 11, 13; iv. 10, is very frequent with Jeremiah, iv. 20; vi. 14; viii. 11, 21, etc.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Ver. 43. Thou hast covered with anger, and persecuted us.—Thou madest out of Thy wrath a veil [or covering] and didst pursue us. As Thou hast not pardoned, ver. 42, constitutes a negative term of connection, so does Thou madest a covering of Thy wrath a positive one. For the veil of wrath with which the Lord covers Himself, conceals in its bosom the lightnings of wrath of which the Poet proceeds to speak. [The causative meaning given to the verb by Dr. NARGELSBACH, and implied, though not affirmed by GERLACH, is certainly possible (see Ps. xci. 4, לָךְ, פָּאֲכַרְתִּי, lit., With his wing He will make, or provide, J. A. ALEXANDER, a covering for thee), and is strongly recommended here by the absence of an object expressed. He made a covering of the wrath and pursued us, is the same as saying, He enveloped Himself in His wrath and pursued us. The definite article before wrath, the wrath, points to Jehovah's wrath, and makes the reflective force of the verb more apparent. In the next verse, where the cloud does not specify any particular cloud, but only clouds generically, the expression of לָךְ, for Thyself, is more elegant. These slight grammatical distinctions can hardly be expressed in English, in which it is best to give the same form in both verses.—The purpose of the covering is not that of concealment, but of preparation for the pursuit of His enemies. He dismisses His pity and gathers His wrath around Him as a veil that covers the whole person, that He may slay and not pity. Or His wrath itself may be regarded as furnishing His weapons of offence, the armory out of which flash the lightnings of His wrath. Therefore the objection of J. D. MICHAELIS, BOETTCHER and THENIUS, that he who conceals himself, does not pursue others (although a concealed enemy may, nevertheless, be a pursuer), is not valid. We must either take the verb in a causative or reflective sense, or supply לָךְ, Thyself, from the next verse. This last is exceedingly awkward. If the order of the verses was reversed, this might be tolerated, though even then it is inconsistent with the usual independent completeness of each separate verse in the Lamentations. But to say "Thou didst cover with wrath"—and then hold the mind in suspense, as to the object covered, till it is announced in the next verse, is awkward to say the least, and certainly has the effect, as THENIUS asserts, of throwing all that follows the word wrath into a parenthesis.—Our English Version and others which make us, at the end of the verse, the object of the covering cannot be correct if the verb is here used in the sense of covering (see Gram. note above). Some old expositors, alluded to by GATAKER, take the verb in the sense of being hedged in. BLAYNEY and OWEN take it in this sense, and suppose an allusion to the practice of hunters, who surrounded their game with toils, and then attacked them. Thou hast fenced in with anger and chased us (BLAYNEY). Thou hast in wrath enclosed us and chased us (OWEN). But how can there be an allusion to this practice of hunters in the next verse, where they give the verb the same meaning,—Thou hast enclosed Thyself in a cloud (OWEN)? HENDERSON also, without allusion to hunting however, gives the verb in both verses a similar meaning, Thou hast shut us up in anger,—Thou hast shut Thyself up in a cloud. But the Hebrew verb when followed by the preposition ל, to, prefixed to the pronoun, as it is in the next verse, certainly means covering one's self with something, as with a garment or a veil. See ver. 44, note. Hence it is best to take it in the same sense in this verse.—W. H. H.]—Thou hast slain, thou hast not pitied.—Thou didst kill without mercy. [The E. V. is more literal. Many versions have spared, instead of pitied. The latter meaning is better here, and the more usual signification of the verb when not joined to a preposition. See ii. 2, 17.—W. H. H.] See ii. 21. Here begins the enumeration of the aggressive acts of the Divine punishment, through which the wrath, as it were, spent itself. See ver. 66; i. 6; Jer. xxix. 18, etc.

Ver. 44. Thou hast covered thyself with a cloud, that our prayer should not pass through.—Thou madest of the cloud a covering for Thyself that no prayer could pass through. See at ver. 8. The twice recurring verb כִּסְתָּהּ, thou coveredst, has been differently interpreted. EWALD would take what follows the word wrath, in ver. 43, as a parenthesis. But these words closely connected with what precedes by 1 consecutive, contain no mere secondary thought. Others (LUTHER, THENIUS) translate, Thou hast covered (overwhelmed) us with wrath. But the verb has always and only the meaning of friendly sheltering, veiling or covering: and further, in that case we would expect at least נִכְסְתָּהּ [instead of כִּסְתָּהּ, with wrath, instead of with the wrath]. But, aside from the constraint put upon the Poet by the alphabetical arrangement [inducing him to repeat the same word for the sake of the initial letter], I think that two grades or kinds of covering are indicated. The first was that, in consequence of which persecution and war came upon Israel,—the second was that, in consequence of which, God heard not the prayers addressed to Him amidst the calamity of war. In favor of this view is the twofold nature of the veils or coverings indicated. The first time it is the wrath with which the Lord envelops Himself. Out of this veil of wrath shoot forth the lightnings, as out of a thunder-cloud, which kindle the fire of war in Israel. The second time the veil or covering is only a gloomy, dense cloud, which, like a bulwark, prevents prayer from passing through. Whether the Poet here thought of the historical pillar of cloud (Ps. xcix. 7), or of an ideal one (Ps. xcvi. 2), must remain undecided. See, besides ver. 8; Ps. lv. 2, and especially Sir. xxxii. 16, 17.

Ver. 45. Thou hast made us as the off-scouring and refuse in the midst of the people.—Thou didst make us off-scourings and refuse in the midst of the nations. Since the Lord permitted no prayer to pass through to Him, the work of destruction, spoken of in ver. 43, made unimpeded progress; the consequence of which was, that Israel, ground down to the dust, is now an object of contempt among heathen nations. [Off-scouring, sweepings, what is swept away.—Refuse, what is rejected as worthless, what is thrown away.—CALVIN: "Paul says, that he and his associates were the off-scouring (περιψήματα) of the world, 1 Cor. iv. 13. He means that they were despised as off-scourings or scrapings. * * What the Prophet had in view is not obscure; for he means that the degradation of the people was not hidden, but open to all nations, as though God had erected a theatre in Judea, and there exhibited a remarkable and an unusual example of His vengeance,"—among the nations. WORDSWORTH: "The nations, among which we Israelites are scattered. Such the Jewish nation has been for 1800 years; and such it will remain till it turn to God in Christ."—W. H. H.] See Is. xxiv. 13.

Ver. 46. Here again, in the order of the initial letters, D is followed by D, and not Y. That this was the original order of the verses and not the result of later changes, the context undeniably proves. It is, therefore, certainly incomprehensible how any one could have thought of placing the triad of vers. 46-48, after that of vers. 49-51 (MEIER) [BOOTHROYD, likewise].—All our enemies have opened their mouths against us.—gaped at us with their mouth. This verse, which contains only a more particular definition of what is meant by בִּלְעָם [refuse, or as Dr. NÄGELSACH translates it Schande, shame, disgrace] in ver. 45, has already occurred almost word for word, in ii. 16, which see.

Ver. 47. Fear and a snare—terror and the pit. A quotation from Jer. xlviii. 43; Is. xxiv. 17. [CALVIN, BROUGHTON, BLAYNEY, NOYES, NÄGELSACH and GERLACH, all translate the second word pit, as it is rendered in Jeremiah and Isaiah, in the places cited above. In the latter place, Dr. J. A. ALEXANDER says, "It is a probable, though not a necessary supposition, that the terms here used are borrowed from the ancient art of hunting. פֶּחַח [fear] would then denote some device by which wild beasts were frightened into snares and pitfalls. It is at least a remarkable coincidence that the Romans gave the name formido to an apparatus used for this purpose." We may, however, take fear in its usual sense, without destroying the allusion to hunted wild beasts, suggested in this passage by pit, and in Jeremiah and Isaiah by pit and snare. He who flies for terror falls into the pit. So JARCHI, quoted by GERLACH. CALVIN: "He compares here the anxieties into which the people had been brought, to a pitfall and dread. * * The meaning is, that the people had been reduced to such straits, that there was no outlet for them; * * filled with dread, they sought refuge, but saw pitfalls on every side."—W. H. H.] Is come upon us.—fell to our lot [happened to us, or came upon us], desolation and destruction—shame and hurt. [The E. V. is better, and is adopted by most versions. See Gram. note above.—W. H. H.] In these pithy and forcible words the Poet sums up all that Israel had suffered.

III. 48-51.

48 Mine eye runneth down with rivers of water for the destruction of the daughter 49 of my people. Mine eye tricklETH down, and ceaseth not, without any intermission.
 50, 51 Till the LORD look down, and behold from heaven. Mine eye affecteth mine heart, because of all the daughters of my city.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 48.—The first clause is found in Ps. cxix. 136, almost word for word. For construction, see my Gr., § 63, 2 a. [After verbs of plenty and want, the accusative denotes the more remote object (Naso. Gr.).—פְּלֶגֶשׁ Jeremiah never uses. [Observe it is here the initial word, where special choice and even preference for novelty of expression would be expected.—W. H. H.]

Ver. 49.—The verb פָּגַשׁ, of which Jeremiah uses the Hiphil, once only [Jeremiah seems to have been predisposed to use words only once,—so new words in Lamentations need not surprise us, Jeremiah being the author.—W. H. H.], xviii. 21, occurs only in Niph., Hiph. and Hoph. Such places as 2 Sam. xiv. 14; Job xx. 28; Ps. lxxvii. 3, give it the sense of overflowing, as well as of being poured out.—וְלֹא הִרְכִּינָהּ reminds us of וְלֹא הִרְכִּינָהּ, Jer. xiv. 17.—כָּאֵין הַפְּנוּת־ seems to be only another form of the same thought in Ps. lxxvii. 3, where we read the words וְלֹא הִפְנוּ כֹנֶן is debilem, languidum esse, viribus defici (Gen. xlv. 26; Hab. i. 4). Both כָּאֵין, il. 18, and הַפְּנוּת־ signify remissio, relaxatio. Both are ā. Aey. See il. 18 and remarks there.

Ver. 50.—פָּגַשׁ (comp. σκαρ-σκαθαί, spectare) is prospicere, despicere. It occurs only in Hiph. and Niph.; is not found in Jeremiah; see Deut. xxvi. 15; Ps. xiv. 2; lili. 3; cli. 20, in all of which places the word is used with the addition of כְּפָרוֹם or כְּשִׁטְמוֹ.

Ver. 51.—If we compare the Hithp. הִתְעַלֵּל, which in such places as Num. xxii. 29; Judg. xix. 25; 1 Sam. xxxi. 4; Jer. xxxviii. 19, has the sense of satisfying one's desire by violence; if, further, we compare the substantives עֲלִילָה, עֲלִיָּה, and כַּעֲלָל, which denote, not merely generally fucinus, a deed, but also especially a bad deed (see Deut. xxii. 14, 17; Ps. cxli. 4; Ez. xx. 43; Jer. xiv. 18; xl. 18, etc.);—there can be no doubt that the idea of doing a harm inheres in the Poet also. In i. 12, 22; ii. 20, where also this word occurs, this idea is made expressly apparent by other words of this sense. But we are authorized by the above citations, to take the word in this sense, without such express indication of its meaning in the context. [GERLACH: עוֹלָל with ל, to do some one an injury, occurs in i. 12, 22; ii. 20; therefore there is nothing unusual in the ל here, as EWALD says.]-BÜTTCHER would read יַעֲרִי בְּפוֹת עֵינַי, of all the weeping of my city. But even if Piel is authorized by Jer. xxxi. 15; Ez. viii. 14,—and בָּל with the Inf., by Deut. iv. 7, yet יַעֲרִי בְּפוֹתֵי would be expected [and then would be ungrammatical, as GERLACH shows]. But no change in the reading is necessary.—יָזֶן is causal, as Deut. vii. 7, 8; Joel iv. 19; Is. liii. 5; Prov. xx. 4, etc.—עֵינַי, Is. xlv. 13; 2 Sam. xix. 38.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Vers. 48-51. These four verses treat of the eye of the speaker, as the organ by means of which he manifests his pain:—for ver. 50 contains only a thought subordinated to that of ver. 49. The new succession of thoughts begins with the last member of a triad (the D triad). Nothing like this has occurred before in this Song [where the triplets have been remarkable for their unification]. Would the Poet thus intimate that he has passed the culmination-point of his Poem, and therefore the culmination-point of its artistic structure also? It is not easy to decide. Besides, the fact that these verses are of the character of one sustained and continuous transition period, is itself an indication of artistic execution. For while in these verses the Poet himself is the speaker, yet he speaks of his own pain with reference to the public calamity [thus connecting what is here said with what precedes], whilst from ver. 52 he not only himself speaks, but he speaks of himself [so that these verses form a connecting link with what follows, and the subject gracefully passes from the public calamities to the private griefs of the speaker.—W. H. H.].

Ver. 48. Mine eye runneth down with rivers of water.—See Ps. cxix. 136. We find the same sentiment in Jer. viii. 23 [E. V., ix. 1], ix. 17 [E. V., ix. 18], xiii. 17; xiv. 17; Lam. i. 16.—For the destruction of the daughter of my people.—See ii. 11.

Ver. 49. Mine eye tricklETH down, and ceaseth not, without any intermission.—Mine eye overflows unceasingly, without intermission. [Lit., My eye is poured out, or overflows, and ceaseth not, so as not to be (from not being) intermission. In correct English, My eye overfloweth, unceasingly without intermission. GERLACH: “intermissions, not of miseries (MICHAELIS, ROSENMUELLER, see Vulg.), but so that there is no cessation, without discontinuance. See Lexicons and EWALD, § 323, a.”—W. H. H.]

Ver. 50. Till—or until—the LORD—Jehovah—look down and behold from Heaven.—As already remarked, this is a thought subordinate to that of ver. 49, which it limits, or qualifies. The Poet's tears shall flow without ceasing, not absolutely for ever, but until the Lord, by graciously regarding them, shall cause them to cease. [When God looks down and beholds, He begins to hear prayer and afford saving grace. See Ps. cii. 19, 20. HENDERSON translates, While Jehovah looketh down and beholdeth from Heaven, and remarks, “The Prophet regarded it as a great aggravation of the calamity, that the Lord should see it all, and yet not interpose for its removal." But this is to take the Hebrew preposition וְ, in an unusual sense, and is wholly inconsistent with the constant tenor of Bible language, which represents God as averting His face from those who offend Him, and as looking only on those who are objects of His favor. Besides, here God has wrapped Himself in His wrath, ver. 43, and in dark impenetrable clouds, ver. 44, that He may not be moved to compassion either by the sight or the cries of the sufferers.—W. H. H.]

Ver. 51. The description passes, as it were, from without to within. In vers. 48, 49, the weeping of the Poet had been described with regard to its extent [its unintermitted continuance], but here the intensity of that weeping is made apparent from its internal effect on his soul.—Mine eye affecteth mine heart (marg., my soul)—Mine eye paineth my soul [or gives it pain, that meiner Seele weh, makes my soul ache.] The eye hurts the soul, when it increases the pain of the soul, by adding thereto a physical pain. It is true that weeping is generally a relief to the sorrowful. But when weeping weakens the eye so that it smarts, then the soul, as I said, feels that as an aggravation of its own pain. See Ps. vi. 7. [CALVIN: "Mine eye grieves my soul. He had said, that his eye flowed down, and then, that it was like a fountain, from which many streams or rivers flowed: he now adopts another mode of speaking, that his eye troubled or grieved his soul." BROUGHTON: Mine eye worketh into my soul. BLAYNEY: Mine eye worketh trouble to my soul. NOYES and GERLACH take my soul as if it were simply a personal pronoun. Mine eye is painful to me (NOYES), or pains me (GERLACH).]

But to my soul, לְנַפְשִׁי, as the expressed object of the verb, is indubitably emphatic. So WORDSWORTH: "Mine eye vexeth my soul (nephesh), the seat of passion (see ver. 20) by the misery which it sees, and for which it weeps." See Gram. notes above.—W. H. H.].—Because of all the daughters of my city. It is not necessary to change the Hebrew here, as BÜRTNER proposes (see Gram. notes above), for i. 4, 18; ii. 10, 21, show that the Poet regarded the sad fate of the tender virgins as one of the culmination points of the general calamity. For the same reason, I do not think that by the daughters of my city are intended daughter cities. [Töchterstädte, i. e., cities dependent on Jerusalem. So EWALD. BLAYNEY too: "Probably the lesser cities and towns dependent on the metropolis are hereby intended, see Jer. xlix. 2."'] The Poet nowhere else refers to such cities. Besides, it should be observed, that daughters of my city is in parallelism with daughter of my people, ver. 48. This gives a beautiful symmetry to the whole paragraph; the first and last verses, vers. 48, 51, each closes with a statement of a reason for his weeping, while the intervening verses describe the extent and character of his weeping. [The English version indicates in the margin a possible translation, which CALVIN alone has had the audacity to adopt: Mine eye affecteth mine heart more than all the daughters of my city. This would seem to mean, that his heart was more affected by his own grief, than by that of all the daughters of Jerusalem; or, that his grief affected his own heart, more than it did the daughters of his city. But CALVIN explains it as meaning, that he wept more than all the girls in Jerusalem! "As the female sex, as it is well known, are more tender and softer than men, the Prophet amplifies his lamentation by this comparison, that in weeping he exceeded all the young women of the city, so that he had almost forgotten his manhood." KALKAR takes the daughters of the city in the impossible sense of incolæ urbis (an ingenious adoption of a feminine form used for common gender), and translates I was more vehemently affected than all the inhabitants of the city. The simple and natural translation of the words gives such good sense and is so in harmony with the sentiments of the whole poem, as shown above, that it is astonishing what wasteful invention has been used to find out some other sense.—W. H. H.]

III. 52-54.

52, 53 Mine enemies chased me sore, like a bird, without cause. They have cut off my life in the dungeon, and cast a stone upon me. Waters flowed over mine head; then I said, I am cut off.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 52.—The verb צָוָר Jeremiah uses once, xvi. 16.—צָוָר Jeremiah never uses. [Jeremiah often uses צֹרִי in the collective sense for fowl or birds. In one single verse, xii. 9, he twice uses עֵיט, meaning birds of prey, ravenous birds. This passage in Lamentations is the only place where he has occasion to speak of a single bird pursued by the hunter. If he had ever used another word in the same sense, צָוָר would have been chosen for this place for the sake of the alliteration, צָוָר צָרִי, and also as suggesting the twittering of the helpless victim.—W. H. H.].—The expression הָיָה occurs only here. In Ps. xxxv. 19; lxi. 5, הָיָה occurs, both times in parallelism with הָיָה. This shows that הָיָה belongs, as an adverbial qualification, to הָיָה, not to צָרִי.

Ver. 53.—צָרָה occurs in Kal only here. Niph. is without doubt extingui (Job xxiii. 17), exarescere (of water, Job xl. 17); Piel is perdre, to destroy (Ps. lxxxviii. 17; cxix. 137); Hiph. has the same sense (Ps. xviii. 41; liv. 7; lxi. 5, etc.). צָרָה might indeed have an intransitive sense, to be sunk in silence, in speechlessness, that is to say, to be destroyed, to per ish, in favor of which sense are the kindred roots רָחַם, רָחַם, רָחַם, and the Dialects. [So HENDERSON: They have made my life silent in the dungeon.] But since in all the parallel members of the paragraph, vers. 52-54, the enemies are the subject, it is necessary to regard them as the subject of צָרָה also, and to take this word in a transitive sense. If צָרָה signifi = destroy, צָרָה can signify in the pit, or into the pit. In the latter case it would be constr. pregnans. This would be more correct, because it better answers to the fact. For the enemies did not succeed in destroying the life of the prophet in the pit, but casting it down into the pit for the purpose of destruction.—וְיָרֶם with reference to the form, see וְיָרֶם, ver.

33 [GREEN'S Gr., § 150, 2.]

Ver. 54.—וְיָרֶם is manare, Auere. Kal occurs only here. Elsewhere the Hiphil at two places, Deut. xi. 4; 2 Kings vi 6. [The use of Kal may indicate that the word here denotes, not as in Hiphil, dashing over, overwhelming, but, like וְיָרֶם and וְיָרֶם, to melt, dissolve, flow, trickle down. This sense is favored by the preposition עַל, to, on, not over.—W. H. H.]—וְיָרֶם, see וְיָרֶם, ver. 18.—וְיָרֶם is dissecare, discindere. Jeremiah never uses it. Niph., besides here, in Ia li i. 8; Pa. lxxxviii. 6; Ez. xxxvii. 11, etc.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Vers. 52-54. The speaker here returns to the description of his own personal sufferings. The central point of these sufferings is the pit, into which the Prophet has been thrown, and that by enemies who were personally hostile to him without cause (ver. 52), and who pursued him incessantly (ver. 52) with vindictiveness and mockery (vers. 60-63). Ought we to interpret all that is said of the pit as merely figurative? So far as what is said of the pit alone, this could be done. But what the Poet says of his enemies, cannot possibly be a mere figure of speech. When he mourns that though he had given them no cause for hatred, they had, nevertheless, incessantly insulted him and pursued him with measureless vengeance,—this surely is no figurative way of speaking. We have already shown that the subject who speaks in this song (except in those parts in which the Poet speaks in the first person plural) cannot be the people. The enemies, further, cannot be the Chaldeans, because they are called those that are my enemies without cause, and because the Poet speaks of his being already delivered from their power and now only invokes [not deliverance from them but] the vengeance of God upon them (vers. 55-56). On the other hand, Jeremiah speaks of his enemies, xx. 7-12, exactly as is done here. He describes their insulting mockery (For I heard the defaming of many) and their vindictiveness (we shall take our revenge on him, וְנִקְחָה נִקְחָה כִּפְלֹא, ver. 10, comp. Lam. iii. 60), and hopes that God will avenge him upon them (let me see thy vengeance on them, ver. 12). Since the description of his enemies in this place exactly corresponds with that which Jeremiah gives of his enemies, all of which is confirmed by so many facts related in his prophetic book (xi. 18-20; xii. 1-6; xvi. 8; xxvii. 11-15; xxxviii. 4-6), can we doubt that what is said of the pit should be taken literally, especially if we consider the fact that what is here said agrees substantially with what Jeremiah says, chap. xxxviii., of the pit into which he was actually thrown by his enemies? We are sure, therefore, that the Poet here had in his eye the persecutions which Jeremiah suffered from his enemies. He personates Jeremiah. The chief subject of the third song is Jeremiah.

Ver. 52. Mine enemies chased me sore, like a bird, without cause.—Hunted, hunted have they me like a bird, all mine enemies without cause. Like a bird: see Ps. xi. 1, where the soul of the persecuted innocent is likewise compared to a bird. [They that were without cause mine enemies hunted me down like a bird. So BLAYNEY and NOYES render the verb רָצַח, which seems to mean, not to hunt, in the abstract sense, but to obtain by hunting, to seize, to lay hold of, and as used here in an intensive sense, would imply persevering and successful hunting. DOUAY: My enemies have chased me and caught me like a bird. Hunted me down like a bird expresses the idea suggested by the comparison.—As even a bird is at last tired out and hunted down by a persevering pursuer. The point of the comparison is the perseverance of the successful hunter in pursuit of a bird: as David says of Saul's tireless and remorseless pursuit of him, "The King of Israel is come out to seek a flea, as when one doth hunt a partridge in the mountains" (1 Sam. xxvi. 20). This idea is expressed in the Paris ed., 1805, of the French, Ceux qui sont mes ennemis sans cause m'ont poursuivi à outrance, comme on poursuit un oiseau. The French of MARTIN gives the same sense. The commentators generally fail to explain the comparison. CALVIN, who supposes the lack of "both prudence and courage" in birds is referred to, is evidently wrong, both as to the fact that birds are thus deficient, and as to its application here. Both GRESNIUS and FÜRST explain the verb, רָצַח, as used here, in the sense of lying snares as for a bird. This gives a good sense, and carries out the comparison; but it is adopted by none of the versions, and seems inconsistent with the general use of the verb and the intensive meaning suggested by the duplication.—W. H. H.]

Ver. 53. They have cut off my life in the dungeon.—They destroyed in the pit my life [i. e., sought to destroy it. See Gram. notes above. From Jer. xxxviii. 4, it is certain that their object in throwing him into the pit was to kill him.—W. H. H.]—And cast a stone upon me,—and threw stones upon me. But should we translate they threw stones upon me, or they cast a stone over me [i. e., over the mouth of the pit]? Jer. xxxviii. says nothing of either the one or the other. Yet it is possible that Jeremiah, whose statements in that chapter were confined, with admirable reserve, to the principal circumstances, might have omitted this point. And it is also possible that the author of our song, in case he were not Jeremiah himself, may have added this particular, either from hearsay, or out of his own invention. [The addition of a new fact affords a strong presumption that Jeremiah wrote this book. One personating him would have adhered to facts well authenticated in his history.—W. H. H.] Grammatically considered there is nothing in either the verb or the noun decisive in favor of the one or the other explanation. The verb רָחַק , which is used in Joel iv. 8, Ob. 11; Nah. iii. 10 of casting the lot, and in Jer. i. 14 of shooting an arrow, Zechariah uses also of throwing down iron [?] horns (ii. 4; E. V. i. 21). The word only occurs in the places cited. But if Zechariah uses the word of throwing down objects of such size and weight, then it could properly be used also of throwing a heavy stone over the opening of the pit. The noun, אֶבֶן , further, can as well signify collectively a number of stones as one stone, for it frequently has that meaning after כָּל , Lev. xx. 2, 27; xxiv. 23; Josh. vii. 25; 1 Kings xii. 18 ($\text{וַיִּרְגְּלוּ בָּהֶן}$), comp. Num. xiv. 10, xv. 85; Deut. xxi. 21. But the preposition, עַל , upon me, favors the explanation they cast stones on me. For the difference between עַל and אֶל or $\text{לְ$ is, that the former, as FURNER says, denotes "decided vicinity," or "such motion as is connected with the attainment of its object," whilst by the latter is expressed "motion toward without nearness." They threw a stone on me, that is to say, over me on the mouth of the pit, would be expressed by עַל . [Though there is a foundation for this distinction between these two prepositions, yet they are often used indiscriminately, without affecting the sense, as for instance with the verbs רָחַק , וָגַע , רָחַק . עַל too, is used in the general sense of over, as with כָּשַׁל , in the sense of ruling over, or having the management of affairs, see Ps. ciii. 19; Gen. xxiv. 2; xiv. 8, 26; Deut. xv. 6; Judges viii. 22; Josh. xii. 5; 1 Kings v. 1. If the use of עַל here in the sense indicated by E. V. is not absolutely forbidden, it is certainly to be preferred. 1. It would have been a wanton outrage to throw stones upon the Prophet after he was cast into the pit. 2. It seems incredible that Jeremiah should not in his narrative of the affair have mentioned such a remarkable incident, if it had occurred. 3. They could only have thrown the stones for the purpose of killing him, and how then had he escaped death? 4. The fact that the pit was covered over with a stone, to prevent his possible escape, was a most likely occurrence, and yet one that, because likely and even to be presumed, might have been passed over without special mention. Finally, all the versions, except NÄGELSBACH's and GERLACH's, render it as in E. V.; GATAKER indicates both senses without deciding in favor of either.—W. H. H.]

Ver. 54. Waters flowed over my head.—Waters dashed (surged) over my head. This cannot be meant of the flowing together of the water in a physical sense, over his head. For in Jer. xxxviii. 6, it is expressly said that there was no water in the pit, only mud. Besides, the flowing together of water over his head must inevitably have had for its speedy consequence the death of him who was thrown into the pit. Either the words mean merely, water ran on my head; or, what is more likely, this way of speaking should be understood as metaphorical, as also in Ps. lxix. 3 (2), 15 (14), 16 (15), he who is sunk in the mire, speaks at the same time of being drowned by the water-flood. That he intends this as an image descriptive of the greatest peril of death (see Ps. xviii. 17 (16); xxxii. 6; xlii. 7); lxxxviii. 17 (16), 18 (17); cxxx. 1; cxliv. 7), is evident also from Ps. lxix. 2 (1), where for the waters are come in even to my soul can only be taken in a figurative sense. [In Ps. lxix. all is figurative. But here, where all the rest is literal, to take one term alone as figurative, is unnatural. It would be better, with HENDERSON, to take the whole description as figurative, and as having no direct allusion to the account given in Jer. xxxviii. 6-12. But this is not necessary. The words may only mean Water ran on my head. See Gram. notes above. If there was mud in the bottom of the pit, there was a supply of water in some quantities from some source. The mere condensation of the vapor in the atmosphere against the sides of the pit, would produce some, and there may have been from small springs supply enough to trickle down and splash upon his head. The language, if suggested by any Psalm, was more likely that of xl. 3 (2), than of the lxix.—and brought me up from a pit of noise, and from the miry clay,—where the noise referred to seems to be that of running water. The Prophet, sinking in the mud beneath, and reminded by the water falling on his head that he was in danger of drowning, might well exclaim I am lost, I am already as good as gone!—W. H. H.]—Then I said, I am cut off.—I said, I am cut off. NOYES: I am undone. GERLACH: I am lost. Comp. Ps. lxxxviii. 5.]

III. 55-66.

55, 56 I called upon thy name, O LORD, out of the low dungeon. Thou hast heard 57 my voice; hide not thine ear at my breathing, at my cry. Thou drewest near 58 in the day that I called upon thee: thou saidst, Fear not. O LORD, thou hast 59 pleaded the causes of my soul; thou hast redeemed my life. O LORD, thou hast 60 seen my wrong; judge thou my cause. Thou hast seen all their vengeance, and 61 all their imaginations against me. Thou hast heard their reproach, O LORD, 62 and all their imaginations against me. The lips of those that rose up against 63 me, and their device against me all the day. Behold their sitting down, and 64 their rising up; I am their music. Render unto them a recompence, O LORD, 65 according to the work of their hands. Give them sorrow of heart, thy curse 66 unto them. Persecute and destroy them in anger from under the heavens of the LORD.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 55. קָרָא בָשֵׁם יי. This expression does not occur in Jer.; he uses only once קָרָא בָשֵׁם יי, x. 25. [There is not enough difference in the two expressions to afford the shadow of an argument for or against the authorship of Lamentations, even if the latter expression had been frequent with Jeremiah; but as in fact it only occurs once, who can say which of the two expressions was characteristic of his style?—W. H. H.]—כָּבוֹד הַדְּהוּת Ps. lxxvii. 7, כָּבוֹד הַי. Elsewhere occur only the expressions גָּלַת הַי, Jos. xv. 19, and אָרֶץ הַי, Ez. xxvi. 20; xxxii. 18, 24 [in each case in close connection with בֹּר—W. H. H.], or הַי אָרֶץ, Is. xlv. 23; Ps. lxxiii. 10; cxxxix. 15. הַדְּהוּת is to be regarded as related to בֹּר in the genitive not in the accusative sense.

Ver. 56. The verb עָלַם Jeremiah uses in no form. The expression עָלַם אֵין occurs only here.—[HENDERSON: "Before לְרוֹחוֹתֵי, the preposition has the signification of with a view to; before לְשׁוֹנֵי, it takes its temporal signification, at, at the time of."]—שׁוֹנֵה, once in Jer., viii. 19; see ver. 8; Ps. xxxiv. 16.

Ver. 57. Jeremiah uses only once in the Hiphil, xxx. 21.—The Perfects, קָרַבְתָּ, אָכַרְתָּ, of this verse and רָפַתָּ, נָאֻלְתָּ, ver. 58, stand parallel to the Perfect שָׁכַחְתָּ ver. 56. They contain the specifications of that general declaration. They are therefore to be translated in the Perfect, not in the Present. אָכַרְתָּ does not conflict with this, as TAENIUS thinks, for the Imperfect stands here to represent the repetition of the act in times past. See my Gr. § 87, f.

Ver. 58. The expression רַב רֵיב is found in Jeremiah twice, i. 34; ii. 36. Yet Jeremiah never uses the plural רֵיבִים, which occurs, besides here, only in Ps. xviii. 44 (2 Sam. xxii. 44). [The singular here would be inappropriate, if the meaning of the phrase is that God interposed to deliver him from all the causes which endangered his life, see ver. 53.—נִפְשִׁי is not merely a circumlocution for the suffix, my, (NOYES), but רֵיבִי נִפְשִׁי are cause que vitam ac salutem meam concernunt (GERLACH), dangerous transactions (FUERST'S Lex.).—W. H. H.]—Jeremiah uses only the Part. נֹאֵל, נֹאֵל, and that only once, i. 34. See elsewhere, Ps. lxxix. 19; ciii. 4; cxix. 154.

Ver. 60. Instead of לִי several Codd. have עָלַי, which corresponds better with the way in which Jeremiah expresses himself in xi. 19; xviii. 13; but is apparently only a correction suggested by ver. 61. See besides לְרֵכָא, ver. 34. [HENDERSON: "For לִי twenty-three MSS., originally thirteen more, now two, the LXX, Targ., Syr., Vulg., and Venet. Greek, read עָלַי as in ver. 61; where, on the other hand, seventeen MSS. read לִי for עָלַי."]—

Ver. 61. וָרָכָה is used here in an active sense, as in Jer. ii. 51; Job xvi. 10; Zeph. ii. 8, etc.—[The difference between עָלַי of this verse, and לִי of ver. 60, according to OWEN, "is occasioned by the verbs Thou hast seen and Thou hast heard. God had seen the thoughts or purposes effected against him; and He had heard the purposes formed concerning him. He refers first to the purposes carried into effect, and then, as it is common in the prophets, he refers to the purposes previously formed respecting him." This difference of meaning in the two verses is, however, entirely due to the verbs, and not at all to the prepositions, which would even better express the ideas OWEN attaches to them if their positions were reversed,—have seen their devices executed עָלַי upon me, and heard their devices devised לִי with reference to me.—W. H. H.]

Ver. 62.—[This verse may be dependent on שָׁכַחְתָּ ver. 61, GERLACH and most of the translators; or on הַבִּיטָה ver. 63, THENIUS, NAEGLSACH. To supply the substantive verb הָיוּ, sunt, before עָלַי, as ROSENUELLER suggests, is altogether unnecessary and inelegant.—W. H. H.]—קָנִים, for enemies, is found in Jeremiah only in the expression קָנֵי, ii. 1.—הַגִּיּוֹן is not found in Jeremiah; [nor anywhere else except Ps. ix. 17; xix. 15; xcii. 4. It is an unusual word on which no theory of authorship can be rested.—W. H. H.]

Ver. 63.—קִיְיָה is found only here.—הַבִּיטָה, see i. 11.—כִּנְיָנָה is ἀν. λέγωμ. [GERLACH: "The opinion of BORTCHER deserves at least some consideration, that here as in Mal. i. 13, there lies concealed in the כִּי a כִּהָ (quam, quale; what a Saltenspiel [derivative song] I am to them). But this is not in accordance with the punctuation and receives support from none of the versions except the Syr. See Ps. lxxxix. 45."]—

Ver. 64.—הַשִּׁב גָּבוֹל is found in Ps. xxviii. 4; xciv. 2; Joel iv. 4, 7; Ob. 15; Prov. xii. 14. In Jeremiah occurs only גָּבוֹל, ii. 6.—יִיְהוָה is found in Jer. xxv. 14 (a place critically suspicious), Ps. xxviii. 4.

Ver. 65.—כִּנְיָנָה is ἀν. λέγωμ. [BROUGHTON translates it a bursting of heart, following CHALDÆUS, לִבָּא, הַבִּירֹת לִבָּא, confratio cordis. BLATNEY derives the word from לִבָּא, to deliver or make over; "a delivery of the heart, that is, a willing one, to which the heart consents," and translates, omitting the first לִבָּא on the authority of the ancient versions and one MS., and making a single member of the verse in defiance of accents and analogy, Thou wilt give with a hearty accordance Thy curse unto them. SEPT. ὕπεριστον, covering; VULG. scutum, a shield; SYR. sorrorio.—W. H. H.]—הָאֵלֶּה, from אָלַל, a curse, is ἀν. λέγωμ. [SEPT. and VULG. seem to have read הָאֵלֶּה from לֵאָה. For construction see Ps. iii. 9. עַל-עֵצְךָ בִּרְכָךָ super popul. tuo sibi benedictio tua. ROSENUELLER, GERLACH.—W. H. H.]

Ver. 66.—הִרְרָה וְגוֹ. See i. 6; Isa. xiv. 6; Jer. xxi. 15.—Of the root שָׁכַח Jeremiah uses only the Niphal, xlviii. 8, 42.—The expression שָׁכַח is found only here.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Vers. 55-66. These twelve closing verses contain a prayer, so that ch. iii., like chs. i. and ii., ends with a prayer. This prayer is divided into three parts. In the first part, vers. 55-58, the speaker thanks the Lord for his deliverance from the pit. In the second part, vers. 59-63, he reminds the Lord of all that his (the speaker's) enemies had done and were still doing to him. In the third part, vers. 64-66, he prays the Lord to avenge upon his enemies the evil they had done to him.

Ver. 55. I called upon thy name, O LORD—Jehovah. The speaker begins by recalling the prayer which he had addressed to the Lord out of the pit. Hirzio is of the opinion that we have this prayer in Ps. lxi. DELITZSCH also concedes that there is much to favor this opinion; see his Bible Commentary on the Psalms, 1867, p. 438. [The caption of this Psalm ascribes it to David. There is no internal evidence sufficient to set this aside and to prove that the Psalm was written by Jeremiah or some one else "during the captivity at Babylon." Its appropriateness to Jeremiah when in the pit, is only a proof of the singular adaptation of the inspired psalms to the wants of God's children in all varieties of emergencies and circumstances. That Jeremiah repeated this Psalm when in the pit, is most likely. That it was present to his mind when writing these Lamentations is rendered probable by many suggestive thoughts and sentiments.—GERLACH and NOYES translate the verbs, from ver. 55 to the end, in the present tense. This makes the translation in some respects smoother and the sense in some places more apparent. But the references are to deliverances past, pointing hopefully, amidst present and unrelieved afflictions, to deliverances yet in the future. For this reason alone, the preterite sense of the verbs should be retained, even if the difficulties of translation were greater than they really are.—W. H. H.].—Out of the low dungeon—out of the hellish (höllischen) pit. A similar expression [differing only in the preposition.—W. H. H.] is found in Ps. lxxxviii. 7. If our Poet had in mind Ps. lxxxviii., which I regard as certain, then it is probable that he used this peculiar expression in the same sense in which it is used there. Ps. lxxxviii., it is true, is commonly understood of an affliction of another kind (by leprosy, vers. 9, 16): but there is room for the question, whether this psalm, "the gloomiest of all the lamentation psalms," as DELITZSCH says, does not also apply to that gloomiest of all situations which any servant of the Lord in the Old Testament ever experienced? In that case הֶחָיִית, hellish, should be understood, not of Hades itself, but of the Hades-like place in which the Prophet found himself. It would then indicate not merely the locality, but the condition of the Prophet. [See Gram. notes above. There is not necessarily in these words an allusion to Sheol, nor is hellish pit even a correct translation of the words, which mean literally, a pit of low or under places, or pit of depths; out of the depths of the pit, if not an exact is yet a sufficiently accurate rendering. GERLACH, while he also supposes an allusion, in a figurative sense, to Sheol, translates, aus der Grube der Tiefen, out of the pit of the depths, meaning perhaps, figuratively, the infernal regions. But the passages in which this and similar expressions occur do not justify the idea that the pit of Hell or Sheol, i. e. the place of the dead, is intended, even figuratively. The literal sense out of the pit of depths, a poetical expression for depths of the pit, is most consonant with the fact that the Prophet alludes to the time when he was literally sinking in the mire at the bottom of the well.—W. H. H.]

Ver. 56. Thou hast heard my voice—Thou heardest my voice. The Poet gratefully recognizes the fact that the Lord heard his cry.—Hide not thine ear at my breathing, at my cry—[saying] Hide not Thine ear to my refreshment, to my cry. This is not a prayer which the speaker now addresses to the Lord [but the prayer which he did make when he was in the pit]. It is connected with קוֹלִי, my voice, as an explanation of the purport of that cry, and it shows what the speaker prayed for at that time.—The word רוּחָה [E. V. breathing, NALGELSEN, refreshment] occurs besides here only in Ex. viii. 11 (15) [and is there rendered by Sept. ἀνάψυξις], signifies undoubtedly the obtaining breath, ἀνάψυξις (see 1 Sam. xvi. 23; Job xxxii. 20; Esth. iv. 14). It is not synonymous with שְׁמִיעִי, cry, but it denotes the end to which the latter serves as the means. [The sense is, as given by NOYES: Hide not Thine ear from my cry for relief. But a more exact translation is given by BLAXNEY: Hide not Thine ear from my relief at my cry;—so BROUGHTON: Hide not Thine ear from my release at my prayer. The verb means strictly to veil (and is so rendered here by GERLACH, Veil not Thine ear), and then to conceal, hide. "To veil the eye is, not to look at what is set before it; and to veil the ear is, to render it deaf to what is said;" remarks OWEN, who proposes the translation Deafen not Thine ear. FUERST, in his Lex, says, Turn not away Thine ear. CALVIN renders it, Close not Thine ear.—My breathing. WORDSWORTH: "My respiration, my recovery of breath. Comp. Ex. viii. 15, the only other place where the word occurs, and where it is rendered respite." The word relief seems in accordance with the use of the word in that passage, and exactly to represent the sense it has here.—But how are these last words connected with the first words of the verse? The difficulty which has embarrassed commentators here, is one of GERLACH's arguments for taking the perfect verbs in a *precativ*e sense and rendering them in the present, which apparently meets the difficulty. But the objections to this have been stated above on ver. 55. To supply intermediate words and thoughts between the first and second members of the verse, as Thou heardest my voice, therefore now, in my present exigency, hide not Thine ear, etc., or therefore I now am encouraged to pray Hide not, etc., is at least arbitrary.* To regard the last member as independent of the first, an interjectional prayer, introduces an abrupt and serious break in the consecutive flow of the thought. Besides, both of these interpretations are open to the objection that קוֹלִי שָׁמַעְתָּ, Thou heardest my voice, is not equivalent to saying, Thou didst answer my prayer, or receive it favorably; a mistake that even GRU-

* DIODATI's comment on this verse is an instance of interpretation, where a fervid imagination supplies ideas not con-

LACH has fallen into. The word קוֹל denotes any audible sound or noise. Thunder (1 Sam. vii. 10), the blast of a trumpet (Ex. xix. 19), the crackling of thorns under a pot (Eccl. vii. 6), the rustling of a shaken leaf (Lev. xxvi. 36), the singing of birds (Ps. civ. 12), the bleating of sheep and lowing of oxen (1 Sam. xv. 14), the roaring of a lion (Jer. xii. 8), the shout of a multitude and clamor of a battle (Ex. xxxii. 17), etc., the sound of the human voice in speaking, singing, weeping, etc., are all represented by the common generic word קוֹל, a sound, a noise. In three passages the word is used in the sense of rumor, or the bruit of common fame: Gen. xlv. 16; Eccl. x. 20; Jer. iii. 9. When connected by וְ or לְ to verbs implying compliance with a request, obedience to a command, acceptance of advice, or the like, usage allows the word to stand in a specific sense for prayer, command, injunction, or the like;

as Gen. xxx. 6, שָׁמַע בְּקוֹלִי, hath heard my voice, i. e. my prayer. In no other case does this word, alone and by itself, signify a command, prayer, or speech, or words spoken. It does not designate articulate utterance, but the sound produced by speech, or aught else that makes a noise, or is audible. Its meaning is always evolved from the context, and when spoken words are intended, it is almost invariably followed by מִכֹּחַ, or some similar word. Its use in Hebrew is so purely idiomatic, that the sense may often be better given in English by its entire omission, than by a verbally literal translation. This is often done in our English version: Gen. xlv. 2, he wept aloud; 1 Kings xviii. 27, cry aloud, ver. 28, they cried aloud; Neh. viii. 15, publish and proclaim; Job xxix. 10, The nobles held their peace; Prov. xxvi. 25, when he speaketh fair, etc. In Cant. ii. 8; v. 2 (see Prof. GREEN in LANGE), and Isa. xl. 3. 6 (see EWALD), the word may be rendered as an interjection, Hark! It is obvious, therefore, that קוֹל cannot be translated prayer.

קוֹלִי שָׁמַעְתָּ can only mean Thou heardest the sound of my voice. What that sound was, whether of weeping, lamentation or supplication, is left to be explained, and is explained by the words following; the sound, or cry was, Hide not Thine ear from my prayer for relief. Similar constructions are frequent, especially with Jeremiah. Jer. iii. 21, a sound was heard upon the high places—weeping supplications; iv. 31, The cry of the daughter of Zion—woe is me now! etc.; viii. 19, The voice of the daughter of my people—Is not Jehovah in Zion? etc.; see Jer. xxxi. 15; Ez. iii. 12, I heard a voice—Blessed be the glory of Jeho- vah, etc.; Job xxxiii. 8, 9, I have heard the cry of words—I am clean, etc.; iv. 16, 17, I heard a voice—shall mortal man, etc.; Ps. cxvi. 1, He hath heard my voice—my supplications; cxix. 149, Hear my cry—Jehovah quicken me, etc. See Isa. xxviii. 23, 24; xxxii. 9, 10; Prov. viii. 4, 5; Micah vi. 1, 2; Prov. i. 20, 22; viii. 1, 4, 5. In all these passages the word קוֹל is immediately put into expository words. So in our text, the second member of the verse is in apposition with the first and explanatory of the word קוֹל, Thou heardest my cry—Hide not Thine ear from my prayer for relief.—W. H. H.]

Ver. 57. The Poet now describes what the Lord did after hearing the prayer of the suppliant.—Thou dwrest near in the day that—on the day when—I called upon Thee. See Ps. xx. 10; lvi. 10; cii. 3; cxxxviii. 3.—Thou saidst, Fear not. See Jer. i. 8; xxx. 10; xlv. 27, 28.

Ver. 58. The Lord has not only spoken, but also acted. [Vers. 57, 58 are amplifications of ver. 56, showing how the Lord heard the prayer there recorded.—W. H. H.]—O Lord, thou hast pleaded the causes of my soul.—Thou hast fought, O Lord, the fights of my soul! It is evident that the Poet intends by these conflicts (מִלְחָמֹת) the attacks of his enemies, which he has described in vers. 52-55, and for which, from ver. 59 onward, he implores vengeance. That the struggles on which his life depended were severe, appears both from vers. 52-55 and from the following words Thou hast rescued my life. [The Versions generally take the words in the judicial sense, as in our English Bibles. The commentators fail to explain the significance of the metaphor. Pool's annotation is a curious instance of blindly unsaying in the note what is said in the text,—“Thou hast been wont to take my part against my enemies, not like a lawyer by word of mouth, but actually and really pleading my cause.” Pleading a cause, metaphorically speaking, must at least involve the idea of securing justification, or exemption from punishment, before some legal tribunal, real or imaginary. This idea is not appropriate here, nor is it so in other places of the Bible where the same Hebrew words are similarly translated. This leads us to doubt the judicial interpretation of the terms used. Dr. NAEGELSBACH's translation is supported by Is. xlix. 23, I will contend with him that contendeth with thee, and I will save thy children; xli. 11, they that strive with thee shall perish; xxxiv. 8, the controversy of Zion; Ps. xxxv. 1, E. V., Plead my cause, O LORD, with them that strive with me: fight against them that fight against me, where the first clause is rendered by Dr. ALEXANDER, Oppose my opposers, strive with my strivers, or contend with my contenders, which is recommended by the parallelism; and Jer. li. 36, E. V., I will plead thy cause and take vengeance for thee, which Dr. NAEGELSBACH translates, I fight thy fight, and avenge thy vengeance. But the words may have another meaning still. מִלְחָמָה has an acquired sense, from the idea of conducting a cause before a tribunal, of managing another's affairs, and a'so of protecting their person, property and rights. In this sense the tained in the words themselves: “Thou hast always been ready to relieve me when I have called upon Thee; O continue in doing so now at this present.”

word seems to be used in Is. i. 17, E. V., plead for the widow. J. A. ALEXANDER: "Be friend the widow, take her part, espouse her cause. * * The common version (plead for the widow) seems to apply too exclusively to advocates, as distinguished from judges;"—a remark that will especially apply in the present case. The word seems to have the same sense in Is. li. 22. and Jer. i. 34. In the last the expression is רִיב יִרְבֵּם, E. V.: He shall thoroughly plead their cause. LUTHER and NÄGELSBACH, He will certainly accomplish, or carry through (durchführen) thy cause, where the idea seems to be that of zealously and successfully prosecuting the interests of another. This is the meaning which GERLACH adopts, Thou managest the business of my soul, i. e., as he explains, the affairs which concern his life and his salvation. This idea of God's controlling interposition in those matters in which the Prophet's life was in jeopardy seems to me the idea here expressed.—W. H. H.]—Thou hast redeemed my life.—Thou hast rescued my life. [The propriety of connecting this verse with vers. 55-57, instead of with vers. 59, 60, and thus dismembering the triplets, is very dubious.—W. H. H.]

Vers. 59-63. These verses embrace, as remarked above, the second part of the prayer. The speaker here reminds the Lord of all the evil which he had suffered from his enemies, as the Lord Himself had seen and heard, and prays Him (vers. 62, 63) to consider well what his enemies yet continually designed against him. These verses contain a brief intimation of the prayer which he presents at large in vers. 64-66, that the Lord would execute justice (ver. 59).

Ver. 59. LORD—Jehovah—thou hast seen.—By these words, which are repeated in ver. 60, and the words Thou hast heard in ver. 61, the speaker confirms the reality of the deeds of which he accuses his adversaries. [They are also to be understood as expressions of faith in God's love, and personal interest in His saints. Not only is everything open to the eye and ear of God. But He is observing the conduct and the language of those who injure His people, with jealous indignation, which will eventually break out in judgments.—W. H. H.]—My wrong. The Hebrew word עָוִיָה, occurs only here, but the verb from which it is derived is found in ver. 36, עָוִי. If the latter is used in the sense of bending [deflection, subversion] and in particular of bending of the right [subverting one in his cause], then the noun here means, violation of right, injury illegally done to one. [CALVIN and GERLACH translate the word oppression, or subversion, suggesting judicial perversion of justice. It is generally, however, taken in the more general sense of wrong or injury. CALVIN says "the word is rendered by some iniquity, but in an ironical sense," i. e., the wrong my enemies impute to me. But the word is with almost entire unanimity taken in a passive sense. ROSENUELLER: quæ mihi fiat injuria. NOYES: the wrong done to me; so BLAYNEY and BOOTHROYD.—W. H. H.]—Judge thou my cause—judge my right. [So BROUGHTON. GERLACH: Secure to me right or justice. Literally, it is judge my judgment, where the noun seems to be taken in the cognate sense of my cause. See FUERST, Lex. NOYES: Maintain Thou my cause.—W. H. H.] These words are a pious ejaculation, anticipatory of the prayer fully detailed in vers. 64-66, and evidently called forth by the antithesis of עָוִיָה, my wrong. To judge the right of a man is to bring it to its deserts by means of judgment. A kindred passage is Jer. v. 28. Comp. Zech. vii. 9; 1 Kings iii. 28; Is. xvi. 5. [See also Ps. ix. 5 (4).]

Ver. 60. Thou hast seen all their vengeance.—The word נָקָמָה is not in its original meaning vindictiveness, as THENIUS supposes, but simply ulatio [taking vengeance] (comp. נָקַמְתָּ דָם).

Ps. lxxix. 10, נָקַמְתָּ חֵיכָלִי, Jer. i. 28, נָקַמְתָּ, Ps. xciv. 1, etc.). Here also it is vengeance, but in an abstract-collective signification, inasmuch as his adversaries had executed on the Prophet more than one single act of vengeance. See xi. 20; xx. 12. [CALVIN: vengeances. GERLACH: revengefulness.]—And all their imaginations against me—all their devices against me. The Poet seems to allude to certain passages in Jeremiah, namely, xi. 19; xviii. 18, where this very same word, נִחְשָׁבָה, is emphatically used of the machinations of his adversaries.

Ver. 61. Thou hast heard their reproach—reviling—O LORD—Jehovah. See the introductory remarks above on vers. 22-24.—And all their imaginations—all their devices—against me.—Twice in the Book of Jeremiah the devices, נִחְשָׁבָה, of his adversaries are spoken of; twice also the Poet uses it here.

Ver. 62. It is better every way to refer this verse to the Behold or observe, הִנֵּה יֵשֶׁה, of ver. 63, than to the, הִנֵּה, Thou hast heard, of ver. 61. For if referred to what precedes, ver. 62 would contain a tautology, because what is the product of their lips and their thoughts must be, in any case, substantially the same with what the Lord has heard according to ver. 61. But if ver. 62 be referred to what follows then we gain a beautiful gradation; the lips indicate what the enemies speak, הִנֵּינִים, their meditation, what they think, and their sitting down and their rising up, what they do. [The position of the word Behold, הִנֵּה יֵשֶׁה, in the Hebrew, at the end of the first member of ver. 63, favors this construction. Yet it ought to be remarked, that the connection of ver. 62 with ver. 61, creates no unpleasant tautology but the repetition of the same ideas under new terms would be forcible and poetical.—W. H. H.]—The lips stand for what they utter. [CALVIN, BOOTHROYD, HENDERSON, translate speeches; NOYES, words.] See שֵׁפַת פִּנְנָן, lips, or languages of Canaan, Is. xix. 18; a lip or language I understood not, Ps. lxxxi. 6 (5). Compare נִשְׁמַע נִשְׁמַע, utterance of my lips, Jer. xvii. 16.—Of those that rose up against me—my adversaries [so BLAYNEY, BOOTHROYD, NOYES, ROSENUELLER, GERLACH].—And their device against me—and their thoughts against me. Thoughts, הִנֵּינִין, meditation, Ps. xix. 15 (14). [BLAYNEY, BOOTHROYD and OWEN, render the word muttering. HENDERSON and NOYES, machinations. But the sense of meditation, thoughts, is adopted generally.

ROSENMUELLER, cogitatio.—W. H. H.]—All the day long: a particular conspicuous also in Jer. xx. 7, 8.

Ver. 63. Behold their sitting down and their rising up.—To refer these words, with TURNIUS merely to consensus [sitting and deliberating together] of the enemies, is inconsistent with the context and the use of the words. For evidently, according to the context, the Lord should observe the whole conduct and doing of the enemies, and that not merely with regard to what was common to them all, but with respect to individuals. And further, according to the usage of the word, as apparent in such places as Ps. cxxxix. 2; Is. xxxvii. 28; Deut. vi. 7; xi. 19, the expression indicates the daily conduct and actions of a man. [GROTIUS: otia et negotia. CALVIN: "By sitting and rising, he means all the actions of life, as when David says, 'Thou knowest my sitting and my rising,' Ps. cxxxix. 2; that is, whether I rest or walk, all my actions are known to Thee. By rising, then, the Prophet denotes here, as David did, all the movements or doings of men; and by sitting, he means their quiet counsels; for men either deliberate and prepare for work while they sit or rise, and thus move and act."]—I am their music—song. See ver. 14. He calls himself their song, their sing-song (EWALD), because they busy themselves with him all the day long, though in a malevolent and scornful way. As one often hums a melody to himself all day long, so they do not let the thought of the hated servant of God depart out of their heads, but are constantly devising evil against him. I am their song denotes, then, the result of what is said in the first member of ver. 62 [Thou hast heard their reproach], and the first member of ver. 68 [observe the lips—the language—of my enemies], and relates to the all the day long, of ver. 62, and their sitting down and rising up, of ver. 63. [I am the constant subject of their derision and merriment. WORDSWORTH: "Compare the Passion Psalm, lxix. 12, I was the song of the drunkards. There the word neqinah is used, here the cognate word manginah."]—W. H. H.]

Vers. 64-66. In these last three verses, the Poet prays directly that the Lord would take vengeance on his enemies according to their desert.

Ver. 64. Render unto them a recompense, O LORD—Jehovah, according to the work of their hands. [BROUGHTON: "St. Paul translatheth this verse against ALEXANDER, the copper-smith, 2 Tim. iv. 14." The phrase is borrowed from Ps. xxviii. 4.—W. H. H.]

Ver. 65. Give them sorrow (marg., obstinacy) of heart. Thou wilt give them blindness of heart. The word rendered blindness, עִוְיוֹן, according to the fundamental idea of the root עָוָה, to enclose, to veil (see עָוָה עָוָה, עָוָה), can only mean veiling, covering (κάλυμμα τῆς καρδίας, veil of the heart, 2 Cor. iii. 15). It seems then that blindness [CALVIN, ROSENMUELLER, NOYES, GERLACH], not hardness [BOOTHROYD, HENDERSON], is meant. See Deut. xxviii. 28. On what DELITZSCH (Psychol., p. 291) grounds his conjecture, that it may be a name for madness, I do not comprehend. [The opinion that the word means madness is derived from the Arabic, and is maintained by C. B.

MICHAELIS and A. SCHULTENS. See ROSEN-MUELLER, GERLACH. See Text. and Gram. notes. —By blindness of heart we are to understand a reprobate mind, involving the idea of stupidity (CALVIN) produced by sin.—If the future verbs in vers. 64, 66, are taken as Imperatives, the verb in this verse should also be so translated, Give them blindness of heart—W. H. H.]—Thy curse unto them.—upon them.

Ver. 66. Persecute and destroy them in anger—Pursue them in wrath and exterminate them—from under the Heavens of the LORD—Jehovah. See Deut. ix. 14, which place seems to have been in the eye of the author. [CALVIN, regarding the Heavens as designating God's throne, interprets the meaning to be that their destruction should testify the Divine sovereignty and Providence. So FAUSSET: "destroy them so, that it may be seen everywhere under heaven that Thou sittest above as Judge of the world." This is very forced. The idea is simply that of utter extermination; destroy them so completely, ut non sint amplius sub cælis, that they may no longer exist under Heaven. MICHAELIS, GERLACH.—BROUGHTON concludes the chapter with the following characteristic note: "Jeremy, ch. xxiv., told how the men of the third captivity should come to nothing. And Ezekiel prophesied only in their days, but they would take no warning. This threefold alphabet endeth in their threefold and absolute destruction. Yet Ezra was of that captivity; but an infant. And of Anathoth, cursed by Jeremy, one hundred and twenty-eight returned, Ezra ii."—The enemies of Jeremiah returned not.—W. H. H.]

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. ["It has been alleged, that some of the prophetic portions of Holy Scripture which foretell the sufferings of Christ, especially the fifty-third chapter of Isaiah and the sixty-ninth Psalm, have no reference to Jesus of Nazareth, but were fulfilled in the person of Jeremiah. True it is, that the language of that fifty-third chapter of Isaiah, and of that sixty-ninth Psalm, had a remarkable applicability to Jeremiah. But why was this? Because Jeremiah was not only a prophet, but a prophecy. Jeremiah is among the prophets what Job is among the patriarchs. Jeremiah is the suffering prophet. He was a signal type of 'the Man of Sorrows.' He was a figure of Him who suffered on the cross, and who conquered by suffering." WORDSWORTH, Intr. Jer., p. ix. "Jeremiah is called by the Christian Fathers the πολυπαθέστατος of the Prophets, and this qualified him to be what he is also called by them, the αυταθέστατος." Ib. note. "The Christian church, from ancient days, has set apart the Lamentations of Jeremiah, for her own solemn offices in the week of her Lord's Passion; and in contemplating the Prophet Jeremiah sitting amid the ruins of Zion and pouring out his sorrow there in piteous cries of agony, she has ever had a vision of Christ hanging upon the Cross, and mourning over the ruins of our fallen human nature, which caused the bitterest pangs of His anguish there." Ib., p. x.]

2. "In this chapter, the heralds of the word are admonished, that it is their duty, in times of great distress, to prescribe to their hearers a suitable remedy for their misfortunes, the component parts of which would be, 1. The recognition of sins by means of the punishments inflicted: 2. Confidence in God's compassion: 3. Earnest prayer. As for the rest, this chapter compared with the others, shines like a star of exceeding brilliancy, from which the rays of a variety of doctrines emanate and give forth their light." FÖRSTER.

8. [I am the man, ver. 1. "This Lamentation is only rightly understood, when it is regarded as a lamentation of every pious Israelite, —as a lamentation which, while proceeding from self-experienced spiritual sorrows of the Prophet, has its truth for all pious Israelites, in whose name the Prophet speaks. ABEN EZRA, long ago, perceived this, and indicated the individual Israelites as the subject of the lamentation. In this opinion later commentators mostly concur (ROSENMUELLER, EWALD, THENIUS, NEUMANN, VAHINGER). EWALD finely says, in connection with the close of chapter second, which is so barren of consolation: 'Yet, will lamentation and despair nowhere end? Then, there suddenly appears, in the third place, a particular man; the very one who can, from his own peculiar experience, lament most profoundly, so that here for the third time the cry of despair is renewed with still greater vehemence; but he is the one who can also, from his own profoundest reflection on the eternal relation of God to humanity, come to a right knowledge of his own sins and of the necessity of repentance, and therewith also to the exercise of believing prayer. Who is this individual, who thus laments, thus thinks and prays?—whose I unconsciously, but at exactly the right place, passes over into the we? O man, he is the representative of thine own self! Let every one now speak and think as he does! And thus, by the direct means of this speech, begun with the greatest difficulty, the sense of pain has been imperceptibly lost in the exercise of prayer. Thus this composition shows us how in the wildest whirlpool, divine composure is to be won: each one must win it by sinking down himself into the full earnest truth; and even if one does not immediately find it, yet there is no more likely beginning for something better; wherefore here a particular individual is set before us as accomplishing in himself this most necessary work.' In this individualizing lies also the explanation of the manifold points of resemblance between our chapter and the Book of Job, from the passion-history of which the Prophet derives lamentations and images for the representation of the passion history of Israel." Dr. ERNST GERLACH, Klag. Jer., p. 81].

4. Vers. 1-18. "Here we have, at first, a lamentation of the Prophet Jeremiah, not so much over his people, as rather over his own misery. . . . Here we see, that the pious are subjected to two different sorts of affliction. One of these is temporal, affecting the body or worldly possessions and welfare: the other is spiritual, affecting the soul, when they think, that God has become their enemy, and will no longer be gracious to them, but will reject them now and forever. The first is, in truth, a cause of much suffering, especially to flesh and blood; but this pain is nothing, compared with that spiritual temptation, when one can no longer confide in the favor and grace of God, as we here see in the case of Jeremiah, who so ruefully bemoans himself, that he is a wretched man, who must bear the rod of the wrath of God, who has thrust him out of the light into the darkness, and pursued him as a bear or a lion, or as a more open and declared enemy. David also experienced many of the same temptations, as we find ever and anon in his Psalms. Thine arrows stick fast in me, and Thy hand presses me sore, he says in Ps. xxxviii. 3 (2). I said in my despair, I am cut off from before the eyes of the Lord, Ps. xxxi. 23 (22): whilst at other times he had been so courageous, that he said, I was not afraid of many hundred thousands that set themselves against me round about, Ps. iii. 7 (6); God is our refuge and strength, a very present help in trouble; therefore will not we fear, though the earth be removed, Ps. xvi. 2, 3 (1, 2). This sounds very differently from the lamentation here of Jeremiah, who represents God as his worst enemy. This should, first of all, serve to comfort the pious; if they fall into similar temptations, they should not think that they are the first to whom such things have happened, but should know that many pious and holy persons have experienced the same trials. But to the ungodly, this should serve as a warning; they should consider, if this is done in a green tree, what will be done in the dry? (Luke xxiii. 31). If the righteous are scarcely saved, where will the ungodly and sinner appear? (1 Pet. iv. 7)." Würtemb. Summarien.

5. Vers. 1-9. "Jeremiah speaks here in his own name, and whilst he utters the grief of his own heart he seeks by his example to excite others to repentance, for the key-note that sounds through all his lamentations is, that his distress comes from God. The greatest cause of distress is this, that prayer, the only resource in misery, avails no more. Elsewhere it is said, 'The name of the Lord is a strong fortress, the righteous man runneth thither and is protected,'—and, 'He who will call on the name of the Lord shall be blessed,'—or, 'Call on Me in trouble, then will I deliver thee, then thou shalt praise Me.' In truth, the Holy Scriptures are crowded with testimonies, which promise answers to prayer and help to the prayerful; indeed, since one of the titles of God is 'He who heareth prayer,' it is evident that to hear prayer is founded in His eternal nature. What then the Prophet here says is contrary to Scripture. But it is true, and so we must understand Jeremiah, that God not seldom hears the prayers of believers, whilst He proves their patience and leaves them long in darkness and uncertainty. This has been, as it was with Jeremiah, the common experience of Christians, who have been obliged to observe in themselves, how quickly the human heart loses courage and prayerful ardor, when God does not hasten to our help." HEIM und HOFMANN, die grossen Propheten.

6. "The Prophet first describes what he himself experienced of the holy cross under the Old Testament. It was necessary for him to be typically a sacrifice for all people. He was obliged to this according to the purpose of God. God's object in all this was, to use him in His kingdom to the end of time as one of the most important of His instruments. In this respect he is indeed a real type of Christ. Although the light is not wanting in his dark sayings, yet it shines not nearly so clearly as we experience it in the New Testament, by the testimony of the Apostles, where they also testify of their cross. For they already behold His glory with their eyes. On this account Paul gloried most lovingly in his cross and his weakness." DIEDRICH.

7. "In this third chapter such an earnest, intense lamentation of the Prophet is written, that many have regarded it as referring to nothing else than to the sufferings and death of Christ. For this reason, where Christ is painted with His body lacerated with the thongs and the crown of thorns on His head, the beginning of this chapter is found recorded in Latin on the picture." EO. HUNNIUS.

8. The old expositors find here free scope for their allegorical interpretations. Thus PASCHASIUS RADBERTUS, in his Preface to his third book on Lamentations, says, "The more attentively I examine this—as it were—funeral lamentation over the whole body of the people, the more profound are the mysteries which appear concerning Christ and His body, so that the mournful discourse may be by turns interpreted, now of the Synagogue, then especially of the Church, and then again of the Passion of Christ." GHISLERUS, p. 120. And of BONAVENTURA the same author remarks, that he says, "This is so evidently a lamentation for Christ and His members, whose sufferings are here described, that it is impossible to find in it a literal sense, without distortion."

9. Ver. 2. "By light he represents prosperity, by darkness adversity, Is. v. 30; xlv. 7; lviii. 10; Job xxii. 11, on which last passage the great LUTHER, in a marginal gloss to the text of the German version of the Bible, comments very nervously, thus: Trouble and misfortune are called darkness, happiness and prosperity light. Here the verses of CAMERARIUS, written on 2 Chr. xx. 12, may be quoted:

In tenebris vitæ densa et caligine mundi,
Cum nihil est toto pectore consilii,
Tum nos erigimus Deus ad te lumina cordis,
Nostra tuamque fides solius oratopem."—FÖRSTER.

10. Ver. 7. "To God πάν ἄπορον πόριμον, i. e. To God every impassable road is passable. Of the same purport are the following sayings, which are worthy of being observed and remembered: PHILO: deficiente omni humano concilio incipit divinum, where human expedients fail, Divine begin; TAULERUS: egrediente natura ingreditur Deus, God enters when nature exits, LUTHER: tempus desperationis tempus auxilii, the time of despair is the time when help comes. The greater the need, the nearer is God." FÖRSTER.

11. Ver. 8. BONAVENTURA refers the words to the prayer of Christ on the Mount of Olives,—If it be possible let this cup pass from Me (Matt. xxvi. 39). GHISLER, p. 129.—"The Omnipotent God, knowing what is to our advantage, feigns not to hear the cry of the suffering, that He may increase their usefulness and that their lives may be purified by discipline and they may seek elsewhere that tranquil rest, which cannot be found here." RHABANUS, in GHISLER, ib.—"The most efficacious antidote (ἀντεξάρμακον) to this temptation is Hope (Heb. xii. 3-11), to which effect are the sayings of AUGUSTINE, God does not give quickly, that thou mayest learn to desire more ardently; and, What God would give, He withholds." FÖRSTER.

12. Ver. 8. [Prayer: "Grant, Almighty God, that as Thou didst in former times so severely chastise Thy people, we may in the present day patiently submit to all Thy scourges, and in a humble and meek spirit suffer ourselves to be chastised as we deserve; and that we may not, in the meantime, cease to call on Thee, and that however slowly Thou mayest seem to hear our prayers, we may yet persevere continuously to the end, until at length we shall really find that salvation is not in vain promised to all those who in sincerity of heart call on Thee, through Christ our Lord. Amen." CALVIN.]

13. Ver. 10. "The real appearance of the Lord is not that of a lion or a bear (Is. xxxviii. 13; Job x. 16), but of a Shepherd taking the most faithful care of His sheep. With respect to this pastoral care, see Ps. xxiii.; Is. xl. 11; Jer. xxiii. 3, 4; Ez. xxxiv. 16. And BERNARD beautifully says, Christ redeems His sheep at a costly price, feeds them sumptuously, leads them with solicitous carefulness, lodges them securely." FÖRSTER.—"Harsh is the complaint when Jeremiah compares God to a bear and a lion. But we have said that the apprehension of God's wrath so terrified the faithful, that they could not sufficiently express the atrocity of their calamity; and then borne in mind must also be what we have stated, that they spoke according to the judgment of the flesh; for they did not always so moderate their feelings, but that something fell from them worthy of blame. We ought not, then, to make as a rule in religion all the complaints of holy men, when they were pressed down by the hand of God; for when their minds were in a state of confusion, they uttered much that was intemperate. But we ought, on the other hand, to acknowledge how great must be our weakness, since we see that the strongest have thus fallen, when God exercised severity towards them." CALVIN.]

14. Vers. 17, 18. "All other temptations are as nothing, compared with those in which God seems to set Himself in hostility to a man. For as long as the pious taste the grace of God and perceive His fatherly tenderness, every adversity is so much the more easily endured by them and they can be joyful and of good cheer even amidst external causes for sorrow. See Ps. lvi., lxii., lxxiii. But, on the contrary, if God disguises Himself in some severe aspect before them, and dissembles, and acts as if He hears them not, is not favorably disposed to them, but may be in the highest degree opposed to them and against their interests,—then lamentations commence, then begins that secret sorrow of the soul, that excessive anguish, under which they faint away and must sink to Hell, did not God hold His hand over them and abridge their anguish. These are the buffetings of Satan, the very dregs of hellish temptations, they are the floods of Belial that will overwhelm human strength. Then they [the tempted] lose heart; for when, as it were, they lie in darkness, immured in an eternal prison of every kind of trouble, when the Lord closes His ears to their pitiable cry, yes, when He has bent His bow against them and set them up as a mark to shoot against them all His darts and arrows, when He has utterly ejected them from peace and all that is good, in all respects which the Prophet here relates in detail of himself, then at last they come to think, as Jeremiah did, when he said, My strength and hope is perished from the Lord, until God again lets the gentle sun of His Divine heavenly consolation and fatherly goodness shine out from amidst the darkness of the temptations; but in the meanwhile they must for a long time have a taste of that future wrath, which the damned must hereafter eternally suffer. Besides Jeremiah's case here, the Scripture presents us with a pitiable representation and sorrowful instance of a man thus distressed, and a special example for us, in the case of the patient Job. . . . David also in Psalm xxxi., I said in my haste I am cut off from before Thine eyes. Yes, even the Son of God was compelled to feel in His holy soul a similar spiritual temptation (yet without any sin), when on the cross He said, My God, My God, why hast Thou forsaken Me?" EGRV. HENNUS.—"What is here written by Jeremiah is not new and unheard of; but very many examples occur in Scripture, of those who have been harassed by this same temptation. The following examples, however, are especially appropriate here: Abraham, Gen. xvi. 1 (2); David, Ps xxxi. 23 (22); lxxvii. 8-10 (7-9); Ezekiah, Is. xxxviii. 10, Job. vii. 15; xix. 6, 22; Jonah, ii. 5 (4); Paul, 2 Cor. xii. 9; to whom may be added, those most eminent Theologians of our own age, Matthesius, Weller and Hausmann, and especially Luther, who was obliged to sit in that sieve of Satan, particularly in the year of Christ 1527, about the time of the festival of the Visitation of Mary, concerning which paroxysm of his, by far his most violent one, D. JOH. BUGENHAGIUS has written a curious account, which is contained in Tom. iii. Jen. Germ. Fol. 401." FÖRSTER. In the Leipzig edition, this production is found in Vol. XXII., pag. 498 ff., under the Title, "D. Jo. Pomerani und Justi Junæ Historie von Lutheri geistlichen und leiblichen Anfechtungen anno 1527."—"Faith sometimes is so stifled, that even the children of God think that they are lost, and that it is all over with their salvation. . . . There is no doubt but that the Prophet also expressly reminded the faithful that they ought not to despair, . . . though the devil tempted them to despair, but that they ought then especially to struggle against it. This is indeed, I allow, a hard and perilous contest, but the faithful ought not to faint, even when such a thing happens to them, that is, when it seems to be all over with them and no hope remains; but, on the contrary, they ought nevertheless to go on hoping, and that indeed, as the Scripture says elsewhere, against hope, or above hope (Rom. iv. 18). . . . Were any one to ask, How can it be that hope and despair should reside in the same man? the answer is, that when faith is weak, that part of the soul is empty, which admits despair. Now, faith is sometimes not only enfeebled, but is also nearly stifled. This, indeed, does not happen daily, but there is no one whom God deeply exercises with temptations, who does not feel that his faith is nearly extinguished. It is then no wonder, that despair then prevails; but it is for a moment. In the meantime, the remedy is, immediately to flee to God and to complain of this misery, so that He may succor and raise up those who are thus fallen." CALVIN.]

15. Ver. 19. "Just as wormwood tastes very bitter, but serves many useful purposes, so the cross, for the present, seemeth not to be joyous (Heb. xii. 11). Nevertheless, it is a medicine for us. Wormwood (Vermuth) has its name, thus (wehre dem Muth), control the spirit [temper, or mettle of the soul]. For wormwood restrains from lewdness, disperses the bile, neutralizes poison, and destroys all bad vermin and corruption, all of which and much more, in a spiritual sense, is done by the dear cross. Therefore, let us esteem this our spiritual medicine." CRAMER.—"Was it necessary that Christ Himself should be given gall to drink, why then should we be able entirely to abstain from the like?" CRAMER.

16. Vers. 19-38. "We see here that there are two sources of consolation, internal and external. The internal is, when one is sure in his heart that he has a gracious God, of whom he may expect every good thing in all difficulties and distresses. But this consolation sometimes expires, as we see here in the case of Jeremiah, and from the words and sayings of David, as we have shown above from his Psalms. It often seems as though God Himself, together with Heaven and Earth, is against one. How now should it be with one placed in such temptation? Answer: He should lay hold of the external consolation, which he finds, not in his heart, but in the Holy Scripture, in so many and divine consolatory declarations, which God therein presents to us, together with many examples in the cases of those to whom God has fulfilled and verified such promises. And then also he should carefully consider these heart-moving words, which Jeremiah here uses, which he did not get from his heart, for that spoke to him in a very different fashion, but he received them from the Holy Ghost; thus, It is of the Lord's goodness, that we are not consumed, His mercy fails not, but it is new every morning; The Lord is gracious unto him who waiteth for Him, and to the soul that inquires after Him; It is an excellent thing to be patient and to hope for the help of the Lord: He does not cast off for ever, but He is indeed sorry and moved by compassion according to His great mercies, &c. These and similar sayings we should, in great temptations, take hold of and hold them fast in faith, in spite even of the thoughts and objections of our own hearts. Thereby will God revive in a troubled heart the internal consolation, so that one can say with Jeremiah, Thou wilt be again graciously mindful of me, for so my soul assures me. This I take to heart, therefore I still hope." Wärtemb. Summarien.—"It is the habit and custom of God, first thoroughly to prove men by affliction, and after that to hear His children, if they, as fine gold and silver tried in the oven, are found to be clean and pure. As it is again written, Whoso adheres to wisdom shall dwell securely, and although at first she sets herself in opposition to him, and brings fear and dread upon him, and proves him with her rod and tries him with her chastisements, until she finds that he is without guile, she will then return to him in the right way, and comfort him and show him her secrets. Sirach. iv. 18-21 (15-18)." Egid. Hunnius.

17. (Ver. 21. Prayer. "Grant, Almighty God, that as there are none of us who have not continually to contend with many temptations, and as such is our infirmity, that we are ready to succumb under them, except Thou helpest us,—O grant, that we may be sustained by Thine invincible power, and that also, when Thou wouldst humble us, we may loathe ourselves on account of our sins, and thus perseveringly contend, until, having gained the victory, we shall give Thee the glory for Thy perpetual aid in Christ Jesus our Lord. Amen." CALVIN.]

18. Vers. 22-24. "These are approved texts and cordials for all stricken hearts. 1. God's mercies and compassions, which we may set over against God regarded as a consuming fire, Deut. iv. 24. 2. That His compassions fail not, with which we may resist the temptation, that God will no more be gracious and has forgotten our affliction and oppression, Ps. xlv. 25 (24). 3. That His mercies are new every morning, which we oppose to our temptation when we are compelled to say with David, I am chastened every morning, Ps. lxxiii. 14. 4. That God is faithful, to meet the temptation, that God will make it too hard for us to bear, 1 Cor. x. 13. 5. That God will be our portion and reward, that we will be richly recompensed in Heaven." CRAMER.

19. Vers. 22, 23. "The whole purport of this truly golden maxim is consolatory, and to this end it is to be pleaded in view of the magnitude of the evil both of our guilt and of our punishment. With this accord Rom. v. 21, and Ps. cxxx. 7, as well as the following from AUGUSTINE, God's compassion exceeds the misery of all mankind. The abuse of this maxim is fourfold. The first is that of the Epicureans, who, from like passages of Scripture, in which the immensity of the Divine pity is treated of, deduce that ancient piece of jargon (κοικισμὸν), Let us continue in sin that grace may the more abound, Rom. vi. 1. The second abuse is that of Origen, who concluded that, because of the infinite compassion of God, the damned would at length some time or other, be liberated from the torment of Hell and be saved (Hom. ix. in Jerem.). The third abuse is that of Huber (Samuelis mort., 1624), who, from the amplitude and universality of God's compassion, presumed to fabricate the doctrine of universal and unlimited election. The fourth abuse is that of the Photinians, who so far expand the words of Scripture concerning the compassion of God, as blasphemously to assert, that God, out of His mere compassion alone, forgives our sins, without any compensation and satisfaction rendered by Christ." FÖRSTER.

20. Ver. 24. "LUTHER has finely comprised the distinction between hope and faith, in the following well-rounded period: Faith looks at the word which promises, Hope at the thing promised, (Fides intuetur verbum rei, spes vero rem verbi)."

FÖRSTER.—["Were God to take away the promise, all the miserable would inevitably perish; for they can never lay hold on His mercy except through His word. This, then, is the reason why Scripture so often connects these two things together, even God's mercy and His faithfulness in fulfilling His promises." CALVIN.]

21. [Vers. 24, 25. "It next occurred to the Prophet, that whatever he lost or suffered, or witnessed of the sufferings of his people, his grand interest was secure. He was satisfied that the Lord was his all-sufficient Portion. He was conscious that he had chosen Him as his portion, and expected his happiness from Him, and not from the world; and therefore he determined still to hope in Him, and refer all his concerns to His wisdom, truth, and love. In this he evidently proposed himself as an example to his people, that they might seek comfort from God when all other comfort failed. And though they might not be able confidently to aver that the Lord was their Portion, yet they might remember that He was kind and merciful to those who wait for Him and seek Him." SCOTT.]

22. Ver. 25. "When we men are in trouble or temptation, the Devil is accustomed to portray and represent God to us as very different from what He really is. For he depicts him as an ungracious, pitiless, wrathful Judge, not to be treated with, who would only kill us and damn us and not wish us to be happy, and thus the Devil would frighten us and drive us to despair. We should remove our eyes from this frightful image of Satan's conjuring, and look upon the Lord as the Prophet Jeremiah here depicts for us His countenance, as it were; yea, as God portrays Himself in His holy word, namely thus, The Lord is friendly to the soul that seeks after Him." Egid. HUNNIUS.

23. Ver. 25. "God's love both prepares the way for and rewards ours. Being more benignant it precedes ours; being more faithful it is returned [by ours]: being more attractive it is sought after. It is rich to all who invoke its aid, yet has nothing better than its own self. It devotes itself to the deserving, reserves itself for a reward, applies itself to the souls of the saints for their refreshment, gives itself in payment for the redemption of the captive. Thou art good, O Lord, to the soul of him who seeks Thee. How gracious, then, to him who finds Thee! But here indeed is something wonderful, that no one can successfully seek Thee unless he have first found Thee. Dost Thou, therefore, wish to be found that Thou mayest be sought; to be sought, that Thou mayest be found? Thou art one who can be sought and found, yet not prevented (præveniri). For although we say, 'In the morning shall my prayer prevent Thee,' Ps. lxxxviii. 14 (18), yet there is no doubt that all prayer is lifeless that inspiration has not prevented (non prævenit)." BERNARDUS in libro de diligendo Deo, quoted by GUISLER. p. 144.

24. [Vers. 25, 26. "God is good to all His creatures; but in particular to them that wait for Him, to the soul that seeks Him. While trouble is prolonged and deliverance deferred, we must patiently wait for God's gracious returns to us; and while we wait for Him by faith, we must seek Him by prayer; they that do so will find it good, ver. 26, and to hope that the Salvation of the Lord will come, though difficulties lie in the way, to wait till it does come, though it be long delayed; and while we wait to be quiet and silent, not quibbling with God, or making ourselves uneasy, but acquiescing in the Divine disposals: Father, Thy will be done! If we call this to mind, we may have hope that all will end well at last." MATTH. HENRY.]

25. Ver. 26. "In the practice of Christianity, hope and patience, the most efficient of virtues, engage mutually in common labors, and neither without the other can discharge its duty." FÖRSTER.—"The little herb, Patience, does not grow in every body's garden. But we are admonished to seek it, because, 1. It is a very precious virtue, and a part of the service we owe to God, according to the first table. 2. It contains in itself another virtue, namely, hope in God. 3. It is easier for us to practice it, if we accustom ourselves to it from our youth. 4. It can overcome many wrongs, abuses and outrages. 5. Misfortune will not continue for ever, Is. liv. 7. 6. At all events the end will be favorable. 7. God does not willingly afflict us (from His heart), but always designs something different and better for us, and dearly wishes that He might not punish us at all (Hos. xi. 9)." CRAMER.

"God, when He takes my goods and chattels hence,
Gives me a portion, giving patience.
What is in God is God; if so it be
He patience gives, He gives Himself to me."

ROBERT HERRICK.]

26. Vers. 26-36. "These are admirable and, beyond measure, comforting words, with which the holy Prophet opens the abyss of God's mercy and comforts therewith himself and the people. As if he would say, It is against God's nature to subject us to such hard discipline, and to let us be driven and injured by the world. But He does it for the very best reason, not to ruin, but rather to edify, not to grieve but to fill with joy forever. For He is not of the disposition of the children of men, who, if their anger is once excited, there is no end to it. But God, although He causes grief, and lets His wrath, sternness, and justice be seen, yet He is again moved to pity as soon as men cordially repent of their sin and transgression. Therefore, this present captivity should not be regarded as if He had eternally rejected His poor people, and would never turn their captivity, or as if He would indeed allow His captives to be trodden under foot, or, much less, as if he would subvert the right of a man, or allow his cause to be turned aside before the Most High, as if the Lord saw it not, or knew nothing of it. Far be it from this! He knows and sees how cruelly the tyrants oppress their captives; He, moreover, graciously regards the patience of the oppressed, and will help them again according to His mercies." EGB. HUNNIUS.

27. Ver. 27. "It is added here that a man should be accustomed to cross-bearing (τῇ τραπέζῃ) from his youth. And we may also with propriety apply here that saying of the Poet, A teneris assuescere multum est, There is great advantage in being accustomed to a thing from a tender age. For patience begets experience (Rom. v. 4).—experience, I mean, in matters of cross-bearing. Vexation gives understanding

(Is. xxviii. 19, [Vulg. and Douay]). But what doth he know that hath not been tried? (Sir. xxiv. 9). For, as NAZIANZEN puts it, οὐ πρόσωπα χριστιανισμῶς, ἀλλὰ πίστις, Christianity is faith, not outward appearances. And LUTHER says, Unexperienced persons are merely unprofitable theorizers. But since it is of advantage, in order to become more fully acquainted with any course of discipline, that one should be subjected to it from a tender age, so does it especially conduce to the acquisition of experience in matters of cross-bearing, if one is trained in them from his youth." FÖRSTER.—"Jeremiah himself bore the yoke in his youth. He was very young, according to Jer. i. 6, when he was called to the prophetic office (in the 13th year of Josiah), and from the beginning he experienced much opposition and many trials, hence after eighteen years under Joakim and eleven years under Zedekiah, he was able to endure yet severer persecution. The earlier he had learned to bear the yoke, the better was he able to bear it later in life. It is a golden truth that is here expressed. The cases of Joseph and David also confirm it. A youth of hardships has already brought forth much fruit of godliness, and educated many staunch men for the kingdom of God. Therefore be thou also reconciled to a youth of hardship." CALWER, Handbuch der Bibelerklärung.—"We ought not only to bear the yoke, but to bear it in our youth. For if we bear it late in life, we begin by exercising penitence for the past, rather than by acquiring strength. Let us then anticipate the flight of the years of our youth by suitable discipline, that we may each of us say, O God, who feelest [E. V., Thou hast taught] me from my youth (Ps. lxxi. 17); rather than be obliged to lament at the remembrance of our faults, saying, Remember not the sins of my youth and of my ignorance (Ps. xxv. 7 [See Vulg.])." AMBROSE, Serm. 2, on Ps. cxix. 9.—Deus vult longi prælii militem, God chooses the soldier who has passed through a long fight. HILLARY'S Exposition of Ps. cxix. 9, quoted by GHISLER., p. 146.—"What praise is due to old men, if failing in strength and having been released from long continued labor, they prefer to take their rest? On the other hand, what glory is due to young men, when in the very fervor of youth itself, they moderate their lives by a regimen of strict morality?" CASSIODORUS, in Ps. cxix. 83, quoted by GHISLER., p. 147.

28. [Ver. 28. "He has learnt that necessary lesson of independence, that shows him how he is to serve himself; to give no trouble to others; and keep his troubles, as far as possible, in his own bosom." ADAM CLARKE.]

29. Ver. 29. אִם כֵּן, if so be, peradventure. "This particle affords to the Romanists no support for their fiction of doubt.* LUTHER's interpretation may be seen in his marginal note on Joel ii. 14." FÖRSTER.

30. Ver. 30. "It may be asked here, whether this sentence refers to toleration [the passive, non-resistant endurance of evil]; whether the words, if any one is struck on the cheek, etc.,

*[I. e., in regard to God's willingness to pardon, on which they rest the necessity of propitiating Him by penance.—W. H. H.]

may not seem to support the Anabaptists, who endeavor to prove, from this and similar passages of Scripture, especially from Matt. v. 39, 40, that all species of revenge is forbidden to Christians? But a distinction must be made between public and private, and lawful and unlawful revenge." FÖRSTER.

31. [Vers. 31-33. Prayer. "Grant, Almighty God, that as it is expedient for us to be daily chastised by Thy hand, we may willingly submit to Thee, and not doubt, but that Thou wilt be faithful, and not prove us with too much rigor, but that Thou wilt consider our weakness, so that we may thus calmly bear all Thy chastisements, until we shall at length enjoy that perfect blessedness, which is now hid to us under hope, and as it were sealed, until Christ Thy Son shall reveal it at His coming. Amen." CALVIN.]

32. Ver. 33. "He does not afflict men from His heart." This is not to be understood absolutely (ἀπλῶς), but comparatively, namely, with respect to [what may be called] God's own special work, which consists not in afflicting, but in doing good. Briefly, His disposition towards us is like that of a father towards his son, in reference to which AUGUSTINE very beautifully says, He is both a father and a God when He caresses; and when He smites, still is He a father. . . . With which agrees this saying of NAZIANZEN: μέizon τὸ πᾶν τῆς φιλάνθρωπίας ὑπὲρ τὸ μέτρον τῆς παιδαγωγίας. The measure of His philanthropy exceeds the measure of His severity as a disciplinarian." FÖRSTER.—"The very essence of His being inclines Him to bless, therefore it is written, He does not afflict from His heart His children of the human race; but if they despise His blessing, it is His to smite and requite them with the greater severity." THOLUCK, Stunden Christl. Andacht, XXII., S. 120.

32. [Vers. 34-39. PRAYER. "Grant, Almighty God, that as we are at this day tossed here and there by so many troubles, and almost all things in the world are in confusion, so that wherever we turn our eyes, nothing but thick darkness meets us,—O grant that we may learn to surmount all obstacles, and to raise our eyes by faith above the world, so that we may acknowledge that governed by Thy wonderful counsel is everything that seems to us to happen by chance, in order that we may seek Thee, and know that help will be ready for us through Thy mercy whenever we humbly seek the pardon of our sins, through Christ Jesus our Lord. Amen." CALVIN.]

33. Vers. 37, 38. "In respect to the sins of men, He is not entirely inactive. Not, indeed, as if He took pleasure in their sins, or moved men to commit them, or had ordained men to their sins. That be far from Him! But because from the very first He had entire knowledge of them (Jer. xliii. 24; Ps. cxxxix. 7-12; Job xxiv. 23; Sir. xxiii. 27, 28; Wis. i. 6-10). . . . Therefore it follows, that all the punishments of sin are sent and controlled by God, to His own people, indeed, for the purpose of discipline, but to the ungodly, for their punishment (Is. xlv. 7; Am. iii. 6). . . . Therefore that is an execrable error of some of the heathen philosophers, who taught that what happened to a man, whether good or evil, came by chance, even as his luck befell him: but that God troubled Himself with the affairs of men, was not to be thought of: but that He sits in Heaven, in undisturbed repose, and lets men here, between themselves, plunge, wade or swim as they can, since He takes no concern in their affairs." EGID. HUNNIUS.—"Who then can say that anything is done without the Lord's command? This is a precious word. For first, all adversaries, however lively their devices may be, are only messengers and servants of my Lord, and must obey Him, when He has purposes of love in my behalf for them to accomplish. And, as LUTHER says, Our God is entire Master of the art of whipping a rogue by the hands of others. . . . For the rest, I should not regard the thoughts and devices of all my adversaries, but the loving purposes which my Lord intends to accomplish by them, as David sings, He has spread a table for me in the presence of mine enemies, and filled my cup to overflowing. Whilst they rage and roar, be of good cheer and say, St. Peter cannot prevent God from giving what He will. . . .

Ihr lieben Feinde sorgt so viel, mir Noth und Gram zu machen, Seht doch, ihr seid Handlanger bloß in meines Herren Sachen!
Wohl grämte ich mich bitterlich, wenn ich es nicht erkannte,
Dass doch mein Herr der Wundarzt ist und ihr nur Instrumente.
Wie selig, wer es hat erkannt, dass aller Fäden Enden
Von aller Menschen Werk und Wort ruhn doch in Gottes Händen.

There is then only one real misfortune for men on earth, and that is Sin! THOLUCK, St. Christl. Andacht, XXVIII., S. 162.

34. Ver. 38. "Two words occur here which need to be more accurately defined. The first question is, what is the exact idea of evil in this passage? CALVIN, too, broadly extends its meaning so as to cover all the evils that are done, and that happen in the world, thus not obscurely embracing all sins. But from the context even a blind man may perceive, that the Prophet is not speaking of evil in general, . . . but in fact of that particular species of evil, which is usually called the evil of punishment. For the evil of crime, as such, evidently cannot and ought not to be in any manner attributed to God as its author or producing cause (Deut. xxxii. 4; Ps. v. 5 (4); Rom. ix. 14; 1 John i. 5; James i. 13); but the evil of punishment is, here and in various other places in the Sacred Scriptures, imputed to God as a just Judge (Is. xlv. 7; Am. iii. 6; Sir. xl. 32). The other word referred to, is that translated commandeth (τὸ jubere). In the Hebrew it is צִוָּה. . . . CALVIN twists this word to mean the secret decrees of God, by which He bends the purposes of men hither and thither, according to His own arbitrary will. Whence he infers, that nothing is done without the command and foreordination of God. He adduces the example of Shimei [2 Sam. xvi. 5, 10], who had command to curse. If he had understood this with reference to the evil of punishment, his words would have borne the appearance at least of truth. But what CALVIN in this passage makes so broad, that he writes, Nothing can be done without the Divine mandate, including sins likewise, cannot and ought by no means to be allowed; for the contrary is most clearly attested by what is written in Jer. xix. 6; xxiii. 32; xxix. 23; Sir. xv. 10-22." FÖRSTER.—["Let us now see how God commands what is wrongly and foolishly done by men. Surely He does not command the ungodly to do what is wicked, for He would thus render them excusable; for where God's authority interposes, there no blame can be. But God is said to command whatever He has decreed, according to His hidden counsel. There are, then, two kinds of commands; one belongs to doctrine, and the other to the hidden judgments of God. The command of doctrine, so to speak, is an evident approbation which acquits men; for when one obeys God, it is enough that he has God as his authority, though he were condemned by a hundred worlds. . . . But God is said to command according to His secret decrees what He does not approve, as far as men are concerned. So Shimei had a command to curse, and yet he was not exempt from blame; for it was not his purpose to obey God; nay, he thought that he had offended God no less than David [2 Sam. xix. 19, 20]. Thus this distinction ought to be understood, that some things are commanded by God, not that men may have it as a rule of action, but when God executes His secret judgments by ways unknown to us. Thus, then, ought this passage to be understood, even that nothing is carried on without God's command, that is, without His decree, and, as they say, without His ordination. It hence appears, that those things which seem contingent, are yet ruled by the certain providence of God, so that nothing is done at random. And what philosophers call accident, or contingent (ἐνδεχόμενον), is necessary as to God; for God decreed before the world was made whatever He was to do; so that there is nothing now done in the world which is not directed by His counsel. * * * Now they who object and say that God is thus made the author of evils, may be easily refuted; for nothing is more preposterous than to measure the incomprehensible judgment of God by our contracted minds. . . . This, then, is our wisdom, to embrace only what the Scripture teaches. Now, when it teaches us that nothing is done except through the will of God, it does not speak indiscriminately, as though God approved of murders, and thefts, and sorceries, and adulteries; what then? even that God by His just and righteous counsel so orders all things, that He still will not iniquity and abhors all injustice. . . . How much soever the most wicked may indulge themselves in their vices, He still rules them, . . . that He may punish sins with sins, as Paul teaches us, for he says that God gives up to a reprobate mind those who deserve such a punishment, that He gives them up to disgraceful lusts, that He blinds more and more the despisers of His word (Rom. i. 28; 2 Thess. ii. 10). And then God has various ways, and those innumerable and unknown to us. . . . Thus we see that God is not the author of evils, though nothing happens but by His nod and through His will,—for far differ not His design from that of wicked men. . . . In a word, as far as the Heavens are from the earth, so great is the difference between the works of God and the deeds of men, for the ends, as I have said, are altogether different." CALVIN.]

85. Ver. 89. "The danger here is, that very few sufficiently examine themselves. Whoever does this will discover, how God punishes our sins, and we suffer no undeserved distress." HEIM u. HOFFMANN, die grossen Propheten.—It is usual with unrenewed men commonly, to become enraged at him who punishes them, even when their punishment is entirely just. Thus we read in the Revelation of John (xvi. 9, 11, 21), that men will blaspheme the name of God, who pours out the vials of His wrath upon them, and that they will not repent of their sins. This perversity of the heart, which mistakes right for wrong, and wrong for right, will reach its utmost height in the last days, but its roots reach back to the beginning of the world, where they started with the lies of the Serpent (Gen. iii. 4, 5).—"The evils of punishment are only the effects, or fruits, of the evils of sin (Rom. vi. 23; Jas. i. 15). Hence AUGUSTINE says, with great propriety, 'Punishment daily increases, because sin increases daily; the chastisements of God continue without cessation, because crimes among the people are equally persistent.' But, on the other hand, AMBROSIVS says, with truth; 'God had been ready to change His sentence, if thou hadst been willing to amend thy wickedness by penitence.'" FÖRSTER.

86. Vers. 40-42. ["How are we to get the pardon of our sins? The Prophet tells us:—1. Let us examine ourselves. 2. Let us turn again to the Lord. 3. Let us lift up our heart; let us make fervent prayer and supplication for mercy. 4. Let us lift up our hand; let us solemnly promise to be His, and bind ourselves in a covenant to be the Lord's only: so much lifting up the hand to God implies. Or, let us put our heart on our hand and offer it to God: so some have translated this clause. 5. We have transgressed; let our confession of sin be fervent and sincere. 6. And to us who profess Christianity it may be added, Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ as having died for thee; and thou shalt not perish, but have everlasting life." ADAM CLARKE].

87. Vers. 40, 41. "When Jeremiah says, Let us search and try our ways, and turn again to the Lord; let us lift up our hearts with our hands unto God in the heavens; he reminds us of the proper method to be observed in prayer, namely, sincere confession of sin and repentance must precede our petitions. For we know that God does not hear impenitent sinners (John ix. 31). This method God Himself also has taught us to observe, since He says in Is. i. 16, If ye make many prayers, I will not hear you. Why? For your hands are full of blood. But He immediately adds good counsel: Wash and make yourselves clean, put away your evil doings from before Mine eyes, then come and let us reason together." WÜRTEMB. Summarien.

88. Vers. 83-82. "Here two very different kinds of murmuring are indicated. One that of the ungodly which Isaiah has described, viii. 21, If they suffer hunger, they will fret themselves and curse their king and their God. But besides this, a very salutary kind of murmuring is suggested, which is not directed against God or men, but consists in a man's being discontented with himself and fretting over his sins and forsaking them, and in examining his life that he may know how wicked he has been, since he has not been afraid to sin before the face of God, most holy (Is. lxiv. 6; Dan. ix. 5-14). . . . But that prayer and confession of sins may be acceptable to God, it is required, that not only the mouth may pray, but, as Jeremiah says, the heart and the hands must be lifted up to heaven. For where the mouth only prays, and the heart is not in it, God esteems such spiritless prayer as little as the prayer of those Pharisees and heathen, who, when they wished to pray, babbled much with their mouths, without spirit or sincerity (Matt. vi. 5-8; Is. xxix. 13). . . . Yet we learn from these few brief words of the Prophet Jeremiah, that prayer is not to be deferred too long, nor delayed by impotence. Otherwise it will be too late to call on God and come to Him with prayer, as happened to the Jews, who delayed their repentance and prayer till God's wrath was already kindled. And when they afterwards called on God, it availed nothing (with regard to averting spiritual punishment), therefore they uttered this lamentation, Thou hast covered Thyself with a cloud, that no prayer could pass through (Is. i. 15; lix. 1-3; Mic. iii. 4; Prov. i. 28.)" EGRID. HUNNIUS.

39. Ver. 41. "In such prayer we must persevere, and not as it were desist if help does not come immediately, but must always continue to pray, till the Lord look down from Heaven and behold us, as Jeremiah here says. For God has not such tender ears that He would soon grow weary of hearing, as those men of whom it is said, a beggar may be neither poor nor worthy,—but they will treat him graciously, if he persist tenaciously in his entreaties (Luke xi. 9; Col. iv. 2; 1 Thess. v. 17)." 40. Vers. 42, 43. ["The Prophet proceeded to direct the confessions of his people and to put words into their mouths. He humbly acknowledges that they had transgressed and rebelled against God; and as He had not pardoned, it was plain they had not repented; this was the cause of all their miseries, of which he led them humbly and submissively to complain to the Lord. He had covered them with His anger, pursued them by His judgments, and destroyed them without pity; and He had so covered Himself with a thick cloud, that their prayers could find no admission. The hypocritical prayers of the people for deliverance were rejected; and even the fervent prayers of the Prophet in that behalf were discouraged." 41. Ver. 44. "This cloud is not physical but mystical, a cloud, namely, condensed from the mists and vapors of our sins, the Holy Spirit thus interpreting it in Is. lix. 1, 2; Ps. lxxvi. 18;

John ix. 31. With which agrees that saying of AUGUSTINE, Præfacti peccatores sunt Dei illusores non oratores, Hardened sinners mock God, they do not pray to Him. If therefore we wish our prayers to be heard, this cloud must be dispersed by true and sincere repentance, as Isaiah exhorts, i. 15-18." FÖRSTER.—"However it may have an angry and threatening appearance, that God should draw a dark cloud-covering over His face, yet after all it is no iron wall, but only a cloud that may be easily dissipated, and when God removes our sins as a veil (Is. xlv. 22), then He drives this cloud away." CFAMER.

42. Vers. 44-49. ["The prolonging of troubles is sometimes a temptation, even to praying people, to question whether God be what they have always believed Him to be, a prayer-hearing God; and the distresses of God's people sometimes prevail to that degree, that they cannot find any footing for their faith, nor keep their head above water, with any comfortable expectation." HENRY.]

43. Ver. 50. "Till the Lord behold from Heaven." This phrase is found also in Ps. cii. 20 (19); xiv. 2; xxxiii. 13; Gen. xviii. 21. ZANCHIUS († 1590) endeavors to prove from this expression that Heaven in which God is said to dwell, is a place in the created universe (ens creatum) above the visible heavens. But this is absurd. For it would follow, 1. That God is not everywhere, but is contained in Heaven, which is contrary to the doctrine taught in 1 Kings viii. 27. 2. That the birds in the air are nearer God, than are the pious and faithful on earth; thus AUGUSTINE argues (Book 2, the Sermon on the Mount, ch. ix.), If the habitation of God is believed to be in the Heavens, regarded as the higher parts of the world, then the birds are in reality better off than we, for their life is nearer to God." FÖRSTER.

44. Ver. 51. "His grief is so great, that it is not diminished by tears (as it ought to be, according to the ordinary course of nature), as the Poet says,

Expletur lacrymis, egeriturque dolor,

[Ovid, Tristia, 4, 3, 38], (appeased by tears and spent is grief), but rather is so intensified that it consumes his soul, i. e. his life, the heart, the seat of life, being consumed." FÖRSTER.

45. Ver. 53. "We are aroused to fervent prayer, by our own special calamity, as by an alarm-bell. Thus the people of God here acknowledge, that in the deepest anguish, when almost sunk into the ground in the graves of the lost, they had called on the name of the Lord and had been heard. As often then as God now casts a man into the grave, that is to say, lets him sink into some temporal misfortune or mental despair, he should remember that he is thereby summoned to prayer, that he should lift his heart to God and call upon Him with sighing and weeping." EG. HUNNIUS.

46. Ver. 55. "The prayer of the righteous, says AUGUSTINE, is the key of Heaven; as prayer ascends, the compassion of God descends." FÖRSTER.

47. Vers. 48-66. "Jeremiah thought that injustice was done him, although he did not regard himself as innocent before God, but ascribed everything that befell him and his people, to his own sins and to the sins of the people; yet he held that injustice was done him by his enemies, who persecuted him on account of the word of God. And in the same way may one, when he suffers wrong from his enemies, appeal to his innocence before God and men, as David says, Lord do me justice, for I am innocent (Ps. xxvi. 1). But before God no one should esteem himself guiltless, but we should remember that the evil which befalls us undeservedly at the hands of our enemies, is deservedly sent upon us by God, on account of other sins, that we should repent of. In repentance, moreover, no one should look and wait for others, before he himself makes a beginning, but as Jeremiah here sets an example of repentance before others, so should every one else do. Then, at least, there will be a general repentance, and God will regard our repentance and will hear us according to His promise, for which we shall praise Him for ever and ever. Amen." Würtemb. Summarien.

48. Ver. 57. ["Fear not. How powerful is this word when spoken by the Spirit of the Lord to a disconsolate heart. To every mourner we may say, on the authority of God, Fear not! God will plead thy cause, and redeem thy soul." CLARKE.]

49. Ver. 60. ["Thou hast seen. Everything is open to the eye of God. Distressed soul! though thou knowest not what thy enemies meditate against thee; yet He who loves thee does, and will infallibly defeat all their plots, and save thee." CLARKE.—"As soon as any trial assails us, we imagine that God is turned away from us; and thus our flesh tempts us to despair. It is hence necessary that the faithful should in this respect struggle with themselves and feel assured that God has seen them. Though, then, human reason may say, that God does not see, but neglect and disregard His people, yet on the other hand, this doctrine ought to sustain them, it being certain that God does see them. This is the reason why David so often uses this mode of expression." CALVIN.]

50. Ver. 60. "Quæ hic tormenta, erunt illic ornamenta. What are our torments here, will be our ornaments there." AUGUSTINE.

51. Vers. 64-66. With regard to prayer against enemies, see Doctrinal and Ethical remarks on i. 20-22.—[Prayer. "Grant, Almighty God, that as at this day ungodly men and wholly reprobate so arrogantly rise up against Thy Church, we may learn to flee to Thee, and to hide ourselves under the shadow of Thy wings, and fully to hope for Thy salvation; and that, however disturbed the state of things may be, we may yet never doubt but that Thou wilt be propitious to us, since we have so often found Thee to be our deliverer; and that we may thus persevere in confidence of Thy grace and mercy, and be also roused by this incentive to pray to Thee, until having gone through all our miseries, we shall at length enjoy that blessed rest which Thou hast promised to us through Christ Jesus our Lord. Amen." CALVIN.]

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

1. Vers. 1-18. The lamentation of the Prophet.

1. A source of consolation to the pious in severe temptation. 2. A solemn warning to the ungodly. "We learn, here, how God often permits even His dearest children and the most holy of His chosen ones to be deeply tempted on earth, that they may have to some extent a taste of the agony of Hell. . . . But the ungodly, who live in this world tranquilly and happily, should regard the case of the righteous as a mournful foretelling of the pains of Hell, whereby they will yet, at some time, as by a mighty thunder-clap, be awakened out of their profound and dangerous sleep of false security." Eo. HUNNIUS.

2. Vers. 19-21. How he who is tempted should strengthen himself in severe affliction. 1. He should lament his sorrow unto the Lord (pour out his heart before Him, Ps. lxi. 9 (8); cii. 1 (idle); cxlii. 8 (2)). 2. He should be assured that God is mindful of him (by Christ we have the knowledge of Divine Adoption, Rom. viii. 15, 16). 3. He should, on this account, rejoice in hope (Rom. xii. 12; 1 Thess. v. 16; Rom. v. 2).

3. Vers. 22, 23. Sermon on a special day of fasting and prayer by the court-preacher GARNSEISEN, in PALMER'S ev. Casual-Reden, Bd. 1., S. 271. "Our text instructs us, 1. How God, even in times of affliction, shows His regard for us. 2. How we also, in such affliction, should show our regard for God."

4. Vers. 22, 23. "With what we may comfort ourselves when we feel that we are forsaken. 1. The goodness of the Lord, that helps to sustain us, so that we are not utterly overwhelmed. 2. The compassion of the Lord, which we experience every day. 3. The faithfulness of the Lord, which enables us to hope firmly in the fulfilment of all His promises." FLOREY, bibl. Wegweiser für geistliche Grabreden, Nr. 46.

5. Vers. 24, 25. "The happiness of a believing soul even in painful circumstances. 1. The consolation which it takes to itself.—God is my portion. 2. The resolution to which it is stimulated.—I will hope in Him. 3. The experience it makes proof of,—the Lord is gracious." FLOREY, ib. Nr. 47.

6. Vers. 26, 27. "The benefits of early affliction. 1. They teach at a time when men are most susceptible of instruction; and they teach them [what they most need to learn at that time of life] to recognize the vanity of earthly things and to give heed to the Word of God. 2. They purify at a time when the heart is in the greatest danger of being corrupted; and they purify them from [those besetting sins of youth] selfishness and sensuality. 3. They strengthen them at a time when strength is weakest and temptations to sin are the strongest; and they strengthen them especially to patient endurance on this earth and separation from this earth." FLOREY, ib. Nr. 48. See TROST und MAHNUNG an Gräbern, ii. Bändch., S. 154.

7. Vers. 27-33. The chastisements of the Lord. 1. He chastises not for the sake of making men miserable (ver. 33). 2. He chastises not forever (vers. 31, 32). 3. He chastises that we may learn, (1) patience (vers. 27, 28), (2) silence, quietness (ver. 29), (3) meekness (ver. 30), (4) hope (ver. 29).

8. Vers. 27-33. The Divine discipline. 1. Its source; Love (vers. 31-33). 2. Its means; Sorrow and joy (vers. 27-33). 3. Its aim; the perfecting of the man of God (vers. 27-30, see 2 Tim. iii. 17).

9. Vers. 31-33. "The blessed change with which believing Christians may console themselves. 1. After pain follows pleasure. 2. After death, life. 3. After separation, a restoration." FLOREY, as above, Nr. 49.

10. Ver. 32. "The history of the year's harvest an image of our history for the year. The resemblance appears in these respects: 1. How finely the whole country looked; 2. With what difficulty it withstood the power of the storm; 3. How, nevertheless, God's hand has protected us." BEYER S. E. (in Plauen), Harvest Sermon, 1866.

11. Vers. 37, 38. "No misfortune happens without God's will. 1. This is a great comfort to those on whom misfortune has fallen; for (1), they will not vex themselves unnecessarily with self-inflicted reproaches; (2), they will be more susceptible to the voice of the Gospel; (3), they will humble themselves under the mighty hand of God. 2. This is a strong support for the confidence in God of those who properly consider it; for (1), they will be freer from anxious cares; (2), stronger in their reliance on God's guidance; (3), they will be more perfect in the spiritual man. 3. This is a solemn warning to those who embrace this opinion; (1), that they do not sin against the wisdom of God; (2), that they do not violate brotherly love; (3), that they do not forestall the judgment of God's word." FLOREY, same as above, Nr. 251. See Trost und Mahnung an Gräbern, i. Bdchen. s. 216.

12. Vers. 18-39. Sermon of G. CHR. DEICHERT on Midlent Sunday (see Stern aus Jakob, Stuttgart, Liesching, 1867: "This Lenten Sunday brings us into sorrow's school, where we shall learn hope in God, under severe chastisement and in bitter trouble; where we shall learn submissive meekness, and yet have hours of respite, when we may take breath, gather fresh strength, and address ourselves anew to the conflict. But the first thing is that we pass the examination [or trial for entrance into this school]."

13. Vers. 39-42. "Weighty words for every one who is under the cross and in trouble. This, then, is no time for unbelieving, impatient, impenitent murmuring, but a time when we should examine ourselves, and learn in what respects we deserve what the Lord says to us, by means of such chastisements, and when we should submit patiently to His will, who smites us righteously, and thus implore grace." CALWER Handbuch Bibelklärung.—"If God chastises the sinner, but with measure, so that He still spares his life, then should not man, whose life is spared by the grace of God, lament on account of God's righteousness, and on account of the punishment of his own sins; rather every one should lament on account of his own sin, which has brought that punishment upon him; every one should complain of himself (not of God), for this is an indication of true penitence." LISCO.

14. Vers. 39-42. The murmuring that is forbidden and that which is commanded. 1. Forbidden, because unjustifiable, is murmuring over the evil we are obliged to suffer as a punishment of our sins (vers. 39, 42). 2. Commanded, is murmuring over our sins, by which we have offended God; and this is right only when it results (1), in sincere repentance (ver. 40); (2), in hearty prayer for God's grace.

15. Vers. 44-50. Of wrestling with God in prayer. 1. This presupposes an attack that God has made upon us, through the cross and trouble (vers. 45-47, comp. vers. 1-17). 2. It consists (1), on our part, in vehement prayer (vers. 48, 49); (2), on God's part, in the repeated rejection of our prayer (ver. 44.) 3. It ends (1), on our part, with believing perseverance in prayer; (2), on God's part, with God-like acceptance of our prayers (ver. 50).

16. Vers. 48-66. Prayer of the innocent and persecuted man for help against his enemies. 1. Description of the wanton oppression of his enemies and the heart-felt lamentation of the oppressed (vers. 48-54). 2. Whither this one had turned himself [for help] in this difficulty. (Vers. 55-58: "We, who had been cast, as it were, into the pit of destruction and the abyss of terror and distress, knew not whither to betake ourselves, except unto Thee alone, O Lord! We called upon Thee out of our anguished hearts, and Thou didst hear us. Since Thou hast begun to hear, hide not now Thine ears from our sighs and our cries.") 3. Prayer, that God will not let the wickedness of his enemies go unrevenge. (Vers. 59-66: "With Thee, truly, O Lord, I have nothing to say, because one cannot answer Thee for one thing of a thousand. But this we commend to Thee, O Lord, as the Righteous Judge, that our enemies, without any justifying cause, have tyrannized over us so grievously. Thou hearest also their reproach, which is uttered not only against us, but much more against Thy holy name. Because they will not cease from this outrageous insolence, do Thou then set about to requite them, as they have deserved. Let their heart be terrified, that is now defiant; let them feel Thy curse, which now they despise"). Fifth Sermon of EGID. HUNNIUS on the 3d chap. of Lamentations.

CHAPTER IV.

ZION'S GUILT AND PUNISHMENT GRAPHICALLY DESCRIBED BY AN EYE-WITNESS, [OR THE SUFFERINGS OF THE PEOPLE OF ALL GRADES AND RANKS OF SOCIETY.—W. H. H.]

The Song consists plainly of four parts [or sections], vers. 1-6; 7-11; 12-16; 17-20; and a conclusion, vers. 21, 22

PART I. VERS. 1-11.

SECT. I. VERS. 1-6.

- ⌘ VER. 1. How doth gold become dim!
 The choice gold change its color!
 The hallowed stones are cast forth
 At the head of every street.
- ⌚ VER. 2. The noble sons of Zion,
 Who are equal in value to the purest gold,
 How are they esteemed as earthen pitchers,
 The work of the hands of the Potter!
- ⌚ VER. 3. Even jackals drew out the breasts,
 They suckled their whelps.
 The daughter of my people became cruel,
 Like ostriches in the wilderness.
- ⌚ VER. 4. The tongue of the sucking babe cleaved
 To the roof of his mouth for thirst:
 Young children asked bread.
 There was no one to break to them.
- ⌚ VER. 5. They that fed on dainties
 Perished on the streets:
 They that were borne on scarlet Embraced heaps-of-dirt.
- ⌚ VER. 6. For greater was the iniquity of the daughter of my people
 Than the sin of Sodom,
 Which was overthrown as in a moment
 And no hands came against her.

SEC. II. VERS. 7-11.

- ⌚ VER. 7. Her princes were purer than snow,
 Whiter than milk,
 They were more ruddy in body than corals;
 Their form—a sapphire.
- ⌚ VER. 8. Their visage became darker than blackness:
 They were not known in the streets:
 Their skin cleaved to their bones,
 It became dry like a stick.
- ⌚ VER. 9. Happier were those slain by the sword
 Than these slain by famine,
 Those pierced-ones, whose lives gushed forth
 While yet there were fruits of the field.
- ⌚ VER. 10. The hands of tender-hearted women Cooked their own children;
 They became food for them
 In the ruin of the daughter of my people.

VER. 11. Jehovah fulfilled His fury;
He poured out His fierce wrath.
And He kindled a fire in Zion,
And it consumed her foundations.

ANALYSIS.

[The first elegy related especially to the city of Jerusalem; the second, to Zion and the holy places; the third, to the sufferings of the prophet, as a representative of the spiritual Israel; this fourth elegy, relates to the sufferings of the people generally, embracing all classes.—W. H. H.]

The two parts, comprising the first-half of the chapter, vers. 1—6, 7—11, correspond with each other, both in matter and form. In the first part, vers. 1—6, is described the sad fate of the sons of Zion, noble scions of the noblest lineage (Jer. ii. 21). A contrast is presented, not only between their great worth and their pitiable fortune, but also between the fate that befell them, who constituted the living treasure of Zion, and the fate of its material wealth, vers. 1, 2. Then is described the harrowing grief, caused by the sufferings of little children, which could not possibly be relieved, vers. 3—5. Finally this part closes with the general remark, that Zion's guilt, if inferred from these facts, had been even greater than Sodom's, ver. 6.

In the second part, vers. 7—11, the Poet first describes the noble appearance and character of the Princes of Judah, and then, in striking contrast, the frightful wrongs they had endured, vers. 7—9; a description which evidently constitutes a parallel to that contained in vers. 1, 2. So, also, parallel to what was said of the children in vers. 3—5, is what we read on the same subject in ver. 10; only what is here said in ver. 10, constitutes a climax to what was related in vers. 3—5. The second part, like the first, ends with a general remark; Zion has suffered the full measure of Divine wrath, ver. 11.

IV. 1, 2.

1 How is the gold become dim! how is the most fine gold changed! the stones of
2 the sanctuary are poured out in the top of every street. The precious sons of Zion, comparable to fine gold, how are they esteemed as earthen pitchers, the work of the hands of the potter!

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 1. אִכָּה, see i. 1.—וְעָם, Hophal only here; elsewhere only Kal occurs, and that only twice, Ez. xxviii. 3; xxxi. 8. If the signification of עָם, demanded by the context in Ez. xxviii. 3, is latere,—and in xxxi. 8, is obscurare, then it naturally follows that the signification of the Hophal here is obscurari; though it is not yet clearly apparent how this meaning agrees with the idea of accumulation (Sammeln), which lies in the words עָם עִכָּה עָם. [HENDERSON; "עָם" to congregate, Arabic, lexit, obscuravit, as clouds, when collected, do the heavens; hence to grow, or make dark, obscure the lustre of anything. LXX ἐμυώθη."]—אִכָּה. With respect to its Aramaic form, see iii. 12; 2 Kings xxv. 29; Eccl. viii. 11. [BLAYNEY: "Twenty-five MSS. and one edition read אִכָּה."] The word has the signification of alium, diversum esse,—mutari,—only in later Hebrew, Esth. i. 7; iii. 8; Mal. iii. 6; and that in accordance with the Chaldaic, which often uses אִכָּה in this sense, Dan. iii. 27; v. 9; vi. 18.—כָּלָה, is not found in Jer.; it stands in parallelism with וְהָבָה in Job xxxi. 24; Prov. xxv. 12; it is used with כָּלָה, Cant. v. 11. [The Sept. have ἀφύγκαν, not because they read וְהָבָה, but because they were unwilling to repeat the word gold. ROSENMUELLER.]

Ver. 2. יְקָרִים. In Jer. only in xv. 19.—כָּלָה only here. The expression seems to be taken from Job xxviii. 16, 19, where we read of wisdom כָּלָה כָּלָה. לא תכלה כָּלָה. [Jerome translates amiciti auro, which CALVIN prefers. "The value, and not the appearance is evidently meant," (OWEN); it is the explanation of יְקָרִים, precious.—W. H. H.]—פָּן from פָּן, secernere, purgare, not occur in Jer.; yet see x. 9. The article generalizes the meaning.—Jer. never uses the Niphal נִחָשֶׁה, נִחָשֶׁה, Jer. xlii. 12; xlviii. 12.—חָרֵשׁ, Jer. xix. 1; xxxii. 14. The construction with ל, as Is. xxix. 17; Ps. cvi. 31. Elsewhere, after נִחָשֶׁה that with which the comparison is made is indicated by כִּי, עָם, or the simple nominative, יִצְרָר, frequent in Jer. x. 16; xviii. 2, 3, 4; xix. 1, 11; etc. [No occasional use of a new word can invalidate the presumption created by the use of the image of a potter's vessel, that Jeremiah was the author of this poem.—W. H. H.]—The expression כִּי עֵשָׂה occurs here only.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Ver. 1. How. That this song also begins with this exclamation (אִכָּה) is a strong argument for the identity of the author. It is in the highest degree improbable that different authors not only composed alphabetical songs on the same subject, but also began them with the very same word. How is the gold become dim!

how is the most fine gold changed! How may gold become black, the precious treasure change its color? The correct understanding of this verse depends on the understanding of the next verse and its relation to this verse. THENIUS would substitute in ver. 2, houses of Zion for sons of Zion (בָּתֵּי צִיּוֹן instead of בְּנֵי צִיּוֹן). Without dwelling on the fact, that not the least critical evidence for such a change of the text is offered, the context affords sufficient evidence against it: for not only would houses equal in value to gold be an exaggerated hyperbole, but it is evident from the antithesis involved in the expression the work of the hands of the potter, and also from the subject of the parallel verses 7-9, that men are intended. But if we retain the reading sons of Zion, and if the meaning is that the sons of Zion, regarded as precious, are equal in value [comparable] to gold, then it is obvious in what sense gold and precious stones are spoken of in ver. 1. It is not of the fate of the Temple-gold and Temple-walls that he speaks [CALVIN, BOOTHROYD, NOYES, and seemingly WORDSWORTH]; but the Poet asks how is it possible that noble gold should lose its brightness, that the precious stones should be thrown upon the street? Thus, says he, has it happened to the sons of Zion, who are such jewels. And thus, what never happened in the case of material treasures and jewels, has occurred in the case of these living, metaphorical jewels. We take, then, ver. 1, as a question, relating to what was likely to happen according to the usual course of things. This is involved in the use of the imperfect tense in the Hebrew verbs (עָלָה, etc.), which refer to matters not yet completed as, it was becoming dim or obscured, etc. In any other sense the perfect tense would have been necessary. Nor can these imperfections be referred to the work of destruction while in course of execution (THENIUS); for it would certainly be very singular to represent the Jews as saying, whilst the work of destruction was going on, "How is now the gold in the Temple blackened by the smoke! How now are the stones of the Temple-wall rolled down!" Those, over whose heads everything was going to pieces, could not be thinking of such minute and particular details as these. Rather, in the form of a question, what had never before been known to happen, is here affirmed. [The form is interrogative, only so far as the interjection of surprise suggests a question as to the possibility of an event, else unparalleled. The construction is the same as in i. 1, How sitteth solitary the city that, etc.! So here, How doth gold become dim! That the reference is to men, and not to literal gold and jewels, is the opinion of BLAYNEY, HENDERSON, ROSENMUELLER, GERLACH and others. GERLACH: "Since the chapter contains not one word (unless here) of the destruction and robbery of the Temple and palaces, but describes especially what befell the men, rather than the edifices of the city, (which latter theme had already been exhaustively discussed in chap. ii.), therefore the first verse must not be taken literally and explained of the Temple and its ornaments (Chald., MAURER, KALKAR, THENIUS; see i. 10). It is rather to be taken figuratively, either generally of the fall of all that was high and valuable in Israel, of which particular instances are cited in what follows, or, as MICHAELIS and ROSENMUELLER have preferred, specifically, as explained by the following verse, which interprets the gold and holy stones of ver. 1, by the sons of Zion, whilst the words are thrown down at all the street-corners, find their explanation in the more detailed description of ver. 5. Besides, this designation of the sons of Zion as stones of holiness (אֲבָנֵי-קֹדֶשׁ), has an analogy in the stones of a crown (אֲבָנֵי-יָדָה, precious stones) in Zech. ix.

16. From this it appears, how unauthorized is the presumption (MICHAELIS, ROSENMUELLER), which would perceive in the expression, stones of holiness, a reference to the stones on the breast-plate of the High Priest and, therefore, a designation of the Priests (whilst the gold denotes the people generally, and the precious ore [fine gold] the Princes), or would understand the words stones of holiness as referring directly to the stones on the breast-plate of the High Priest (MAURER [NOYES], see BELLERMANN, Urim u. Thum, s. 21. 'With the Israelites, thrown about dead on the streets, on account of their sins,—the holy stones—regarded as symbols of the people—will, at the same time, be scattered about at the corners of the streets.') The literal interpretation of the stones as the stones of the walls of the Sanctuary, by THENIUS and NEUMANN, [CALVIN, BOOTHROYD, etc.], (in which case the words should be אֲבָנֵי-הָקֶדֶשׁ), is controverted by the improbability of their being scattered about through all the streets of the city,—an opinion, which is not made more acceptable by the conjecture of THENIUS, that all the streets of the city terminated near the Temple in an open square, for in any case the expression would then be very strongly hyperbolic."—W. H. H.]—Become dim.—The signification of the verb (עָלָה, obscurari), is to be taken, not in the sense of a momentary effect, but of a continuous obscuration. For not a superficial and transient, but a deep and abiding depravation is affirmed in ver. 2, of the gold-like sons of Zion. What is said, then, is this, How can gold lose its bright lustre, and become dull, tarnished, black?—[How. The repetition of the how in the English version is as unnecessary here as in i. 1.—The most fine gold.—The Hebrew word for gold here is not the same Hebrew word used in the preceding clause. BROUGHTON has supplied the lack of an English equivalent by retaining the Hebrew word: How is the gold dimmed! how is the pure cethern changed! The Hebrew word (זָהָב) has been variously derived and interpreted. Three explanations have received the sanction of high authority (see LANGE's Comm., Cant. v. 11). It has been derived from עָלָה, to hide, to hoard, hence esteemed precious. So BARNES, Job xxxi. 24. Dr. NAGELSBACH seems to adopt this sense. The English version also by using the superlative most fine gold. But if the word itself meant precious gold, the addition of the adjective טוֹב, good, would be superfluous. It has been derived, again, from עָלָה in the supposed sense of being solid, dense, hence massive gold: so BLAYNEY, the best massy gold. Others derive it from עָלָה-שֶׁמֶךְ, to shine, to glitter, and explain it of some very valuable kind of metal like gold (so GERLACH the costly ore, or metal, Erz); or of a particular kind of gold that shines and sparkles, genus auri fulgentis, a micando (FUERST's Concordance). This last meaning seems to agree best with the sense here, the use of the word in Cant. v. 11, and the very peculiar use of the verb in Jer. ii. 22. According to ROSENMUELLER, Chaldeaus rendered it יָדָה, splendor, the Syriac and JEROME, color.—Changed, faded or changed its color. GERLACH: "This can only denote a change of color, or loss of brightness, since the gold could not be changed in its substance." W. H. H.]—The stones of the Sanctuary are poured out in the top of every street. Thrown down are the stones of the sanctuary [stones of holiness, or consecrated stones] at the corners of all the streets. The expression stones of the sanctuary (אֲבָנֵי קֹדֶשׁ), is found only here. By itself it might properly denote the stones of the Temple walls, particularly since these are also called costly stones (אֲבָנִים יְקָרֹת), 1 Kings v. 31 (17); vii. 9-11. But who would take the trouble to carry these away and pour them out in the corners of the streets? What THENIUS says of the concentration of the principal streets at the foot of the Temple hill, is very problematical. Besides, the connection requires the sense of precious stones: for with such, not with wall-stones, however excellent, are the Sons of Zion compared as precious (יְקָרִים), and precious stones (אֲבָנֵי יְקָרָה), are often named, as here, in connection with gold, 2 Sam. xii. 30; 1 Kings x. 2, 10, 11. In regard to the use of precious stones in the Sanctuary, they were not only attached to the garments of the High Priest (Ex. xxviii. 9, 17-20; xxxix. 6, 10-13), but they were employed for ornamenting the Temple itself (2 Chron. iii. 6; 1 Chron. xxix. 2). Who would pour out such valuable stones in the corners of all the streets, that is to say, in the first corner one happened to come to? Even the enemy did not do that. Yet this thing happened to the sons of Zion though they were most precious jewels.

Ver. 2. The precious sons of Zion.—Zion's sons, the noble ones (אֲבָנֵי יְקָרִים) comp. יְקָרֹת, honorable women, Ps. xlv. 10 (9). That we are to understand here by the sons of Zion, the nobility of the people [CALVIN, HENDERSON], I do not believe. The expression is too comprehensive, and nothing prevents our understanding the following predicates of the chosen people generally,* who were in their totality a kingdom of priests (Ex. xix. 6). The Princes are spoken of for the first time in the second part, vers. 7-11, which constitutes throughout the climax of the first part.—Comparable to fine gold, who are equal in value to gold [lit., those who are weighed with pure gold. HENDERSON: "As what is weighed is estimated according to the contents of the opposite scale, the verb came to be employed in the sense of comparing one thing with another. Comp. Job xxviii. 16, 19."—Fine gold, זָהָב, is pure, solid gold. [This is still another Hebrew word for gold, indicating its quality. BROUGHTON anglicizes it, Fesse ore, as he does פֶּתַח in ver. 1, which he calls etern. BLAYNEY: the purest gold.—W. H. H.] They are estimated by the gold, that is to say, their value is represented by a mass of gold, the weight of which is equal to their own. The expression is figurative.—How. [The repetition of this word חַכָּה, is forcible. It serves to connect this verse with ver. 1, and to continue and complete the sentence begun with the same word in ver. 1. It shows that one idea of horror and amazement pervades the whole sentence, and hence that the gold, choice gold, and hallowed stones, of ver. 1, are identical with the precious sons of Zion, in ver. 2.—W. H. H.]—Are they esteemed as earthen pitchers—potsherd pitchers—the work of the hands of the potter! [WORDSWORTH: "As Jeremiah himself had represented them to be shattered in pieces for their sins, xix. 10. 11." GATAKER: "As bottles of sherd, or earthen stuff, so Jer. xix. 1, 10; as things of no repute or worth, 2 Cor. iv. 7. See Jer. xxii. 28." GERLACH: "The point of comparison is the worthlessness of the material out of which they are made, see Is. xlv. 9."] precious, comparable to gold, by passages in which children are represented as of more value than any other gift of God, Gen. xv. 2; xxx. 1; Ps. cxxvii. 3. There is no necessity for this. It is much more natural to take these two introductory verses as embracing a general description of the humiliation of the whole people. The verses that follow give us the details of the picture, with reference to particular classes of people.—W. H. H.]

IV. 3-5.

3 Even the sea-monsters draw out the breast, they give suck to their young ones:
4 the daughter of my people is become cruel, like the ostriches in the wilderness. The tongue of the sucking child cleaveth to the roof of his mouth for thirst; the young
5 children ask bread, and no man breaketh it unto them. They that did feed delicately are desolate in the streets; they that were brought up in scarlet embrace dung-hills.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 3.—[יָמִין] (K'rī, D'gē). Sea-monsters, E. V., BOOTHROYD: sea-calves, E. V. marg.: dragons, BROUGHTON, BLAYNEY, OWEN; serpent, CALVIN; jackals, HENDERSON, NOYES, FURST, Lex.: wolves, GERLACH: wild-dogs, THENIUS.]—יָמִין, never used in Jeremiah, is used of pulling off the shoe, in Deut. xx. 9, 10; Is. xx. 2. The sense of drawing, seems to lie at the foundation of this root (see Hos. v. 6). Whether a second root יָמִין (from which comes מְיָרֵן, one equipped, a warrior) may be affirmed, or whether the original identity of both may be established, we cannot now stop to inquire.—מָמָה, mamma, Jeremiah never uses [because he never had occasion to speak of the female breasts or teats.—W. H. H.].—Of the verb יָנַח, Jeremiah uses only once the Participle יֹנֵחַ, xlv. 7, in a substantive sense. [The only time Jeremiah in his prophecies had occasion to speak of a suckling, or make any allusion to a mother's nursing a child at the breast, he uses the participle of the verb נָקַח . What verb then would Jeremiah have been more likely to use in this place?—W. H. H.— נָקַח , young-ones [whelp], is found once in Jeremiah, in the form נָקַח , II. 38, see Nah. II. 13.— נָקַח . See II. 11; III. 48.— נָקַח . The verb to be or become must be supplied. See EWALD, § 217 d, a. נָקַח (Jeremiah uses only נָקַח , vi. 23; xxx. 14; I. 42) is the cruel one, Job xxx. 21. We would expect the feminine form: but that is never used, and, besides, the masculine form seems intended to convey the idea of uncommanly, unmotherly; it is as if it were said, Zion has become a hardened man.— נָקַח . The Masorites connect the two words and read נָקַח . It is true that נָקַח occurs only here (elsewhere the ostrich is called נָקַח , the daughter of screeching, Mic. I. 8; Job. xxx. 29, etc.). Yet the K'tib is to be approved of. For, on the one hand, the separation could easily happen by mistake; and, on the other hand, נָקַח , as the K'tib has it, gives no satisfactory sense. It must be translated, For criers (Heuler) in the wilderness (are they.) To supply נָקַח here is difficult, and who are the criers in the wilderness? The children, or (as others prefer) their parents? [Forty-five of KENNICOTT'S MSS., and seventy-seven of DE ROSSI'S, and most of the early printed editions of the 15th century, according to HENDERSON and GERLACH, have נָקַח , without any reference to another reading, "NEUMANN, in support of the K'tib, would understand by the crying ones (Heulenden) the wild beasts of the wilderness, as the Venetian Greek, $\omega\varsigma \sigma\alpha\upsilon\alpha\pi\tau\epsilon\varsigma$ " (GERLACH).—W. H. H.]

Ver. 4.— נָקַח . The same phrase is found in Job xxix. 10; Ps. cxxxvii. 6; comp. xxii. 16 (15); Ex. iii. 26, where נָקַח is used.—Jeremiah uses נָקַח never [because he never had occasion to, not happening ever to speak of the palate, or roof of the mouth.—W. H. H.] נָקַח twice, xlii. 11; xlii. 16: נָקַח once, xlv. 7: נָקַח frequently, v. 15; ix. 2, 4, 7, etc.: נָקַח once for נָקַח , xlviii. 18.— נָקַח . See I. 5; II. 19; Jer. vi. 11; ix. 20 (21).— נָקַח , a scribal variety for נָקַח , as Mic. iii. 8; see Is. lviii. 7; Jer. xvi. 7.

Ver. 5.— נָקַח is frequently constructed with נָקַח (Ex. xii. 43-45; Lev. ii. 11; Jud. xlii. 16), but nowhere except here with נָקַח . BÜRTCHER urges the נָקַח , and translates admitted to dainties, or directed to dainties [נָקַח having a local sense, as 2 Sam. ix. 7, or Job xii. 8. See THENIUS]. THENIUS supposes the allusion to be rather to the external surroundings of delicate food, than to the food itself. But it is not apparent how נָקַח can mean to admit, to direct, or how נָקַח can denote something aroused. If נָקַח is to be explained as a Hebraism, then we must adopt a pregnant construction, and regard נָקַח as dependent on an omitted verb of craving after, longing for. See Prov. xxiii. 3, 6, נָקַח נָקַח נָקַח , comp. xxiv. 1. To eat after dainties would, then, be the same as seeking to eat such. Our book, however, was written at a time when an Aramaic expression cannot surprise us. Besides, there is found in Jeremiah an undoubted example of this Aramaic נָקַח , as a nota accusativi, xl. 2. [Note this as a mark of Jeremiaic authorship, that is a set-off, at least, against many of the trivial exceptions to his style.—W. H. H.] See EWALD, § 277, e. [GESENIUS Gr., § 151, e. "It is a solecism of the later style, when active verbs are construed with נָקַח , instead of the accusative, as נָקַח Lam. iv. 5."—GERLACH takes the whole expression adverbially, nach Herzenslust assen, they ate according to their heart's desire.—W. H. H.] נָקַח . See Gen. xlix. 20; 1 Sam. xv. 32; Prov. xxix. 17. נָקַח , Jer. II. 34, is composed of נָקַח and נָקַח (Ps. xxxvi. 9 (8); 2 Sam. i. 24.— נָקַח . See Jer. iv. 9; Ex. iv. 17, where the word is used as here of persons.— נָקַח is the technical word for the nurture of children: see נָקַח , Num. xi. 12; Is. xlix. 23; 2 Kings x. 1, 5; Esth. ii. 7: נָקַח , Ruth iv. 16; 2 Sam. iv. 4. The fundamental meaning seems to be to carry, support, raise up; see נָקַח a column, נָקַח , the one who erects a building, the architect. נָקַח are then gestati, see Is. lx. 4. Jeremiah uses Niphal, xv. 18; xlii. 5, and Hiphil, xlii. 6; xl. 14, but only in an ethical sense.— נָקַח does not occur in Jeremiah.—The word נָקַח occurs only here. The plural נָקַח in 1 Sam. ii. 8; Ps. cxlii. 7; Neh. ii. 13; iii. 13, 14; xii. 31. The signification is undoubtedly dirt (Koth). For its derivation, see EWALD, § 190, e; OLSH., § 211, a.—The verb נָקַח , Jeremiah uses in no form. Piel is to embrace.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Ver. 3. Vers. 1, 2, describe the misfortunes of Zion from a theocratic point of view; vers. 3-5 show how terrible they were, as seen from a natural point of view, by describing the pitiable misery of the poor children: see i. 5; ii. 11, 12, 19, 20. Even the sea-monsters (marg. sea-calves) [jackals, or wolves] draw out [drew-out] the breast, they give [gave] suck to their young ones. That the Hebrew word translated sea-monsters, נָקַח , here stands for נָקַח = jackals (see Jer. ix. 10 (11); x. 22; xiv. 6, etc.), was an opinion of the Masorites, which many of the moderns have adopted from the Syriac. In fact, נָקַח is the Aramaic plural ending (see Olsh. § 111 b), which would not be surprising here. נָקַח , as a singular (see Jer. li. 34) is bellua maritima (see Gen. i. 21), which is defined at one time as a dragon, at another as a whale, at another as a crocodile, at another as a serpent (comp. Ex. vii. 9, 10; Deut. xxxii. 23; Ps. lxxiv. 13, etc.). That the sea-monsters draw out for use the teats, which are contained in the breasts as in bags or sheaths, BOCHART (in the Hierozoicon, tom. iii. p. 777, ed. Rosenmüller) authenticates, by many evidences, as a fact known to the ancients. There is on this account, therefore, no reason for departing from the sense indicated by the text. [There are, however, several other reasons for regarding this word as an Aramaic plural for jackals or for wolves (GERLACH), which belong to the same family. These are, 1. The plural forms of the verbs (drew out, gave suck) and of the suffix (their young-ones), which would require נָקַח instead of נָקַח , if sea-monsters were intended. 2. The fact that נָקַח is used of the whelps of lions, bears, dogs, and animals of similar species. 3. The authority of the Masorites. 4. The frequent occurrence of Aramaic forms in Jeremiah's writings. 5. The agreement of so many versions and commentators, ancient and modern. 6. The probability that jackals, wolves, or animals of that description, would occur to the mind of the Prophet in connection with the events of which he speaks. There was nothing to suggest the monsters of the deep, and the comparison, if referred to them, seems forced and far-fetched. But as the Prophet recalls the consequences of the destruction of Jerusalem, as he remembers how the foxes even now had possession of the mountain of Zion, v. 18, he cannot forget how hungry beasts of prey had revelled in the land, and prowled about the deserted villages and even the streets of Jerusalem itself. Even those beasts had shown the instincts of natural affection at least. And hence the natural contrast between them and the mothers, who, before the beasts appeared on the scene, forsook their own babes and refused to give them nourishment. It should be observed here that the verbs in this verse and in all the following description are in the past time. The Prophet is describing what had happened; not what was then transpiring. This use of the perfect tense shows that he was referring, not in the abstract, to what it is in the nature of jackals to do, but in the concrete, to what had been actually observed of them. Even (the Q is emphatic) jackals, that infested the depopulated country, drew out their breast, etc.—The expression drawing out the breast is suggested by the common habit of women in drawing out the breast from the covering robe and presenting it to the child; a mulieribus lactantibus, quæ laxata veste mammam lactanti præbent (JUNIUS, quoted by GEBLACH).—W. H. H.]—The daughter of my people is become cruel, [became cruel. Lit. was turned into a cruel one (GATAKER), see Job xxx. 21. CALVIN says: “The daughter of my people is come to the cruel one, for the people had to do with nothing but cruelty, . . . He, then, does not accuse the people of cruelty, that they did not nourish their children, but on the contrary, he means that they were given up to cruel enemies.” But the preceding part of this verse and what follows in vers. 4, 5, and especially in the climax presented in ver. 10, require the sense given in our English version, in which the versions agree with great unanimity. The Prophet gives us a frightful instance of the effect of suffering and starvation. Mothers became more unnatural than jackals or hyenas that suckle their young; and forsook their babes, not merely to avoid the sight of pains they could not alleviate, but to escape the exhausting demands upon their own waning strength,—nay, the mania induced by extreme suffering destroyed their affection for their children—W. H. H.]—Like the ostriches in the wilderness. In reference to the want of feeling towards its young in the ostrich, THENIUS refers to OKEN’s Natural History (vii. s. 655, ff.). See BOCHART, Hieroz. P. II. L. II. cap. 14, pag. 824; cap. 17, pag. 864 seqq. ed. ROSENEM.—WINEB R. W. B. s. v.

Strauss. Job xxxix. 18-17. [“On the least noise or trivial occasion she forsakes her eggs or her young ones, to which perhaps she never returns; or if she does, it may be too late either to restore life to the one, or to preserve the lives of the others. Agreeably to this account, the Arabs meet sometimes with whole nests of these eggs undisturbed; some of them are sweet and good, others are addled and corrupted; others again have their young ones of different growth, according to the time, it may be presumed, they may have been forsaken of the dam. They often meet with a few of the little ones no bigger than well-grown pullets, half-starved, straggling, and moaning about, like so many distressed orphans, for their mother.” (SHAW’S Travels, quoted by NOYES). “The Arabs call the ostrich the impious or ungodly bird, on account of its neglect and cruelty towards its young,” (BARNES on Job xxxix. 13).]

Ver. 4. The tongue of the sucking child cleaveth [cleaved] to the roof of his mouth for thirst. See Job xxix. 10; Ps. cxxxvii. 6, comp. xxiii. 16 (15); Ez. iii. 26.—Young children ask [asked] bread [see ii. 11, 12], and no man breaketh it unto them [and there was no one to break to them].

Ver. 5. They that did feed delicately, they that ate dainties [or, fed on dainties, CALVIN, BLAYNEY, BOOTHROYD, HENDERSON, NOYES].—Are desolate in the streets, perish [perished] on the streets, [i. e. by starvation, while seeking in vain for food.—W. H. H.]—They that were brought up in scarlet, they who were carried on crimson [carried on cloths, or borne on couches of scarlet, crimson, or purple color, made of costly materials of Tyrian dyes.—W. H. H.] Scarlet, the red dying material, got from the cochineal worm; see Ex. xvi. 20; Is. i. 18.—Embrace dunghills, embrace the dirt [embraced dirt-heaps, the heaps of dirt, refuse (rubbish, FÜRST’S Lex.), lying in the streets of the city.—W. H. H.] To embrace the dirt (see Job xxiv. 8, embrace the rock) can only mean to have it between the arms, which is done by them who lie in the dirt. Sterquilinea arripiunt, et super ea veluti toto corpore incumbunt, ut fame confecti cibum inde eruant. (They eagerly grasp the dunghills, stretched out upon them, as it were at full length, that, dying of hunger, they may thence seize their food).—PAREAU. [The idea of seeking food in the dirt-heaps of the city streets, confuses the two very distinct members of this verse. Little children, who had been fed on delicacies, perished in the streets while vainly seeking food; and thus, those, who had been borne on costly couches covered with the richest goods, lay now dying, with outstretched hands embracing, as it were, the heaps of filth in the city streets. To embrace the dirt is a familiar image in all languages: to embrace the dirt-heaps of an oriental city, so proverbially filthy, intensifies the figure. The whole description is highly poetical.—W. H. H.]

IV. 6.

- 6 For the punishment of the iniquity of the daughter of my people is greater than the punishment of the sin of Sodom, that was overthrown as in a moment, and no hands stayed on her.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 6. The expression הַפְּנִיכָה is taken from Gen. xix. 25 (וַיִּפְּנֶה אֶת-הָעָרִים), comp. Jer. xx. 16, and בְּכִהֶפְכָּת, Deut. xxix. 22; Is. xlii. 19; Am. iv. 11; Jer. i. 40). חָלָה is derived, not from חָוָה, but from חָלָה (so derived apparently by the Sept. and Syr.). The latter denotes to relax, to be powerless, Judg. xvi. 7; Is. lvii. 10; it can also very well be aid of the hands, and there is no necessity of resorting, by any artificial method, to a modification of the idea of gyrate. In reference to this word, see Jer. v. 3. Jer. uses the Kal of נָחַל, v. 27, and the Hiphil, xlviii. 26, 42.—עֵינָי is frequent with him, ii. 22; iii. 13; xlii. 22; etc.—בְּתַעֲפֵי, see ii. 11.—חַטָּאת often in Jer. xvi. 10; xvii. 13; etc.—רַגְעָה also, iv. 30; xlviii. 7, 9.—כָּבוֹד־רַגְעָה occurs only here; yet see כָּבוֹד־רַגְעָה, Num. xvi. 21; xvii. 10; Ps. xlii. 19.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Ver. 6. With this verse the Poet concludes the first part of his Song. This verse corresponds to ver. 11, which constitutes a similar conclusion. In both cases the Poet draws a general inference from the preceding particular facts, which he had related in detail. In this verse the inference is, that the guilt of Zion was proved to be greater than the sin of Sodom.—For the punishment of the iniquity (marg. For the iniquity) of the daughter of my people is greater than the punishment of the sin of Sodom.—And the guilt of the daughter of my people was greater than the sin of Sodom. I cannot agree with those who take עֵינָי and חַטָּאת in the sense of the punishment of sin. This sense is not capable of proof. In all the cases appealed to for this purpose (Gen. iv. 13; 1 Sam. xxviii. 10; 2 Sam. xvi. 12; Is. v. 18; Ps. xxxi. 11), on more exact examination, their original meaning of sin, guilt, appears to be their real meaning. And this is true in reference to חַטָּאת, for which some would justify the sense of pœna peccati, from the passages Num. xxxii. 23; Is. xl. 2; Zech. xiv. 9. See DRECHSLER on Is. v. 18. In וַיִּגְדֵּל = was greater, lies, then, the thought, it being allowable to infer the cause from the effect, that Zion's guilt is shown to be greater than was the sin-guiltiness (Sündenschuld) of Sodom. There is certainly in the vav before וַיִּגְדֵּל a causal intimation. For it amounts to the same thing, as far as the sense is concerned, whether I infer the effect from the cause with the words and so, or the cause from the effect with the word for. This causal use of the vav, moreover, is sufficiently established; see Ps. vii. 10; lx. 13; xcv. 5; Prov. xxiii. 3; Gen. xxii. 12; Jer. xvi. 12; xxiii. 86; xxxi. 3; Is. xxxix. 1; Hos. iv. 4; vi. 4; etc. See my Gr. § 110, 1. [The Vav coordinates the proposition with what precedes in the relation of cause to effect. These things were so, for the sin was greater, etc. As the vav is here the initial letter, the stress laid upon it shows the masterly manner in which the author of the poem often makes the acrostic, which in common hands would be constrained and merely artificial, contribute to the spirit and force of the sentiment. This is true, whether we take the words discussed, in the sense of sin or the punishment of sin; but the fact that it is emphatic is an argument in favor of the sense in which Dr. NÆGELSBACH construes it, and this added to the doubt whether עֵינָי and חַטָּאת ever do mean the punishment of sin, may decide us in favor of his translation. The other translation gives good sense and fits in admirably with the context, and is adopted without hesitation by all the English versions and commentators (except WORDSWORTH), and by CALVIN and GERLACH. Yet CALVIN says: "If any one prefers the other version, I will not contend, for it is not unsuitable; and hence also a most useful doctrine may be drawn, that we are to judge of the grievousness of our sins by the greatness of our punishment; for God never exceeds what is just when He takes vengeance on the sins of men. Then His severity shows how grievously men have sinned. Thus, Jeremiah may have reasoned from the effect to the cause, and declared that the people had been more wicked than the Sodomites. Nor is this unreasonable; for . . . the Prophets everywhere charged them as men who not only equalled but also surpassed the Sodomites, especially Ezekiel (xvi. 46, 47). Isaiah also called them the people of Gomorrah, and the king's counsellors and judges, the princes of Sodom (Is. i. 9, 10). This mode of speaking is then common in the Prophets, and the meaning is not unsuitable." The Sept. translates both words ἀνομία; the Vulg. one iniquitas, the other peccatum.—W. H. H.].—That was overthrown as in a moment. Sodom's guilt was great, and the punishment decreed for it corresponded to the greatness of its sin: it was destroyed instantaneously by fire falling from Heaven (see Gen. xix. 25), whereby its punishment was proved to be supernatural and divinitus immissa [sent from God]. It is a fearful thing to fall into the hands of the living God (Heb. x. 31). [BLAYNEY: "Sodom was destroyed by a sudden act of God, which the Prophet thinks preferable to lingering and wasting away with disease or want, as was the case in Jerusalem during the long siege."—And no hands stayed on her—and no hands became slack (relaxed) thereby. That Sodom was destroyed, not by the hands of men, but by the hand of God alone, is a fact that is emphasized as giving intensity to the severity of its punishment. Yet, our Poet would say, the fate of Jerusalem was still more terrible, because its guilt was greater than Sodom's. With what propriety this could be affirmed, is easily comprehended. For there had not been on the part of Sodom and Gomorrah such fulness of manifestation of the long-suffering love of God, as in the case of Jerusalem, (see Jer. vii. 13, 25; xi. 7; xxv. 4; Ez. xvi. 46-48; Is. i. 10; Matt. xi. 23, 24). But if it be asked, in what respect Jerusalem's fate had been more dreadful than that of Sodom, the answer, it seems to me, is contained in the עַל-כֵּן—as in a moment. Sodom's sufferings in death were brief: there were no starving children, no mothers who cooked their children. Jerusalem's sufferings were long and protracted, whereby was produced that horrible crime! Eversio Sodomæ fuit instar subitæ apoplexiæ, eversio autem Hierosolymæ fuit instar lentæ tabis [the overthrow of Sodom was a kind of sudden apoplexy, but the overthrow of Jerusalem was a kind of slow consumption], says FÖRSTER. [Dr. NAEGLSBACH has not made his sense of this difficult clause very apparent. It seems hardly credible that כֵּן should mean thereby (dadurch). If the verb is derived from חָלַה, instead of חָלַל, the translation of either BLAYNEY or OWEN, is to be preferred. BLAYNEY translates nor were hands weakened in her, referring to the suddenness of the destruction, and forming a parallelism with the preceding clause, overthrown as in a moment. OWEN translates, and not wearied against (or over) her were hands, and says, "This is substantially the Sept. and Syr. GRIORIUS says that the meaning is, that Sodom was destroyed not by human means, that is, not by a siege as Jerusalem had been." WORDSWORTH: "And no hands were weary on her. No human hands were wearied by destroying her, but she was suddenly consumed by the hand of God." If we accept of the usual derivation of the verb from חָלַל, then the translation of THENIUS may be commended for its simplicity, and is supported by the dual form of יָדַי=hands, and no one in her wrung the hands. But, as GERLACH shows, the dual form is constantly used for the plural (see יָדַי, כָּל-יָדַי, all hands, Is. xiii. 7), and the verb חָלַל is used with 3 of the object, of brandishing the sword against the cities of Ephraim (Hos. xi. 6): we may, therefore, understand the sense to be, and no hands (i. e., human hands) were wrung round (or brandished) against it, men's hands were not brought against it. This seems to correspond with Dr. NAEGLSBACH's interpretation, and is the sense generally adopted. BOOTHROYD: Without the hands of men. HENDERSON: And no hands attacked her. NOYES: Though no hands came against her.—W. H. H.]

IV. 7-9.

- 7 Her Nazarites were purer than snow, they were whiter than milk, they were 8 more ruddy in body than rubies, their polishing was of sapphire: Their visage is blackier than a coal; they are not known in the streets; their skin cleaveth to their 9 bones; it is withered, it is become like a stick. They that be slain with the sword are better than they that be slain with hunger: for these pine away, stricken through for want of the fruits of the field.

Ver. 7.—וְנָזִירִים. The word occurs only in Job xv. 15; xxv. 5; and in Hiph., Job ix. 30.—וְנָזִירִים does not occur in Jeremiah. [Yet וְנָזִירִים, Jer. vii. 29, is a remarkable coincidence in the use of language, if וְנָזִירִים means crowned-ones, as Dr. NAEGLSBACH suggests.—W. H. H.]—וְנָזִירִים, Jer. xviii. 14.—The verb וְנָזִירִים, splendidum esse, nitere, is found only here. The adjective וְנָזִירִים

The same meaning adheres to the derived conjugations, Pual (Ez. xxv. 5, xxvi. 14; xxxv. 7, 23; Neh. ii. 4), Hiph. (Is. i. 18), Hithpael (Is. i. 18). The word does not occur in Jeremiah. וְנָזִירִים (in Jer. viii. 1; xx. 9; xxxii. 9) stands here as pars pro toto. See Prov. xv. 30; xvi. 24; and וְנָזִירִים, Ps. cxxxix. 15. [BLAYNEY absurdly translates, They were ruddier on the bone, and thus explains, "In the preceding line the whiteness of their skin is described; in this their flesh, which was red underneath towards the bone, marking their high health."—] וְנָזִירִים (see Ez. i. 26; x. 1) does not occur in Jeremiah.

Ver. 8.—וְנָזִירִים. Jeremiah uses the Hiphil, only once, xiii. 16.—וְנָזִירִים occurs only here (see וְנָזִירִים, Jer. ii. 18). [The translation of BLAYNEY, dusker than the dawn, and of HENDERSON, darker than the dawn, would require us to read וְנָזִירִים, and then the comparison could only be with the darkness of the very early dawn, and would be an awkward figure at that.—W. In Jeremiah the verb וְנָזִירִים is often found, xiii. 10; i. 38, etc. The adjective וְנָזִירִים he never uses.—וְנָזִירִים is frequent in Jeremiah, ii. 20; iii. 6, 9, 13, etc. Ver. 9.—For the meaning of וְנָזִירִים, see iii. 26.—The expression וְנָזִירִים חֵלֶב, is found in Jer. xiv. 18, but is especially frequent with Ezekiel, xxxi. 17, 18; xxxii. 21-31.—וְנָזִירִים relativum, see ii. 15.—וְנָזִירִים. The word is found in Jeremiah only in

xlx. 4, and then in another sense. Here it must evidently denote the dissolving of life, i. e., the lingering dying of the starving. The word does not, indeed, occur elsewhere in this sense, for everywhere else it stands for the virile flux of semen meneses, or for confluence or abundant flowing together (אֶרֶץ זָבַח, Ex. iii. 8, etc.), or for copious water-floods (Ps. lxxviii. 20; cv. 41; Is. xlviii. 21). But the connection absolutely requires us to take the idea of flowing, which the word undoubtedly has, in this modification of it. PARSEAU, also, with propriety, calls attention to the closely related word מָלַךְ, tabescere (Jer. xxxi. 12, 25, Ps. lxxviii. 10). He also shows that in the Latin, a similar affinity exists between tabescere and liquecere. For as SENECA at one time says (Epist. 26) incommodum summum est minus et deperire et, ut proprie dicam, liquecere, so he says another time, (Medea, ver. 590), in vivos nitribus solutis sole jam forti, medioque vere tabuit Hemus. [See critical notes below.]—כִּדְקָרִים. Jeremiah uses the word twice, xxxvii. 10; li. 4, and both times the Part. Pual.—the expression מִן הַנִּגְבָּה is found in Deut. xxxii. 13; comp. Ex. xxxvi. 30; Is. xxvii. 6; Judg. ix. 11. מִן הַנִּגְבָּה does not occur in Jeremiah, but מִן הַנִּגְבָּה does, iv. 17; xviii. 14. כֵּן, here, cannot possibly have the positive sense of giving out, failure, or that of positive causality. It must rather be taken in its negative sense, away, far from, without. See ver. 18; and Jer. xlviii. 45; Job xl. 18; xli. 9. See my Gr., § 112, 5 d.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Vers. 7-11. The plan of this part [which may be regarded as the antistrophe to vers. 1-6.—W. H. H.] is exactly similar to that of vers. 1-6. It begins with a description of what the Princes of Zion had to suffer. This description corresponds evidently to what was said generally of the sons of Zion, vers. 1, 2, of whom the Princes are the flower. But vers. 7-9 form a climax to vers. 1, 2, which appears in the fact that what is said of the Princes of Zion, in vers. 8, 9, surpasses what is said of the sons of Zion in the last clause of ver. 2. Ver. 10 corresponds in a similar way with vers. 3-5, what was said there, being surpassed here. Ver. 11, finally, corresponds with ver. 6; for like it, ver. 11 contains a definite, comprehensive and inferential conclusion.

Ver. 7. Her Nazarites—her Princes. That מִן הַנִּגְבָּה here cannot denote the Nazarites is evident, not so much from the description which is given of them, for that would be very suitable to a Samson for instance, as from the fact that the Nazarites were a mere fraction of the whole people, too scattered and numerically insignificant to be mentioned here with such particularity. Rather as they [the Nazarites] were said to be coronati, crowned ones, from their unshorn hair [see Num. vi. 19, מִן הַנִּגְבָּה אֶת-נִגְבָּהוּ—his crown is shaven off of him; מִן הַנִּגְבָּה, the unshorn hair, or crown, Jer. vii. 29.—W. H. H.], so the Poet here calls the Princes crowned ones [see מִן הַנִּגְבָּה, to encircle, hence מִן הַנִּגְבָּה, a crown, diadem or chaplet.—W. H. H.] from the golden crown which they wore. It is true this is a poetical expression, which is not of frequent occurrence; for we can only compare Gen. xlix. 26 (Deut. xxxiii. 16), where Joseph is called מִן הַנִּגְבָּה, the crowned one among his brothers. It is, besides, very apparent that the Poet was required to select a subject, to which the brilliant predicates, which he heaps up in ver. 7, would be appropriate. [GATAKER gives the same meaning and derivation to the word, and refers to Nah. iii. 17, מִן הַנִּגְבָּה, thy crowned ones, or honorable ones. It seems more likely, however, that the word designates Princes or nobles, not from any allusion to their being crowned, which is not obvious, but because they constituted a separate and distinguished class of persons, were set apart for honorable offices, as the Nazarites were for strictly religious services (non voto sed dignitate separati; NOLDIUS, quoted by GERLACH). So CALVIN explains the word in Gen. xlix. 26, and BLAYNEY and GERLACH here. BOOTHROYD translates nobles. NOYES, princes. HENDERSON retains the word Nazarites.—W. H. H.]—Were purer—more shining [glistering, glänzender]. The word in Job xv. 16; xxv. 6, represents the brightness of the heavens and the stars.—Than snow. The comparison with the glistening white snow is found also in Ps. li. 9 (7); Is. i. 18.—They were whiter than milk. [Purer than snow, whiter than milk, according to ordinary Bible usage, are beautiful metaphors for innocence of character and life. Here, however, they refer entirely to physical appearance, the resplendent beauty of their complexion, as is plain from what follows: not of their garments, as some have imagined, but of their bodies, as is evident from the antithesis in the next verse.—W. H. H.]—They were more ruddy in body than rubies (Röthlicher strahlten sie am Leibe als Korallen), their body was of a more reddish hue than corals. “Red on white is the normal color of the human complexion, the prime-color of beauty, Cant. v. 10; Lam. iv. 7,” says DELITZSCH, Psychol., p. 75. [CALVIN, understanding Nazarites as intended, supposes that their red color was a mark and evidence of God’s favor as in the cases of the Hebrew children recorded in Daniel. “We know that the Nazarites abstained from wine and strong drink: hence abstinence might have lessened somewhat of their ruddiness. For he who is accustomed to drink wine, if he abstains for a time, is apt to grow pale; he will then lose almost all his color, at least he will not be so ruddy; nor will there appear in his face and in his members so much vigor as when he took his ordinary support. Jeremiah, in short, teaches us that the blessing of God was conspicuous in the Nazarites, for He wonderfully supported them while they were for a time abstinent.” This necessity of appealing to a possible miracle may itself create a doubt, if Nazarites are here referred to at all. That in such a corrupt state of society as existed, at that period of their history, among the Jews, there were many who assumed the vows of the Nazarite, is doubtful. There is no allusion to the existence even of Nazarites among the people at this time, in either the prophetic or historical books. But that there was not only such a class, but that they were so remarkable for their piety and so acceptable to God, that God gave them such evidences of His favor as were bestowed on Daniel and his brethren, making them conspicuous among men by their personal beauty, especially by the ruddiness of their complexion, we cannot believe. And it would be incredible and horrible that upon that particular class the heaviest judgments descended, as is related in the next verse. If we infer from their personal beauty, in ver. 7, that they were special favorites of Heaven, we must conclude, from the transformation of their appearance into that of ugliness, in ver. 8, that they were also special objects of Divine wrath. The two things do not agree. This alone proves that Nazarites are not intended. The description of their personal appearance, which could only apply to Nazarites, by some such forced construction as requires CALVIN to invoke the aid of a miracle, is entirely appropriate to that class of the nobility represented by the Princes, who lived delicately and luxuriously, and whose faces, not embrowned by exposure to the weather, nor seamed and roughened by a life of hardship, were flushed and shining from the effects of high living, and whose persons beamed and glistened, as it were, from the care bestowed upon them, and the pains taken to beautify and adorn themselves. Perhaps the idea conveyed by the Hebrew verbs of the glistening quality of their white and red complexion, may be due to the then prevailing use of unguents.—W. H. H.]—Rubies, corals, דְּבָרִים. Concerning this word, which occurs besides in Job xxviii. 18; Prov. iii. 15; viii. 11; xx. 15; xxxi. 10, opinions are much divided. The translations are entirely at variance: Sept. λίθοι, Symm. τὰ περιβλεπτα, Chald. lapides pretiosi, Syr. sardinus, JEROME, ebur antiquum. Among the moderns, BOOTIUS (animadv. es., IV. 8), whom J. D. MICHAELIS, GSENIUS, MAURER and THENIUS [HENDERSON, NOYES, GERLACH, FUERST] follow, maintains the signification to be corals: against which BOCHART (HIEROZ. P. ii., L. V., Cap. 6, 7, ed., ROSENK., Tom. iii., pag. 601 seqq.) contends for pearls. His opinion is especially maintained by PAREAU (not on this passage, but in his remarks on Job xxviii.) and supported with new arguments. LEYRER also (in HERZ. R.-Enc. XI., p. 399) is inclined to adopt this side. The decision is difficult. Corals agree best with the context, since the existence of reddish pearls is too slightly established, and the meaning of glistening for the Hebrew דְּבָרִים is entirely hypothetical.—Their polishing was of sapphire, a sapphire was their form.—Their polishing, their form, Ger. Gestalt; Fr. taille; Lat. forma, figura [Eng. mien, general appearance]. The word גִּימָה, from גִּימָה iii. 54) occurs in this sense only here. In the description of Ezekiel's temple it is used of the northern porch, xli. 12-15; xlii. 1, 10, 13. [BLAYNEY, after BRAUNUS (see Pictorial Bible), taking the word from גִּימָה to divide, or intersect, translates, their veining was the sapphire; alluding to the blue veins appearing through the white and red complexions. So BOOTHROYD and ADAM CLARKE. This would be either a mark of beauty, or an intimation of the bloated condition of the luxurious and pampered nobility. In either case, the sense is good, and is recommended by the fact that snow, milk and corals indicate color, and therefore sapphire, too, would naturally suggest the characteristic color of that gem. גִּימָה, however, would more likely indicate the cutting of a gem, and hence its form, taille, and in case of the sapphire, which is next in hardness to the diamond, its brilliancy of appearance. GERLACH: "The words are not to be understood of color (as of the veins showing through, or of the garments, as Cant. xxviii. 18), but, on account of the characteristic גִּימָה, excisio, taille, of the perfect shape, the consummate beauty of bodily form (Körperbau). Sapphire was their form (Gestalt), that is to say, so beautiful and without fault, as if they were a polished image made out of precious stone."—W. H. H.] White as milk and snow, red as corals, and shining as sapphire, is the appearance of the nobles as here described. This seems to constitute a climax to vers. 1, 2: for the Poet evidently, in ver. 7, paints with gayer and more variegated colors.

Ver. 8. In glaring contrast with ver. 7, he now describes what has befallen the nobles in consequence of the great catastrophe.—Their visage—their appearance [so BLAYNEY, HENDERSON, OWEN, GERLACH: their countenance, NOYES: their visage, BROUGHTON, BOOTHROYD].—Is [was, or became]. The verbs are all in the past tense. So GATAKER and OWEN render them. The Prophet is still looking back to what had taken place, though now to a time posterior to that indicated in ver. 7. He is describing the change that took place in the appearance of the nobles, while the city was still standing, and they were seen in the streets.—W. H. H.] Blacker than a coal—darker than blackness [so marg. E. V., CALVIN, BOOTHROYD, GERLACH, WORDSWORTH. BROUGHTON and NOYES, like the E. V. Vulg., RASHI, KIMCHI, black coals. Sept., soot. OWEN suggests darker than Sihor, or the river Nile, see Jer. ii. 18.] They are not [were not] known—recognized—in the streets. See ver. 6. The sense is, in their houses they might perhaps be recognized, but not on the streets.—Their skin cleaveth [cleaved] to their bones. See Job xix. 20; xxx. 30.—It is withered, it is become like a stick—it is [it became] dry as wood. [The English version—it is withered—arose from taking the adjective dry, for the verb to dry. No other English version has it so.—W. H. H.]

Ver. 9. This verse enters into close connection with ver. 8. Here it is declared that the miserable condition described in ver. 8, is the consequence of starvation; and at the same time, the reflection is made that death by hunger is more dreadful than death by the sword.—They that be slain with the sword, are better than they that be slain with hunger; Happier are they who are slain by the sword, than they who are by hunger slain [Happier were the slain by the sword, than the slain by the famine]. Translating the words in the past time, removes them from the category of a moral or psychological reflection, and restores the harmony of the style as a poetical description of actual events. It reminds us, too, that the nobles suffered from the sword, as well as by famine. They who died quickly by means of the sword were more fortunate than those who suffered a lingering death by starvation. So in ver. 6, the Prophet regards, for similar reasons, the destruction of Sodom as less xlix. 4, and then in another sense. Here it must evidently denote the dissolving of life, i. e., the lingering dying of the starving. The word does not, indeed, occur elsewhere in this sense, for everywhere else it stands for the virile flux or female menses, or for confluence or abundant flowing together (אִמְרוֹן זָבַח, Ex. xlii. 8, etc.), or for copious water-floods (Ps. lxxviii. 20; cv. 41; Is. xlviii. 21). But the connection absolutely requires us to take the idea of flowing, which the word undoubtedly has, in this modification of it. PARROT, also, with propriety, calls attention to the closely related word אִמְרָה, tabescere (Jer. xxxi. 12, 25, Ps. lxxxviii. 10). He also shows that in the Latin, a similar affinity exists between tabescere and liquescere. For as SENECA at one time says (Epist. 26) incommodum summum est minus et deperire et, ut proprie dicam, liquescere, so he says another time, (Medea, ver. 590), in rivos nigris solutis sole jam forti, medique vire tabuit Herms. [See critical notes below.] כִּדְקִירִים. Jeremiah uses the word twice, xxxvii. 10; li. 4, and both times the Part. Pass.—the expression אִמְרָה תִּנְכַּחֵת is found in Deut. xxxiii. 13; comp. Ex. xxxvi. 30; Is. xxvii. 6; Judg. ix. 11. אִמְרָה does not occur in Jeremiah, but אִמְרָה does, iv. 17; xviii. 14. אִמְרָה, here, cannot possibly have the positive sense of giving out, failure, or that of positive causality. It must rather be taken in its negative sense, away, far from, without. See ver. 18; and Jer. xlviii. 45; Job xi. 16; xxi. 9. See my Gr., § 112, 5 d.

He is describing the change that took place in the appearance of the nobles, while the city was still standing, and they were seen in the streets.—W. H. H.] Blacker than a coal, darker than blackness [so marg. E. V., CALVIN, BROUGHTON and OWEN, WORDSWORTH. BROUGHTON and NOYES, like the E. V. Vulg., RASHI, KILTON and NOYES, see Jer. xxi. 12, 13, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, 38, 39, 40, 41, 42, 43, 44, 45, 46, 47, 48, 49, 50, 51, 52, 53, 54, 55, 56, 57, 58, 59, 60, 61, 62, 63, 64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 71, 72, 73, 74, 75, 76, 77, 78, 79, 80, 81, 82, 83, 84, 85, 86, 87, 88, 89, 90, 91, 92, 93, 94, 95, 96, 97, 98, 99, 100, 101, 102, 103, 104, 105, 106, 107, 108, 109, 110, 111, 112, 113, 114, 115, 116, 117, 118, 119, 120, 121, 122, 123, 124, 125, 126, 127, 128, 129, 130, 131, 132, 133, 134, 135, 136, 137, 138, 139, 140, 141, 142, 143, 144, 145, 146, 147, 148, 149, 150, 151, 152, 153, 154, 155, 156, 157, 158, 159, 160, 161, 162, 163, 164, 165, 166, 167, 168, 169, 170, 171, 172, 173, 174, 175, 176, 177, 178, 179, 180, 181, 182, 183, 184, 185, 186, 187, 188, 189, 190, 191, 192, 193, 194, 195, 196, 197, 198, 199, 200, 201, 202, 203, 204, 205, 206, 207, 208, 209, 210, 211, 212, 213, 214, 215, 216, 217, 218, 219, 220, 221, 222, 223, 224, 225, 226, 227, 228, 229, 230, 231, 232, 233, 234, 235, 236, 237, 238, 239, 240, 241, 242, 243, 244, 245, 246, 247, 248, 249, 250, 251, 252, 253, 254, 255, 256, 257, 258, 259, 260, 261, 262, 263, 264, 265, 266, 267, 268, 269, 270, 271, 272, 273, 274, 275, 276, 277, 278, 279, 280, 281, 282, 283, 284, 285, 286, 287, 288, 289, 290, 291, 292, 293, 294, 295, 296, 297, 298, 299, 300, 301, 302, 303, 304, 305, 306, 307, 308, 309, 310, 311, 312, 313, 314, 315, 316, 317, 318, 319, 320, 321, 322, 323, 324, 325, 326, 327, 328, 329, 330, 331, 332, 333, 334, 335, 336, 337, 338, 339, 340, 341, 342, 343, 344, 345, 346, 347, 348, 349, 350, 351, 352, 353, 354, 355, 356, 357, 358, 359, 360, 361, 362, 363, 364, 365, 366, 367, 368, 369, 370, 371, 372, 373, 374, 375, 376, 377, 378, 379, 380, 381, 382, 383, 384, 385, 386, 387, 388, 389, 390, 391, 392, 393, 394, 395, 396, 397, 398, 399, 400, 401, 402, 403, 404, 405, 406, 407, 408, 409, 410, 411, 412, 413, 414, 415, 416, 417, 418, 419, 420, 421, 422, 423, 424, 425, 426, 427, 428, 429, 430, 431, 432, 433, 434, 435, 436, 437, 438, 439, 440, 441, 442, 443, 444, 445, 446, 447, 448, 449, 450, 451, 452, 453, 454, 455, 456, 457, 458, 459, 460, 461, 462, 463, 464, 465, 466, 467, 468, 469, 470, 471, 472, 473, 474, 475, 476, 477, 478, 479, 480, 481, 482, 483, 484, 485, 486, 487, 488, 489, 490, 491, 492, 493, 494, 495, 496, 497, 498, 499, 500, 501, 502, 503, 504, 505, 506, 507, 508, 509, 510, 511, 512, 513, 514, 515, 516, 517, 518, 519, 520, 521, 522, 523, 524, 525, 526, 527, 528, 529, 530, 531, 532, 533, 534, 535, 536, 537, 538, 539, 540, 541, 542, 543, 544, 545, 546, 547, 548, 549, 550, 551, 552, 553, 554, 555, 556, 557, 558, 559, 560, 561, 562, 563, 564, 565, 566, 567, 568, 569, 570, 571, 572, 573, 574, 575, 576, 577, 578, 579, 580, 581, 582, 583, 584, 585, 586, 587, 588, 589, 590, 591, 592, 593, 594, 595, 596, 597, 598, 599, 600, 601, 602, 603, 604, 605, 606, 607, 608, 609, 610, 611, 612, 613, 614, 615, 616, 617, 618, 619, 620, 621, 622, 623, 624, 625, 626, 627, 628, 629, 630, 631, 632, 633, 634, 635, 636, 637, 638, 639, 640, 641, 642, 643, 644, 645, 646, 647, 648, 649, 650, 651, 652, 653, 654, 655, 656, 657, 658, 659, 660, 661, 662, 663, 664, 665, 666, 667, 668, 669, 670, 671, 672, 673, 674, 675, 676, 677, 678, 679, 680, 681, 682, 683, 684, 685, 686, 687, 688, 689, 690, 691, 692, 693, 694, 695, 696, 697, 698, 699, 700, 701, 702, 703, 704, 705, 706, 707, 708, 709, 710, 711, 712, 713, 714, 715, 716, 717, 718, 719, 720, 721, 722, 723, 724, 725, 726, 727, 728, 729, 730, 731, 732, 733, 734, 735, 736, 737, 738, 739, 740, 741, 742, 743, 744, 745, 746, 747, 748, 749, 750, 751, 752, 753, 754, 755, 756, 757, 758, 759, 760, 761, 762, 763, 764, 765, 766, 767, 768, 769, 770, 771, 772, 773, 774, 775, 776, 777, 778, 779, 780, 781, 782, 783, 784, 785, 786, 787, 788, 789, 790, 791, 792, 793, 794, 795, 796, 797, 798, 799, 800, 801, 802, 803, 804, 805, 806, 807, 808, 809, 810, 811, 812, 813, 814, 815, 816, 817, 818, 819, 820, 821, 822, 823, 824, 825, 826, 827, 828, 829, 830, 831, 832, 833, 834, 835, 836, 837, 838, 839, 840, 841, 842, 843, 844, 845, 846, 847, 848, 849, 850, 851, 852, 853, 854, 855, 856, 857, 858, 859, 860, 861, 862, 863, 864, 865, 866, 867, 868, 869, 870, 871, 872, 873, 874, 875, 876, 877, 878, 879, 880, 881, 882, 883, 884, 885, 886, 887, 888, 889, 890, 891, 892, 893, 894, 895, 896, 897, 898, 899, 900, 901, 902, 903, 904, 905, 906, 907, 908, 909, 910, 911, 912, 913, 914, 915, 916, 917, 918, 919, 920, 921, 922, 923, 924, 925, 926, 927, 928, 929, 930, 931, 932, 933, 934, 935, 936, 937, 938, 939, 940, 941, 942, 943, 944, 945, 946, 947, 948, 949, 950, 951, 952, 953, 954, 955, 956, 957, 958, 959, 960, 961, 962, 963, 964, 965, 966, 967, 968, 969, 970, 971, 972, 973, 974, 975, 976, 977, 978, 979, 980, 981, 982, 983, 984, 985, 986, 987, 988, 989, 990, 991, 992, 993, 994, 995, 996, 997, 998, 999, 1000]

English version—it is withered, it is become like a stick—it is [it became] dry as wood. [T xxx. 30.—It is withered, it is become like a stick—it is [it became] dry as wood. No other English version—it is withered—arose from taking the adjective dry, for the verb to dry. No other English version has it so.—W. H. H.] Ver. 9. This verse enters into close connection with ver. 8. Here it is declared that the noble condition described in ver. 8, is the consequence of starvation; and at the same time reflection is made that death by hunger is more dreadful than death by the sword.—They that be slain with the sword, are better than they that be slain with hunger; for the sword, than they are they who are slain by the sword, than they are by hunger slain [Happier were the slain by sword, than the slain by the famine. Translated from the Hebrew.] The words in the past time, removes the category of a moral or psychological and restores the harmony of the style as a real description of actual events. It is too, that the nobles suffered from the sword, as well as by famine. They who died by means of the sword were more for those who suffered a lingering death. So in ver. 6, the Prophet, for similar reasons, the destruction of

xlx. 4, and then in another sense. Here it must evidently denote the dissolving of life, i. e., the lingering dying of the starving. The word does not, indeed, occur elsewhere in this sense, for everywhere else it stands for the virile flux or female menses, or for confluence or abundant flowing together (נָחַל, Ex. iii. 8, etc.), or for copious water-floods (Ps. lxxviii. 20; cv. 41; Is. xlviii. 21). But the connection absolutely requires us to take the idea of flowing, which the word undoubtedly has, in this modification of it. PARROT, also, with propriety, calls attention to the closely related word נָחַל, tabescere (Jer. xxxi. 12, 25, Ps. lxxxviii. 10). He also shows that in the Latin, a similar affinity exists between tabescere and liquescere. For as SENECA at one time says (Epist. 28) incommodum summum est minus et deperire et, ut proprie dicam, liquescere, so he says another time, (Medea, ver. 590), in vivos nigris solutis sole jam forti, medicque vere tabuit Herms. [See critical notes below.] כִּדְקָרִים. Jeremiah uses the word twice, xxxvii. 10; li. 4, and both times the Part. Pass.—the expression שָׁרֵי תְּנוּכֹת is found in Deut. xxxii. 13; comp. Ez. xxxvi. 30; Is. xxvii. 6; Judg. ix. 11. שָׁרֵי does not occur in Jeremiah, but שָׁרֵי does, iv. 17; xviii. 14. כֵּן, here, cannot possibly have the positive sense of giving out, failing, or that of positive causality. It must rather be taken in its negative sense, away, far from, without. See ver. 18; and Jer. xlviii. 45; Job xi. 16; xxi. 9. See my Gr., § 112, 5 d.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Vers. 7-11. The plan of this part [which may be regarded as the antistrophe to vers. 1-6.—W. H. H.] is exactly similar to that of vers. 1-6. It begins with a description of what the Princes of Zion had to suffer. This description corresponds evidently to what was said generally of the sons of Zion, vers. 1, 2, of whom the Princes are the flower. But vers. 7-9 form a climax to vers. 1, 2, which appears in the fact that what is said of the Princes of Zion, in vers. 8, 9, surpasses what is said of the sons of Zion in the last clause of ver. 2. Ver. 10 corresponds in a similar way with vers. 3-5, what was said there, being surpassed here. Ver. 11, finally, corresponds with ver. 6; for like it, ver. 11 contains a definite, comprehensive and inferential conclusion.

Ver. 7. Her Nazarites—her Princes. That שָׂרֵי here cannot denote the Nazarites is evident, not so much from the description which is given of them, for that would be very suitable to a Samson for instance, as from the fact that the Nazarites were a mere fraction of the whole people, too scattered and numerically insignificant to be mentioned here with such particularity. Rather as they [the Nazarites] were said to be coronati, crowned ones, from their unshorn hair [see Num. vi. 19, הִתְנַחֲלוּ אֶת-נִיחוּ—his crown is shaven off of him; נִיחוּ, the unshorn hair, or crown, Jer. vii. 29.—W. H. H.], so the Poet here calls the Princes crowned ones [see שָׂרֵי, to encircle, hence שָׂרֵי, a crown, diadem or chaplet.—W. H. H.] from the golden crown which they wore. It is true this is a poetical expression, which is not of frequent occurrence; for we can only compare Gen. xlix. 26 (Deut. xxxiii. 16), where Joseph is called שָׂרֵי אֶחָיו, the crowned one among his brothers. It is, besides, very apparent that the Poet was required to select a subject, to which the brilliant predicates, which he heaps up in ver. 7, would be appropriate. [GATAKER gives the same meaning and derivation to the word, and refers to Nah. iii. 17, כִּנְזָרִין, thy crowned ones, or honorable ones. It seems more likely, however, that the word designates Princes or nobles, not from any allusion to their being crowned, which is not obvious, but because they constituted a separate and distinguished class of persons, were set apart for honorable offices, as the Nazarites were for strictly religious services (non voto sed dignitate separati; NOLDIUS, quoted by GERLACH). So CALVIN explains the word in Gen. xlix. 26, and BLAYNEY and GERLACH here. BOOTHBYD translates nobles. NOTES, princes. HENDERSON retains the word Nazarites.—W. H. H.]—Were purer—more shining [glistering, glänzender]. The word in Job xv. 16; xxv. 5, represents the brightness of the heavens and the stars.—Than snow. The comparison with the glistening white snow is found also in Ps. li. 9 (7); Is. i. 18.—They were whiter than milk. [Purer than snow, whiter than milk, according to ordinary Bible usage, are beautiful metaphors for innocence of character and life. Here, however, they refer entirely to physical appearance, the resplendent beauty of their complexion, as is plain from what follows: not of their garments, as some have imagined, but of their bodies, as is evident from the antithesis in the next verse.—W. H. H.]—They were more ruddy in body than rubies (Röthlicher strahlten sie am Leibe als Korallen), their body was of a more reddish hue than corals. “Red on white is the normal color of the human complexion, the prime-color of beauty, Cant. v. 10; Lam. iv. 7,” says DELITZSCH, Psychol., p. 75. [CALVIN, understanding Nazarites as intended, supposes that their red color was a mark and evidence of God’s favor as in the cases of the Hebrew children recorded in Daniel. “We know that the Nazarites abstained from wine and strong drink: hence abstinence might have lessened somewhat of their ruddiness. For he who is accustomed to drink wine, if he abstaizs for a time, is apt to grow pale; he will then lose almost all his color, at least he will not be so ruddy; nor will there appear in his face and in his members so much vigor as when he took his ordinary support. Jeremiah, in short, teaches us that the blessing of God was conspicuous in the Nazarites, for He wonderfully supported them while they were for a time abstinent.” This necessity of appealing to a possible miracle may itself create a doubt, if Nazarites are here referred to at all. That in such a corrupt state of society as existed, at that period of their history, among the Jews, there were many who assumed the vows of the Nazarite, is doubtful. There is no allusion to the existence even of Nazarites among the people at this time, in either the prophetic or historical books. But that there was not only such a class, but that they were so remarkable for their piety and so acceptable to God, that God gave them such evidences of His favor as were bestowed on Daniel

and his brethren, making them conspicuous among men by their personal beauty, especially by the ruddiness of their complexion, we cannot believe. And it would be incredible and horrible that upon that particular class the heaviest judgments descended, as is related in the next verse. If we infer from their personal beauty, in ver. 7, that they were special favorites of Heaven, we must conclude, from the transformation of their appearance into that of ugliness, in ver. 8, that they were also special objects of Divine wrath. The two things do not agree. This alone proves that Nazarites are not intended. The description of their personal appearance, which could only apply to Nazarites, by some such forced construction as requires CALVIN to invoke the aid of a miracle, is entirely appropriate to that class of the nobility represented by the Princes, who lived delicately and luxuriously, and whose faces, not embrowned by exposure to the weather, nor seamed and roughened by a life of hardship, were flushed and shining from the effects of high living, and whose persons beamed and glistened, as it were, from the care bestowed upon them, and the pains taken to beautify and adorn themselves. Perhaps the idea conveyed by the Hebrew verbs of the glistening quality of their white and red complexion, may be due to the then prevailing use of unguents.—W. H. H.]—Rubies, corals, דָּמָם. Concerning this word, which occurs besides in Job xxviii. 18; Prov. iii. 15; viii. 11; xx. 15; xxxi. 10, opinions are much divided. The translations are entirely at variance: Sept. λίθοι, Symm. τὰ περιβλεπτά, Chald. lapides pretiosi, Syr. sardinus, JEROME, ebur antiquum. Among the moderns, BOOTIUS (animadv. ss., IV. 3), whom J. D. MICHAELIS, GESENIUS, MAURER and THIENUS [HENDERSON, NOYES, GERLACH, FUERST] follow, maintains the signification to be corals; against which BOCHART (Hieroz. P. ii., L. V., Cap. 6, 7, ed., ROSENTH., Tom. iii., pag. 601 seqq.) contends for pearls. His opinion is especially maintained by PAREAU (not on this passage, but in his remarks on Job xxviii.) and supported with new arguments. LEYBER also (in HERZ. R.-Enc. XI., p. 399) is inclined to adopt this side. The decision is difficult. Corals agree best with the context, since the existence of reddish pearls is too slightly established, and the meaning of glistening for the Hebrew דָּמָם is entirely hypothetical.—Their polishing was of sapphire, a sapphire was their form.—Their polishing, their form, Ger. Gestalt; Fr. taille; Lat. forma, figura [Eng. mien, general appearance]. The word (נִצָּר, from נָצַר iii. 54) occurs in this sense only here. In the description of Ezekiel's temple it is used of the northern porch, xli. 12-15; xlii. 1, 10, 13. [BLAYNEY, after BRAUNIUS (see Pictorial Bible), taking the word from נָצַר to divide, or intersect, translates, their veining was the sapphire; alluding to the blue veins appearing through the white and red complexions. So BOOTHROYD and ADAM CLARKE. This would be either a mark of beauty, or an intimation of the bloated condition of the luxurious and pampered nobility. In either case, the sense is good, and is recommended by the fact that snow, milk and corals indicate color, and therefore sapphire, too, would naturally suggest the characteristic color of that gem. נִצָּר, however, would more likely indicate the cutting of a gem, and hence its form, taille, and in case of the sapphire, which is next in hardness to the diamond, its brilliancy of appearance. GERLACH: "The words are not to be understood of color (as of the veins showing through, or of the garments, as Cant. xxviii. 18), but, on account of the characteristic נִצָּר, excisio, taille, of the perfect shape, the consummate beauty of bodily form (Körperbau). Sapphire was their form (Gestalt), that is to say, so beautiful and without fault, as if they were a polished image made out of precious stone."—W. H. H.] White as milk and snow, red as corals, and shining as sapphire, is the appearance of the nobles as here described. This seems to constitute a climax to vers. 1, 2: for the Poet evidently, in ver. 7, paints with gayer and more variegated colors.

Ver. 8. In glaring contrast with ver. 7, he now describes what has befallen the nobles in consequence of the great catastrophe.—Their visage—their appearance [so BLAYNEY, HENDERSON, OWEN, GERLACH: their countenance, NOYES: their visage, BROUGHTON, BOOTHROYD].—Is [was, or became. The verbs are all in the past tense. So GATAKER and OWEN render them. The Prophet is still looking back to what had taken place, though now to a time posterior to that indicated in ver. 7. He is describing the change that took place in the appearance of the nobles, while the city was still standing, and they were seen in the streets.—W. H. H.] Blacker than a coal—darker than blackness [so marg. E. V., CALVIN, BOOTHROYD, GERLACH, WORDSWORTH. BROUGHTON and NOYES, like the E. V. Vulg., RASHI, KIMCHI, black coals. Sept., soot. OWEN suggests darker than Sihor, or the river Nile, see Jer. ii. 18.] They are not [were not] known—recognized—in the streets. See ver. 5. The sense is, in their houses they might perhaps be recognized, but not on the streets.—Their skin cleaveth [cleaved] to their bones. See Job xix. 20; xxx. 30.—It is withered, it is become like a stick—it is [it became] dry as wood. [The English version—it is withered—arose from taking the adjective dry, for the verb to dry. No other English version has it so.—W. H. H.]

Ver. 9. This verse enters into close connection with ver. 8. Here it is declared that the miserable condition described in ver. 8, is the consequence of starvation; and at the same time, the reflection is made that death by hunger is more dreadful than death by the sword.—They that be slain with the sword, are better than they that be slain with hunger; Happier are they who are slain by the sword, than they who are by hunger slain [Happier were the slain by the sword, than the slain by the famine. Translating the words in the past time, removes them from the category of a moral or psychological reflection, and restores the harmony of the style as a poetical description of actual events. It reminds us, too, that the nobles suffered from the sword, as well as by famine. They who died quickly by means of the sword were more fortunate than those who suffered a lingering death by starvation. So in ver. 6, the Prophet regards, for similar reasons, the destruction of Sodom as less severe and terrible than that of Jerusalem.—W. H. H.]—For these pine away—marg. flow out,—stricken through for want of the fruits of the field—Who pine away pierced in the heart for want of the fruits of the field. This clause declares two things in reference to those slain by the sword (חָלַל יָחִיד), and those slain by hunger (חָלַל רָעָב), one in which they agree, and one in which they differ. 1. That wherein they agree; they are both pierced through (כִּדְקָרִים). 2. That wherein they differ; those that starve, melt away, that is to say, they die slowly, whilst with the others, death is quickly over.

[The Versions and commentators accept generally the translation given above of the last clause of this verse. Yet there are serious objections to it, and cogent reasons for adopting a different rendering. 1. It is taken for granted that the relative שֶׁהֵם must refer to the last subject mentioned, those slain or killed, by hunger. It is more grammatical to refer it to the principal subject of the preceding clause, which is those slain by the sword, regarding the sentence as only begun in the first clause and finished in the second. The words כִּחָלְלֵי רָעָב, than those killed by famine, could be transposed to the end of the verse without changing the grammatical construction in the least, (though it would mar the rhythm and the poetical paronomasia), and this shows that they are entirely subordinate to the main idea. 2. A meaning is forced upon the verb מָלַךְ, of melting or pining away, as descriptive of a slow death, which it has in no other place in Scripture. In the only place where it has been supposed to have the meaning of dissolving, Jer. xlix. 4, Dr. NAGELSBACH himself says it has not that sense (see gram. note above), and if it has, it would imply rather a sudden, mysterious disappearance, than a slow and prolonged dissolution. The affinity between the Latin words tabescere and liquecere, brought forward by PAREAU, and confirmed by a quotation from SENECA, which has been repeated by nearly every commentator since, even last of all by GEBLACH, is of no force whatever; not only because the usage of Latin thought and expression is of no authority in Hebrew; but because liquecere, the fundamental idea of which is to become liquid, to melt, has a natural affinity to tabescere, to melt gradually, be dissolved and hence, metaphorically, to waste or pine away, while מָלַךְ, the fundamental idea of which is to flow out or gush out, has no natural affinity to מָלַךְ, even if the fundamental idea of מָלַךְ is to melt, and certainly no affinity to מָלַךְ in the only senses in which it is used in the Hebrew Bible, of pinning away, or being distressed with sorrow or fear. On the other hand, the only sense in which the word מָלַךְ is elsewhere used, as when it is applied to the sudden and violent gushing out, or rapid overflowing of water, see Ps. lxxviii. 20; cv. 41; Is. xlviii. 21; Ex. iii. 8, admirably describes the death of those whose lives flowed away as the blood gushed from their hearts, pierced with a sword. 3. The future form of the verb מָלַךְ, is entirely ignored. It may be difficult, with our different modes of thought, always to detect the purport of a change in the Hebrew tenses, but it is quite certain that these changes are never purposeless; and here, where a future is suddenly thrust in among preterite tenses, it must have an important bearing upon the meaning intended. What the force of the future here is, depends on the subject of the relative and of the verb. If that subject is those slain by the famine, חָלַל רָעָב, then the future may have an optative sense; these would have flowed out having been pierced, i. e., they would have preferred to die by the sword. But if, as is more likely, the subject is those slain by the sword, חָלַל יָחִיד, then the future has the sense in which Jeremiah so often uses it, of the historical imperfect, and then, too, the relative שֶׁהֵם, has its more proper sense of those who; Happier were those slain by the sword—those who gushed out having been pierced, i. e., who died instantly as the blood gushed out of their hearts. 4. A metaphorical meaning is thrust upon כִּדְקָרִים=being or having been pierced, which the word can hardly bear, namely, pierced with the sharp pains of hunger. The word is only used of being pierced through bodily with some sharp weapon, as a sword or spear. It is never used metaphorically, not even in Zech. xii. 10; xliii. 8, which have been appealed to; nor yet in Prov. xii. 18, where the piercings of a sword are compared to wounds inflicted by a wicked tongue, for even there the word derived from our verb is used in the literal sense of bodily piercings, made by a sword. The word might, it is true, in our text, be an instance of bold, audacious metaphor. But when there are so many other reasons for taking it in its literal sense, we may spare ourselves the task of justifying a metaphorical one. 5. The preposition בִּי, is taken in an unusual sense. CALVIN and others construe it blindly,—pierced through by the fruits of the earth, and explain “that all the productions of the earth took vengeance on this wicked people, by refusing the usual supply.” This is too extraordinary a personification of the fruits of the earth to be allowable, and it is a strange thing to charge a crime on an agent that has no existence. We would rather adopt the opinion of Jarchi who explained that their death was caused by the weeds and roots with which, in their hunger they had filled themselves, though it is something new to call weeds and roots, fruits of the earth. The usual explanation is, that they died for want of the fruits of the earth. It is doubtful if בִּי can be explained in any such sense, as Dr. NAGELSBACH seems to concede, when he says it can only be taken in the sense of away, far from, without. There is less difficulty with this word, if we understand the clause in the sense expressed by the Septuagint, ἐπορεύθησαν ἐκκεκνημένοι ἀπὸ γεννημάτων ἀγρῶν, they were driven away, having been pierced, from the fruitful fields. So Chaldaeus: “Those fled away, when they were pierced, from the products and fruits of the field, i. e., they were full and satisfied, since they were pierced when their bellies were full of food;” and J. D. MICHAELIS, “who, suddenly pierced, forsook the rich fruits of the earth (on which they dwelt).” This explanation really contains the idea expressed by BLAYNEY’s translation, “those, being thrust through, pass away before the fruits of the field, i. e., they pass away at one stroke, before the means of subsistence fail, and so experience not the misery of wanting them." DATHE supposes a direct comparison between the suddenness of their death and the proverbial withering of the grass. "Quicker yet than the mown grass, they vanished who were pierced with the sword." This idea of their dying before the famine came, throws additional light on the use of the future tense in יִהְיֶה, lit., they were gushing forth from the fruits of the field. The last clause of the verse is a more specific statement of what is said in the first clause. Happier were those who fell by the sword, than those who starved to death, especially those who being pierced through, died while yet there were supplies of food in the city. This is the idea I have endeavored to express in the new translation. BOOTHBY'S translation—For those pierced pass away, but these for want of the fruits of the field, would require a new text.—W. H. H.]

IV. 10.

- 10 The hands of the pitiful women have sodden their own children : they were their meat in the destruction of the daughter of my people.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 10.—רַחֲמָנִי (see EWALD, § 164, a; OLSEN, p. 412, f) is āw. āry. According to the sense it seems to denote, not the external habits of life, as רַחֲמָנִי and רַחֲמָנִי (Deut. xxviii. 56), but the inner habitus, softness and tenderness of feeling. The etymology favors this, see רַחֲמָנִי and רַחֲמָנִי.—The verb נָשַׁל does not occur in Jeremiah.—יָלַד is found in Jeremiah once, xxxi. 20.—בָּרוּת, according to FUERST, a secondary form of בָּרוּת, Ps. lxi. 22 (OLSEN, p. 417), is found only here. More properly it should be taken, with EWALD (see § 165 c), MAURER, OLSHAUSEN, for the Inf. Piel, see יָלַד לְבָנָה, Is. vi. 13; Ps. xlix. 15.—The form לָחַץ Jeremiah never uses.—נָשַׁל. See ii. 11.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Ver. 10. This verse exactly corresponds, with respect to its subject, to vers. 3-5, and constitutes in relation to those verses a climax. For whilst vers. 3-5 speak of the pining away of the children, here the yet more terrible fact is told that mothers consumed their own children.—The hands of the pitiful women have sodden their own children. The hands of tender-hearted women cooked their own children.

They were their meat in the destruction—they were food for them in the ruin—of the daughter of My people. The Poet would say, that the complication of feelings and sensations, caused by their terrible calamity, hurried away even tender-hearted women to the commission of this most horrible crime. See ii. 20. [HENDERSON: "Compare 2 Kings vi. 28, 29; Lev. xvi. 29; Deut. xxviii. 56, 57. For a most graphic description of such a horrible scene, see JOSEPHUS' account of the siege under Titus, Bell. Jud. cap. X. 9."]

IV. 11.

- 11 The LORD hath accomplished his fury; he hath poured out his fierce anger, and hath kindled a fire in Zion, and it hath devoured the foundations thereof.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 11.—כָּלִיָּה, Jer. ix. 15; xiv. 12; xxvi. 8, etc. See ii. 22.—חֲמָתוֹ, see ii. 4.—חָרִין אָפֹן, see i. 12.—יָצָת. All existing forms of this root are very frequent with Jeremiah, ii. 15; ix. 9, 11; xvii. 27, etc.—סֹדֶר. Jeremiah never uses. See Ex. xxx. 4; xiii. 14; Am. i. 4, 7, 10; Ps. cxxvii. 7, etc.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Ver. 11. This verse closes the second part of the Poem, in a way entirely similar to that in which ver. 6 closes the first part. In both there is placed in our hand, as it were, a measuring rule, that we may be able to measure the extent and the significance of the catastrophe which has befallen Zion. Only in ver. 6 is indicated the measure of the greatness of Zion's guilt, but here the measure of the Divine wrath. [The remarkable correspondence between vers. 1-6 and 7-11, which Dr. NAEGLSBACH has so skillfully developed, is argument enough for rejecting the arrangement of GERLACH, who assigns ver. 11 to the second general division of the Poem.—W. H. H.].—The LORD hath accomplished his fury: he hath poured out his fierce anger, and hath kindled a fire in Zion, and it hath devoured the foundations thereof. Jehovah fulfilled His wrath, He poured out (die Glut seines Zornes) His hot anger, and kindled a fire in Zion that consumed her foundations. [GERLACH remarks that the foundations of the city were not literally destroyed, but that this denotes in a general way that the city was razed to the ground. This is explicitly said of Zion, or the sacred part of the city, with special reference to the Sanctuary, which was completely destroyed. See Deut. xxxii. 22; Jer. xxi. 14;

vii. 20. We may regard this as a prophecy of a future destruction that was to come on Zion, when not one stone should be left upon another; or, if not a prophecy, at least an instructive commentary on the causes which led to that catastrophe, and on the catastrophe itself as the result of the wrath and fiery indignation of Jehovah God, accomplishing the threatening of His holy word.—W. H. H.]

PART II.—IV. 12-22.

SECT. III. VERS. 12-16.

- ↳ VER. 12. The kings of the earth believed not,
Nor all the inhabitants of the earth,
That an oppressor and enemy would come Into Jerusalem's gates.
- ▷ VER. 13. On account of the sins of her Prophets,
The crimes of her Priests,
Who shed in the midst of her Blood of the righteous.
- ↳ VER. 14. They stumbled like blind men through the streets, Defiled with blood
So that men could not Touch their garments.
- ▷ VER. 15. "Away! unclean!" men cried to them, "away! away! touch not!"
When they fled away, they still stumbled,
Men said among the heathen,
"They shall not longer tarry."
- ▷ VER. 16. The anger of Jehovah scattered them;
He will no longer look upon them.
Men showed no favor to priests,
They had no compassion for elders.

SECT. IV. VERS. 17-22.

- ↳ VER. 17. As for us, our eyes failed, still looking
For our vain help:
On our watch-tower we watched
For a people that could not save.
- ↳ VER. 18. They hunted our steps
That we could not go in our streets.
Our end drew near, our days were fulfilled,
Yea, our end was come!
- ▷ VER. 19. Swifter were our pursuers
Than the eagles of heaven:
On the mountains, they chased us;
In the wilderness, they lay in wait for us.
- ↳ VER. 20. The breath of our nostrils, the Anointed of Jehovah,
Was taken in their pits,
Of whom we said,
Under his shadow will we live among the nations.
- ↳ VER. 21. Exult and be glad, daughter of Edom,
That dwellest in the land of Uz,
To thee, also, shall the cup pass over,
Thou shalt be drunk and make thyself naked.

ת VER. 22. Consumed is thy guilt, daughter of Zion,
No longer does He make thee captive.
He visits thy guilt, daughter of Edom,
He uncovers thy sins.

ANALYSIS.

PART THIRD, vers. 12-16, treats of the causes of the terrible catastrophe. What even the heathen had not deemed possible, ver. 12, had been brought about by the sins of the prophets and priests, especially by their blood-guiltiness, ver. 13, in consequence of which they had been proscribed by their own countrymen, and not only so, but even in foreign countries they had been chased from place to place, and scattered and treated in the worst manner, without respect to age or condition, vers. 14-16. PART FOURTH describes the failure of the hope resting on Egyptian help, ver. 17; for the Chaldeans, in order to prevent the flight of the king, kept the most careful watch, whereby this means of escape was prevented, ver. 18; when, nevertheless, the flight was at last attempted and frustrated by the rapid pursuit, the only hope the fugitives still cherished, to be able to live among a foreign people, in the enjoyment of freedom, at least, under the shadow of their own king, was destroyed, vers. 19, 20. The last two verses, 21, 22, which constitute the conclusion of the whole, contain a short address to Edom, which, on account of its malevolent joy at the downfall of Zion, is forewarned of a similar fate, whilst in the same connection, the prospect is exhibited to Zion of the remission of her guilt and an end of her captivity.

Vers. 12-16. This third part contains an exposition of the causes of the punishment inflicted. What had been regarded, even among the heathen, as impossible, namely, that the gates of Jerusalem should be entered by force, ver. 12, this the godless priests and prophets, by their bloody cruelty, had rendered possible, ver. 13. Thus they became an object of abhorrence to Israel and to the heathen, vers. 14, 15, so that, tolerated nowhere, they were scattered abroad and compelled to suffer the hardest of fates, ver. 16.

IV. 12-16.

12 The kings of the earth, and all the inhabitants of the world, would not have believed that the adversary and the enemy should have entered into the gates of 13 Jerusalem. For the sins of her prophets and the iniquities of her priests that have 14 shed the blood of the just in the midst of her. They have wandered as blind men 15 in the streets, they have polluted themselves with blood, so that men could not 16 touch their garments. They cried unto them, Depart ye; it is unclean; depart, depart, touch not: when they fled away and wandered, they said among the heathen, 16 They shall no more sojourn there. The anger of the LORD hath divided them; he will no more regard them: they respected not the persons of the priests, they favoured not the elders.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 12.—The Hiphil of מָכַן, once in Jeremiah, xii. 6.—כָּל־כִּי־אֶרֶץ, Jer. xxv. 20.—(וְכָל). The ו, omitted by K^ri, and by some MSS. and Masoretic editions, and by Sept., is expressed in Syr., Chald. and Vulg. BLAYNEY.—תָּבַל is found in Jeremiah only in the critically suspected passages x. 12; ii. 16. The phrase כָּל יִשְׁבֵי תָבַל is found verbatim Ps. xxxiii. 8, comp. xxiv. 1; xcvi. 7.—Jeremiah never uses צָר in the singular, see i. 5, 7, 10. צָר is used in connection with אָוִיב, as here, in Esth. vii. 6.—שְׁעָרֵי יְרוּשָׁלַם, Jer. i. 15; xvii. 19, 21, 27; xxii. 19.

Ver. 13.—בִּקְרָבָה. See Jer. iv. 14; vi. 6; etc., and remarks on Lam. iii. 45.—The expression, רָם צַדִּיקִים, occurs only here: elsewhere it is always said רָם נָקִי, e.g. Deut. xxi. 8; 2 Kings xxiv. 4, or רָם הַנָּקִי, Jer. xxii. 17, or נָקִים רָם, Jer. xix. 4.

Ver. 14.—Jeremiah uses נָעַן once, xiv. 10. See Zeph. i. 17.—עָנָה, once in Jer., xxxi. 8. [BLAYNEY and OWEN take עָנָה as participle Pual of עָנָה to rouse or excite.]—בְּחִיצוֹת. See vers. 5, 8.—נִמְאָלוּ בָרָם. The words are taken from Is. lix. 3. נִמְאָל, softened from נִמְעָל (Lev. xxvi. 11, 15; Jer. xiv. 19). With reference to form, blended of Niphal and Pual, see OLSH. § 275, EWALD, § 132, b., DELITZSCH, Is. p. 566 [GREEN'S Gr., exceedingly defiled, § 83, c. 2, § 122, 2]. נִמְאָל is found in Jeremiah only in the sense of loosening, redeeming; see iii. 58.—The construction of יִכְלֶה with the finite verb is equivalent to the same with the Infinitive, i. 14. See iii. 3, 5; Esth. viii. 6; my Gr. § 95, g. rem. יִכְלֶה is frequent in Jeremiah, see iii. 5; xviii. 6; xx. 7, etc.—נָנַעַ in Jeremiah, iv. 10, 18; xii. 14, etc.—לְבָנֶשׁ, Jer. x. 9.

Ver. 15.—סָרַךְ in Jeremiah, v. 23; xv. 5, etc.—סָרַךְ in the Singular, never in Jeremiah: he uses only once הִטְכָּתִים, xix. 13. [If he could use the plural only once, why not the singular only once?—W. H. H.]—In the words סָרַךְ הָאֵלֹהִים the Poet seems to have in mind Is. iii. 11, where the same words are used, only they are addressed, not to the unclean, but to the clean.—נָנִי (kindred to נָנִי, נָנִי, but occurring in this signification only here) is not found in Jeremiah. [GERLACH derives נָנִי from נָנִי, which Jeremiah does use in its Aramaic form, and in same sense as here, Jer.

lviii. 9.—W. H. H.]—נִפְּלָה, see נִפְּלָה, Ps. xcv. 9.—Jeremiah uses נִפְּלָה frequently in chs. xlii.–xliv. (see xlii. 15, 17, 22, etc.)—Hiphil הִפְּלָה is found in the P ophet only once, xxxi. 12, whilst it occurs in this chapter three times, vers. 15, 16, 22.

Ver. 16.—הִפְּלָה (Hiphil occurs in Jeremiah only once in a passage critically doubtful, xxxvii. 12) is to scatter, as Gen. xlix. 7. With regard to its singular number, see my Gr. § 105, 6.—הִפְּלָה, see i. 11.—The phrase הִפְּלָה הָאֱדוֹמִים, elsewhere very frequently (see Deut. x. 17; 2 Kings v. 1; Job xlii. 10; Ps. lxxxii. 2; Prov. xviii. 5; Is. iii. 3; Mal. ii. 9; comp. Lam. v. 12), is not found in Jeremiah.—Of הִפְּלָה Jeremiah uses the Niphal only once, xxii. 23.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Ver. 12 skilfully introduces the exposition of the causes of what had happened, since the presumption, entertained even by the heathen, that it was impossible for any human enemy to take Jerusalem by force, was disproved (zur Folie gegeben wird) by the sad reality.—The kings of the earth, and all the inhabitants of the world, would not have believed—had not believed—that the adversary and the enemy should have entered—that an oppressor and enemy would come—into the gates of Jerusalem. It is clear that this verse contains a hyperbole. For Jerusalem had been captured more than once before the days of Nebuchadnezzar (see 1 Kings xiv. 26; 2 Kings xiv. 13, 14; 2 Chron. xxxiii. 11; 2 Kings xxiii. 33–35). In spite of this fact, the opinion that it could not be taken by force may have prevailed among the heathen, but hardly to the extent which the Poet here seems to ascribe to it. [Not only was Jerusalem regarded as well-nigh impregnable, because it was strongly fortified by nature and art; but there was a prevailing sentiment among men that it was under the special protection of the Almighty. The heathen idolaters knew to their cost that the God whom the Jews worshipped was a God of great power. They believed that the city of Jerusalem and its Temple were under the special protection of that God. The discomfiture of Sennacherib's army in the days of Hezekiah at the very gates of Jerusalem, and the prolonged siege of the city by the armies of Nebuchadnezzar, were well calculated to deepen the impression that the God of the Jews would not suffer the city to be taken. To this sentiment the Prophet here refers. What he says is pregnant and inferential. He assumes that to be true, which even the heathen believed, that the city could not be taken unless God gave it up to destruction. God's giving it up to destruction implied that the city was guilty of great and heinous sins; and without pausing to state an inference so patent, the Prophet proceeds at once to specify the particular sins which led to a catastrophe that had astonished the kings of the earth and all the inhabitants of the world. He thus condenses several thoughts into one expression;—what even heathen had not expected had happened, and was evidence to all the world of the horrible wickedness, which must have provoked God to forsake His people! There is no reason, therefore, for the suspicion that the Prophet indulged in poetical exaggeration, even if "Jerusalem had been captured more than once before the days of Nebuchadnezzar." In point of fact, however, this last assertion may be questioned. There is no clear evidence that Jerusalem had ever before fallen into actual possession of a heathen enemy. There is no evidence at all that it had ever been taken by assault. On the occasions referred to in 2 Chron. xxxiii. 11 and 2 Kings xxiii. 33–35, it does not appear that the city of Jerusalem was actually occupied by the enemy, or even visited by them, and there is no intimation whatever of its being attacked and taken by arms. From the account given in 2 Chron. xii. 4–9, we would infer that Rehoboam bought peace by giving up the treasures of the city; and that if he surrendered the city at all, he did so without waiting for battle. JOSEPHUS declares that Shishak took the city without fighting (Ant. B. viii. ch. x. § 3)—and that this was the only time it ever was taken before Nebuchadnezzar (Jewish War, B. vi. ch. x. § 1). But there is no positive evidence that the Egyptians actually took possession of the city. The account of the invasion of Judah by the Philistines and Arabians, 2 Chron. xxi. 16, 17, is very brief and vague. If the king's house which they rifled, was the palace in Jerusalem, it does not follow that the whole city fell into their possession, or that it was taken by assault. Joash, king of Israel, 2 Chron. xxv. 21–24, undoubtedly took possession of the city and dismantled and destroyed its defences. But Joash was not a heathen king, neither did he take the city by assault. Having already defeated the armies of Judah in the field, he seems to have met with no resistance at all before the walls of Jerusalem.—W. H. H.]

Ver. 13. EWALD takes vers. 12, 13, as a question. Would the kings of the earth . . . believe, that the enemy and oppressor had entered the gates of Jerusalem only on account of the sins of her prophets . . . who shed blood . . . in the midst of her? The objections to this are:

1. The negative particle, אֵין, ver. 12, is not the same as the interrogative particle הֲ. Should we take it as intended for אֵין=is not, an affirmative answer would be expected. 2. EWALD is obliged to insert, between vers. 12, 13, an only which is not in the text, for he perceives that the heathen might be shaken in the opinion referred to, by a general apostasy of the people, but not by the apostasy of particular individuals.—MEIER and KALKAR, on the other hand, connect vers. 13, 14, and take the verb וַיָּדָע=they wandered, in ver. 14, as predicate of the principal proposition. But in this case the people must be regarded as the subject, which contradicts the whole context. We must, therefore, regard ver. 13, with THEOPHILUS and most others, as an exclamation; or, as MAURER does, supply אֵין הִיא=this came to pass, after ver. 13.—For—on account of—the sins of her pro- phets and [there is no conjunction in the Heb.] the iniquities of her priests, that have shed the blood of the just in the midst of her. See Jer. xvi. 7-24, where it is manifest that the chief guilt of the blood of the martyrs rested on the priests and prophets. Compare Jer. vi. 13-15; xxiii. 11-15, with ii. 84; vii. 6; xix. 4; xxii. 3, 17; Ez. xxii. 25-29; 2 Chron. xxxvi. 14. [GATAKER: "Not that the people were not faulty, as well as either of these, in those wicked pranks and practices that were then committed; but that these were foremost and forwardest ring-leaders and encouragers of them unto those wicked courses, which they should have reprov'd in them, and from which they should have endeavored to restrain them." CALVIN: "He mentions one kind of sins, that they shed the blood of the righteous in the midst of Jerusalem. They had no doubt led the people astray in other things, for they flattered their vices and gave loose reins to licentiousness; but the Prophet here fixed on one particular sin, the most grievous; for they had not only, by their errors and false doctrines and flatteries, led away the people from the fear of God, but had also obstinately defended their impiety, and by force and cruelty repressed their faithful teachers, and put to death the witnesses of God; for by the righteous or just he no doubt means the prophets. For what JEROME and others say, that blood had been shed because false teachers draw souls to perdition, is frivolous and wholly foreign to what Jeremiah had in view; for the word righteous cannot be applied to those miserable men who were ensnared to their own ruin. Then Jeremiah, after having denounced the sin of the prophets and the iniquity of the priests, mentions the savage cruelty which was as it were the summit of all their vices."]

Ver. 14. They have wandered as blind men in the streets, they have polluted themselves with blood. They staggered as blind (men) through the streets, defiled with blood. [Wandered. The verb is more frequently used in the sense of staggering, reeling (so GELLACH), or stumbling (BROUGHTON, NOYES), than in any other, and this sense is very appropriate to the uncertain motion of blind men, who are not much addicted to wandering about the streets.—W. H. H.).—As blind men. The idea cannot be exodium perpetrandarum insatiabili cupiditate occæcati [blinded by insatiable desire to commit murders], as ROSENUELLER would have it; for they have in fact already shed blood and therefore it is added that they were defiled with blood. Rather, they are, as it were, drunk with the blood they have already shed, and in this drunkenness they go along as if blind, not observing whom they may chance to touch with their blood-stained clothes.—So that men could not (marg. in that they could not but) touch their garments—when one could not [i. e. lawfully] touch their garments.—So that (EWALD, THENIUS). בְּלֹא cannot be so rendered. It stands before the whole negative sentence, as before a single word. This sentence contains a statement on the subject of Levitical cleanness, with respect to the uncleanness they contracted by the contamination referred to. Thus: They staggered . . . in a condition in which it was not lawful for any one to touch them. [GELLACH, whose explanation agrees with that just given, except that for no sufficient reason he renders the verbs in the present tense, has more accurately expressed the sense of the original, than, perhaps, any other commentator. "According to the whole drift of the chapter, which describes the consequences of the judgment with respect to particular classes and conditions of the people, the following verses present a description of the judgment inflicted on the wicked Prophets and Priests, but not a mere fragment of the history of the late siege. This opinion is confirmed by the very first words of ver. 14 (they stagger as if blind), which denote elsewhere, as a comparison with Deut. xxviii. 28, 29; Jer. xxiii. 12; Isa. xxix. 9; lix. 10 shows, the effect of Divine punishment. * * The Prophets and Priests should be the eyes of the people: they have become blind and stagger about helplessly (rathlos und hüllos) as blind men do; thus has God's hand smitten them on account of their sins. The evil marks of their sins they carried about with them openly, so that all the world could recognize them and avoid their touch, lest they should become themselves unclean."—Other translations and interpretations have been given, all involving great difficulties. BLAYNEY's is unique. "They ran frantic through the streets, they were stained with blood; such as they could not overpower, they touched their clothes." The meaning is, that if they could no otherwise harm those they met with in the streets, they defiled them by touching their garments." This, besides the impossible translations, is open to the objection (that may be made to ROSENUELLER's and BOOTHROD's glosses, who represent the Prophets and Priests, blinded by passion, seeking for blood), namely, that the prophets and priests shed the blood of the just, "not by raving through the streets, sword in hand, but in a more secret way, by instigating their agents" (NOYES).—W. H. H.]

Ver. 15. They cried unto them, Depart ye (marg. ye polluted); it is unclean; depart, depart, touch not:—Away! unclean one! they cried to them,—away! away! touch not! Who calls בָּרָא [=depart ye, begone, or away!]? Not the murderers, as is evident from the words they cried [i. e. men cried] unto them [for the pronoun must refer to the murderers.—W. H. H.]. THENIUS thinks, those who met together may have called out thus to each other. But לֹא (to them) cannot mean one another. It might, indeed, be taken in the sense of de iis [concerning them], as PAREAU prefers, with an appeal to Ps. iii. 3; lxxxvii. 5, etc. But then the second half of the verse, in which those murderers suddenly appear as fugitives, is deprived of its appropriate explanation. I take the words then as a call addressed to the murderers. According to Lev. xiii. 45, the lepers were required to call out to those meeting them, בָּרָא, טָמֵא, טָמֵא ["unclean, unclean!"]. The same cry is here addressed to those, who, without reflecting on their uncleanness, stagger about on the streets, as if blind, amongst those walking there. [WORDSWORTH: "The Priests and Prophets, who, in their spiritual pride, formerly said to others, 'Come not near to me; I am holier than thou' (Is. lxxv. 5), shall be loathed by others, as being polluted by blood, and men shall cry to them tâmê! tâmê! (unclean! unclean!)—words which the leper was obliged to cry out, in order to keep others from him (Lev. xiii. 45). The singular number (unclean) is here used, in order to connect the words with that cry of the leper"]. But this cry—אָוַי! אָוַי! away! depart ye!—is addressed to them most urgently, and so repeatedly that they recognize themselves as proscribed, and—are compelled to flee. The threefold repetition of אָוַי, away! seems to me to indicate, that not merely immediately after the murders, but persistently all contact with them as with unclean persons was avoided. Thus they were, as was said, proscribed.—When they fled away and wandered—when they had fled away they continued fugitively wandering about [for] they said among the heathen, They shall no more sojourn there—it was said among the heathen, They shall not longer tarry.* Now that they had fled, yet even in a foreign land they found no rest. THENICUS, most unnecessarily and very awkwardly, supposes a flight to the Chaldeans, who had separated these outlaws without affording them a permanent place of abode (אָוַי) and carried them away into captivity to various different places. But those enemies of Jeremiah, who hated him so bitterly and persecuted him, especially on account of his constant admonition to submit themselves to the Chaldeans (see Jer. xxxvii., xxxviii.), certainly did not themselves go over to the Chaldeans. Rather, it is only indicated here, in a general way, that those outlaws might have fled to heathen nations. But if they had, the words אָוַי אָוַי (also they wandered) show that their אָוַי (wandering) did not end with their אָוַי (flight). If they had fled, also they wandered about, that is to say, if they on their flight, after manifold wanderings, thought that they had found at some particular place a secure retreat, then men said even there among the heathen, they shall not tarry longer. They are then driven away even from there. This so plainly reminds us of the restless and fugitive wanderings of Cain, the first murderer, that we take for granted that the Poet had Gen. iv. 12-14 (אָוַי אָוַי) in his mind. [If אָוַי in ver. 14 means they staggered, as men smitten by God with judicial blindness, it seems necessary to give it the same meaning in ver. 15. The sense is explained by the judicial use of the word as expressive of God's judgments; see ver. 14. GERLACH: "When they fled away, they have likewise staggered about, which, on account of the evident reference to אָוַי (they staggered) in ver.

14, must mean that they staggered about as helplessly as they did before in the city; and were avoided in the same way. For if they would escape the scorn of their own people by a hasty departure from them, yet the nations, from whom they sought a hospitable reception (אָוַי), would refuse it to them. Men said, They shall no longer remain as guests; see Deut. xxviii. 65, 66; 'and among these nations shalt thou find no ease, neither shall the sole of thy foot have rest.'"—W. H. H.]

Ver. 16. The anger (marg. face) of the LORD hath divided them—Jehovah's countenance has scattered them.* Thus the Poet describes what is known to him of the actual condition of those outlaws, in consequence of their banishment. They could not even remain together, but must be scattered. By the expression the face of Jehovah, the scattering is traced back to Jehovah as its cause, who had not lost sight of them, but had directed upon them His countenance inimically. See Ps. xxxiv. 17 (16). [See also Lev. xvii. 10; Ps. xxi. 10 (9). In the latter passage the words in the time of Thine anger, are literally in the time of Thy face. There may be an allusion here to Jer. xvi. 17, 18, "For Mine eyes are upon all their ways: they are not hid from My face, neither is their iniquity hid from Mine eyes. And I will first recompense their iniquity and their sin double." When God forgives our sins, we may say, "Thou hast cast all my sins behind Thy back," Is. xxxviii. 17. But when He punishes them, we are compelled to say, "We are consumed by Thine anger, and by Thy wrath are we troubled. Thou hast set our iniquities before Thee, our secret sins in the light of Thy countenance." Ps. xc. 7, 8.—W. H. H.]—He will no more regard them. The verb is future, אָוַי. The Poet predicts for the scattered ones, that there will be no more favorable change of Jehovah's mind towards them.—They respected not the persons of the priests, they favoured not the elders. The priests found not forbearance, the elders found no compassion [or, we may translate more literally as E. V. understanding that the subject of the verbs are the heathen, or men generally; and the wicked murderous priests and elders are the objects of the verbs. God has irretrievably cast them away; and men scorn and injure them.—W. H. H.] Men deal with them without regard to their condition or age.

IV. 17-20.

- 17 As for us, our eyes as yet failed for our vain help: in our watching we have 18 watched for a nation that could not save us. They hunt our steps, that we cannot 19 go in our streets: our end is near, our days are fulfilled; for our end is come. Our persecutors are swifter than the eagles of the heaven: they pursued us upon the 20 mountains, they laid wait for us in the wilderness. The breath of our nostrils, the anointed of the LORD, was taken in their pits, of whom we said, Under his shadow we shall live among the heathen.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 17.—עֹרִינָה [K'ri, עֹרִינָה]. The form is a monstrosity. For, 1. עֹר never stands in the plural with suffixes. 2. If we suppose that the suffix is joined to עֹרִים, then it should be written עֹרִינָה or עֹרִינָה. 3. The suffix form נָה is entirely abnormal. The only possible analogy would be נִינָה, Ex. i. 11, according to which עֹרִינָה would be contracted from עֹרִינָה. But on what does the plural suffix depend? To meet this difficulty the Masorites read עֹרִינָה. [So CALVIN, while we were yet standing: BLAYNEY, HENDERSON, OWEN, while yet or still we existed. BLAYNEY conjectures that the final ה "is a corruption, not of a single ה, but of two ה, the latter of which ought to be prefixed to הַכְּלִינָה, where by its conversive force, it not only clears the passage from all difficulty, but brings the text into a perfect agreement with the LXX., Syr. and Vulg. Versions."] But here also the difficulty remains that the suffix would be joined to עֹרִים. OLSEN (p. 222, g.) on this account assumes that עֹרִינָה stands for עֹרִינָה, and that the K'tib is the result of an error in writing. The latter seems to me also probable: only I believe that the feminine ending of the suffix is correct, and that the ה before נָה was occasioned by the immediately following הַכְּלִינָה. The word then had the sound originally of עֹרִינָה (1 Kings i. 22). עֹרִינָה, as a proposition, with a predicate to be supplied, is it is true also abnormal, even if only the idea of being is supplied. Yet the sense is pertinent. She, that is to say Jerusalem, still stood. We may refer for the grammatical construction to Jer. xl. 3. [This is ROSENMUZZER's explanation. But there is no particular reference to the city in the whole preceding part of the Song; and neither the city nor Zion is in the mind of the writer or the reader. If then we adopt the reading עֹרִינָה, the explanation of THENIUS is certainly to be preferred, "Whilst this was or happened,—namely, the incident just related with reference to the fugitives." But GERLACH is of the opinion that נָה can be taken as suff. 3 pers. fem. plur. referring to the eyes. He refers to an analogous case in Ps. lxxiii. 5, יָכֹחַ in יָכֹחַ, and explains its occurrence here as influenced by sympathy with הַכְּלִינָה and a desire to distinguish the suffix from the singular form in עֹרִינָה, 1 Kings, i. 22. Then the translation is Yet our eyes wasted themselves in looking for our help. So BROUGHTON, Even yet our eyes are spent at our vain help, and NOYES, Still did our eyes fail, looking for help in vain. The same sense may be retained if we adopt the K'ri, adhuc nos (sc. conficimur) vel potius oculi nostri conficiuntur (GERLACH). Yet if the K'ri is adopted, the lit. translation would be, as yet we, see Josh. xiv. 11. The fact that this is the initial word, gives to it an emphasis, both accurately and felicitously expressed in the English Version, As for us still our eyes failed looking for our vain help.—W. H. H.] הַכְּלִינָה עֵינֵינוּ. See li. 11.—עֹרִינָה, in Jer. xxxvii. 7. For the construction of הַכְּלִינָה see my Gr. §3, 4, g. [The possessive pronoun, as a suffix, may come between a noun and the word qualifying it, and then the pronoun and qualifying word are to be expressed together: our help of vanity—our vain help. See NAEGLER'S Gr.—W. H. H.]—הַכְּלִינָה in Jer. xvi. 19; x. 3, 8; li. 5, etc.—צָפִירָה is am. leq. צָפִירָה, in Jer. vi. 17; xlviii. 19.—רוֹשְׁעֵינָה, Jer. xi. 12; xlv. 9; xliii. 11, etc. See also יֹעִיל, Jer. ii. 11. Yet Is. xiv. 20 seems to have been especially in the Poet's mind, where it is said אֶל-אֵל לֹא יִשְׁעֵנָה.

Ver. 18.—Concerning צָרָה, see iii. 52. With reference to the signification insidiare, lying-in-wait for, see Mic. vii. 2; Prov. vi. 26, and the nearly related צָדָה, 1 Sam. xxiv. 12. The reading צָרָה, which some Codices have after the analogy of Prov. iv. 12; Job xviii. 7, gives a less suitable sense. [The change of צָדָה into צָרָה may have been suggested by the difficulty of interpreting the former in accordance with its proper signification of seizing, catching or obtaining by hunting. See Notes below.—W. H. H.]—עֵינֵינוּ, in Jeremiah once, x. 23. [BLAYNEY: "The LXX. Instead of עֵינֵינוּ seem to have read עֵינֵינוּ, our little ones." Here again is a change of the text suggested, doubtless, by the difficulty of hunting (or seizing upon as prey) the footsteps.—W. H. H.]—For the construction of הַכְּלִינָה see הַכְּלִינָה, ver. 9.—רָחֹב, Jer. v. 1; xlviii. 38, etc.—קָרָב, see iii. 57.—כִּלְאוֹ יְמֵינוּ. The expression is elsewhere used of filling up the measure of the days of one's life, see Jer. xxv. 34; 1 Chron. xvii. 11.—בָּא קִין, Jer. li. 3, comp. Am. viii. 2; Ez. vii. 2-6.

Ver. 19.—קָלִי. The Prophet uses the adjective קָל in ii. 23; iii. 9; xlv. 6.—רִפְיָנוּ, see i. 3.—The phrase נִשְׁרִי שָׁמִים occurs only here: yet see Prov. xxiii. 5; xxx. 19.—רָלָק is properly speaking to glow with heat, to burn, Ps. vii. 14; Ez. xxiv. 10. Then it is used in the transferred sense of hot pursuit, and indeed at first with אָחֳרָי (as it were, burning after me) Gen. xxxi. 36; 1 Sam. xvii. 53. Only in this place is the word construed directly as transitive with the Acc. of the object. Jeremiah never avails himself of the word.—כְּדָבָר, very frequent in Jer., ii. 2, 6; iii. 2, etc.—אָרָב, see iii. 10.

Ver. 20.—The expression רִיחַ אֲפִינֵי is not found in Jeremiah; but, founded on Gen. vii. 27, in Ez. xv. 8; Ps. xlviii. 6 (2 Sam. xxii. 16); Job iv. 9; comp. Cant. vii. 9.—כִּשְׁתִּי is not found in Jeremiah. See 1 Sam. xxiv. 6, 7, 11; xxvi. 9, 11, 16, 23; 2 Sam. i. 14, 16; xix. 22; xxxiii. 1.—לִכְרֵי, Jeremiah uses frequently. See li. 56; xxxviii. 28; xlviii. 1, etc.—שְׁחִית, (comp. שְׁחָתָה, Prov. xxiii. 10) is found, besides here, only in Ps. cvii. 20.—צָלָה, Jer. vi. 4; xlviii. 45.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Vers. 17-20. With few but telling strokes the Prophet here sketches a picture of the events which constitute the last stadium of the great catastrophe, ending with the imprisonment of the king. He describes how they in Jerusalem had placed their last hope on Egyptian help, which was not realized, ver. 17. Then, omitting all that had reference to the capture of the city itself, he passes over to the flight of the king, which he describes so graphically, that we are obliged to regard him as a participator in the events he narrates. He describes how they were so closely watched, that soon all hope of escape forsook them, ver. 18. With extraordinary celerity they were pursued, ver. 19, and the king was imprisoned. With that, their last hope, the hope that they might live under his shadow, in the enjoyment at least of liberty, even if among foreign people, was frustrated, ver. 20.

Ver. 17. As for us, our eyes yet failed for our vain help. Yet stood she! Our eyes longed after our vain help. She, that is to say Jerusalem, still stood, exclaims the Poet with emphasis, and thus transports us into the historical event of which he treats. [For the reasons stated above in Textual and Grammatical Notes, the correct translation seems to be, Still did our eyes fail looking for our vain help. Literally, Still our eyes exhausted or spent themselves (looking) for our vain help.—W. H. H.] The Poet describes here the yearning long-cherished hope of Egyptian help. The retreat of the Chaldean army (Jer. xxxvii. 5) had greatly strengthened that hope. But it proved delusive. Instead of the Egyptian army, the Chaldeans were soon seen again approaching the city (Jer. xxxvii. 8; xxxiv. 22). [Our vain help. CALVIN: "There is an implied contrast between empty and fallacious help and the help of God, which the people rejected when they preferred the Egyptians."] —In our watching—on our watch-tower [so BLAYNEY, BOOTHROYD, HENDERSON, NOYES, GERLACH, DAVIDSON Lex., FRERST Lex.]. —We have watched for a nation that could not save us—we watched for a people that helps not [or, will not help (GERLACH), or, may not, i. e. cannot save.—W. H. H.]

Ver. 18. They hunt our steps, that we cannot go in our streets—They watched our steps that we could not go on our streets. EWALD understands the first half of the verse as referring to an edict of the Egyptian king, which prohibited the refugees who were in Egypt from carrying on traffic of any kind with Palestine. This was considered, and not without reason, the harshest measure that could be imposed upon them. But we have not the least knowledge of any kind of trade with the markets of Palestine at the time of its depopulation, or of any prohibition of visiting those markets. Besides, it is not at all probable that the Jews, who had fled to Egypt, impelled by fear of the Chaldeans, would have had any desire to go back again within the reach of the power of the Chaldeans. Then, too, this thought in this connection seems an excessively awkward ὑστερον πρότερον [putting last first]. THIENIS and VAHINGER [BLAYNEY, also] understand these words of the besieging towers, whence the streets were bombarded and so walking in them was prevented. I will not deny that from these towers (see remarks on Jer. lii. 4, 5) the city might be watched. But to refer the words that we could not walk in the streets to the bombardment of the streets, seems to me a singular notion. We are not to suppose that the besieging machines of the ancients carried cannon. [Remembering how narrow the streets of oriental cities are and how protected, often, by the buildings projecting over them, it is obvious that no besieging towers could so command the streets as to expose the citizens to the aim of the enemies' weapons.—W. H. H.] We read in Jer. lii. 7, 8, "And all the men of war fled, by the way of the gate between the two walls, which was by the king's garden: (now the Chaldeans were by the city round about;) and they went by the way of the plain. But the army of the Chaldeans pursued after the king, and overtook Zedekiah in the plains of Jericho; and all his army was scattered from him." See 2 Kings xxi. 4, 5. From this description it appears, 1st. That Zedekiah with his men of war endeavored to escape secretly, and did so escape by a flight at night from a gate situated on the west side of the city. 2d. That the Chaldeans sought to prevent his escape. This is evident from their surrounding the city, as well as from the secret flight and immediate pursuit. It is also obvious, a priori, that Nebuchadnezzar was near at hand for the very purpose of getting possession of the person of the king. Now does not our passage answer exactly to all this? All the steps of the beleaguered citizens were observed, so that they could not go upon their streets unhindered. I do not understand רחכות=streets of the country roads. But I believe that the passages leading out of the city, as for example the way between the walls, can be classed with the רחכות=streets. [The verb rendered hunt, ציד, means (see remarks on iii. 52), not merely to hunt, but to take by hunting, not merely to lay snares (NOYES), but to ensnare or take in snares. It clearly has this meaning, it seems to me, both in Mic. vii. 2 and Prov. vi. 26. The word rendered streets, רחכות, means the streets of a city, as is plainly evident here from the expression our streets. ברחכותינו, in our own streets, can only mean the streets of our city, and that no out of the way passages between the walls, but streets that were common property, and which they were accustomed to walk in. Our text then can only mean that those who appeared on the streets were at once arrested. Zedekiah and his army were not captured in the streets, but far away from the city. It is obvious, therefore, that neither this verse, nor the following one, refers particularly to the flight and capture of Zedekiah and his army. It relates to a time posterior to that event. The city was already in possession of the Chaldeans: the enemy had entered into the gates of Jerusalem (ver. 12), which did not occur till one month after Zedekiah's capture. The Prophet having announced in ver. 11, that the Divine wrath was accomplished, and Zion consumed with fire to the very foundations thereof, goes back in vers. 12-16, to attribute this event to the sins of the prophets and priests, and to show how they were abhorred and punished,—then in ver. 17, he tells us, how those that were left in the city continued to the very last to hope for Egyptian aid,—in ver. 18, that they could not escape from the city, for they were captured the moment they appeared in the streets,—in ver. 19, that those who did manage to escape from the city were pursued and captured, whether they fled to the mountains or the desert,—and ver. 20, declaring that their king was already a prisoner, recognizes the fact that the kingdom is destroyed and their independent nationality is at an end. With all this the last half of ver. 18 harmonizes; when they found that the Egyptians did not come, and that they were wholly in the power of the Chaldeans, then it was evident that their end was near, their days fulfilled,—yea, their end had actually come! We translate the first half of the verse, therefore, They hunted our steps, or they ensnared our steps, that is, they were on the watch for us and caught us as a wily trapper watching the steps of his game, so that we could not go in our streets.—W. H. H.]—Our end is near, our days are fulfilled; for our end is come. [Our end approached, our days were fulfilled, for (or yea, ja, GERLACH) our end arrived, or was actually come. There is no change of tense from the first half of the verse.—W. H. H.] These are the ipsissima verba of the fugitives, which describe most graphically how they felt, when they observed that their flight was discovered. Since many survived those days, among others the king and the Poet himself, it is evident that these words are to be interpreted, not of what happened, but of what they feared would happen. Besides, the second half of the verse, composed of two members, is climactic; for in the first, the end is indicated only as near, but in the second as come, and therefore the measure of life as fulfilled. [These words were not the words of "fugitives," for reasons given above. They may have been the words of the would-be fugitives, those who would have escaped from the city if they had not been arrested in the streets of the city. It is better, however, to regard them as the words of the Prophet. The Egyptians did not come to the rescue. Escape from the city was impossible. Then, says he, our end approached, the days of our national existence were accomplished, yea our end actually arrived, when the city was consumed with fire, and the people transported to Babylon.—W. H. H.]

Ver. 19. Our persecutors are—our pursuers were—swifter than the eagles of the heaven. The image of the eagles is taken from Jer. iv. 13, where it is said of the enemy from the north "his horses are swifter than eagles." See 2 Sam. i. 23. Their apprehension proves to be well founded. The pursuit was begun instantly and with the greatest energy.—They pursued us upon the mountains, they laid wait for us in the wilderness. On the mountains they chased us, in the wilderness they were on the watch for us [GERLACH: laid snares for us.] It is to be observed that the way from Jerusalem to Jericho, at first over heights (beginning with the Mount of Olives) leads directly down into the plain of the Ghôr. See the full description of this road in RITTER'S Geography, xv. 1. pp. 485 ff. Let the suffixes of the first person be carefully observed in this whole narration of the flight of the king, vers. 18-20. Would not one, who knew of the facts only by hear-say, have used the third person? And does not the first person show, as also the animated clearly defined particulars do, that he himself had participated in the flight from that fierce pursuit? [Granting that the flight and pursuit of the king are here intended, there is surely nothing in the description that necessarily implies the presence of the author with the king. But we have seen above that this verse cannot relate to the flight and capture of the king. The Prophet is simply relating the fate of the people and confirming his declaration that their end, as a people, a nation, had come, ver. 18. The Egyptians did not arrive for their relief. Those who ventured into the streets were seized and made prisoners. Those who managed to escape were hotly pursued or fell into ambushes carefully prepared in view of their flight. They were now hopeless and helpless. And to crown all, their king was a prisoner, ver. 20, and even if they could escape from their pursuers, they could not rally around his sacred person and preserve their independent sovereignty in some foreign land. Thus in very truth their end had come, which is the point the Prophet has in his mind.—W. H. H.]

Ver. 20. The breath of our nostrils. [OWEN: "A kingdom cannot exist without a king. Hence the king may be said to be the breath or the life of the body politic."—the anointed of the LORD—of Jehovah—was taken in their pits—[CALVIN: in their anares. BROUGHTON: was caught in their trap.—Of whom we said, under his shadow—[or, according to OWEN and NOYES, under whose shadow, we said,—see Is. xxx. 2, 3; Hos. xiv. 8 (7); Ez. xxxi. 17.—We shall live among the heathen—[the nations, CALVIN, BROUGHTON, BOOTHROYD, OWEN, NOYES, GERLACH. BLAYNEY: "To live among the nations, probably means to exist in a national capacity, or as one among them."] It is not the purpose of the Poet to sound the praises of the king. The literal meaning of the words and the connection utterly refute the idea, adopted by the Chaldaic, Raschi and many modern commentators, that this refers to the pious Josiah, whom Jeremiah, according to 2 Chron. xxxv. 25, glorified in a song of lamentation. The King here meant can only be Zedekiah. He was a weak, but a good-natured king. He resembled Louis XVI. of France. Like him he may also have been well-beloved. But the principal point was that he was king, and especially the theocratic king. SENECA says (de Clementiâ, i. 4, according to a quotation of PAREAU'S), Ille (princeps) est spiritus vitalis, quem hæc tot millia (civium) trahunt [he (the sovereign) is the vital breath, which so many thousands (of citizens) inhale]. Much more the theocratic king, the Lord's anointed, the bearer of the promises (2 Sam. vii.) was a living pledge of the continuance and prosperity of the people. See Ps. xxviii., especially ver. 8, and DELITZSCH on that place. We can see, besides, from the words of whom we said, etc., what plan with reference to the future was entertained by the fugitive Jews. They hoped to escape to a friendly heathen nation, and there gathering around their king as their shield and security of a better future, pass their days at least in freedom. [WORDSWORTH: "It has been objected by some, that the Lamentations could not have been written by Jeremiah on the occasion of the destruction of Jerusalem, because such words as these, could not be applied to such a vicious king as Zedekiah. But such an objection as this betrays an ignorance of the nature of true loyalty, as taught by Almighty God in the Old Testament, as well as in the New. He teaches us to distinguish the person of the sovereign from his office, and to venerate his authority as from God

* [Is this question well put by one who regards the third Song as the composition of another than Jeremiah himself?—W. H. H.]

(Rom. xiii. 1-7), whatever may be his personal character. Even Saul was 'the Lord's Anointed,' and was revered and bewailed as such by David. See on 1 Sam. xxvii. 8, 11, 16, 23; 2 Sam. i. 14, 16. And our blessed Lord and His Apostles teach us to obey a civil ruler, as God's deputy and vicegerent, in all things not unlawful, although that ruler may be a Tiberius (see on Matt. xxii. 21) or a Nero (see on Rom. xiii. 1-7; Titus iii. 1; 1 Pet. ii. 13)." CALVIN: "God made David king, and also his posterity, for this end, that the life of the people might, in a manner, reside in him. As far then as David was the head of the people, and so constituted by God, he was even their life. The same was the case with all his posterity as long as the succession continued. . . . But we must observe that these high terms in which the posterity of David were spoken of, properly belong to Christ only; for David was not the life of the people, except as he was the type of Christ and represented His person. Then what is said was not really found, in its fullest significance, in the posterity of David, but only typically. Hence the truth, the reality, is to be sought in no other but in Christ. And we hence learn that the Church is dead, and is like a maimed body, when separated from its Head. . . . In short, Jeremiah means that the favor of God was, as it were, extinguished when the king was taken away, because the happiness of the people depended on the king, and the royal dignity was as it were a sure pledge of the grace and favor of God; hence the blessing of God ceased, when the king was taken away from the Jews. . . . We shall live, they said, even among the nations under the shadow of our king; that is, 'Though we may be driven to foreign nations, yet the king will be able to gather us, and his shadow will extend far and wide to keep us safe.' So the Jews believed, but falsely, because by their defection they had cast away the yoke of Christ and of God, as it is said in Ps. ii. 3. As then they had shaken off the heavenly yoke, they in vain trusted in the shadow of an earthly king, and were wholly unworthy of the guardianship and protection of God."

IV. 21, 22.

- 21 Rejoice and be glad, O daughter of Edom, that dwellest in the land of Uz: the cup also shall pass through unto thee; thou shalt be drunken, and shalt make thyself naked. The punishment of thine iniquity is accomplished, O daughter of Zion; he will no more carry thee away into captivity: he will visit thine iniquity, O daughter of Edom; he will discover thy sins.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 21.—יִשְׂמְחֵת. For the form see Jer. x. 17. [May we recognize a peculiarity of Jeremiah in this form?—W. H. H.] יִשְׂמֵחַ, see i. 21.—כִּי־כֵן, Jer. xxv. 15, 17, 28; xlix. 12; ii. 7, etc. The expression כִּי־כֵן is peculiar to this place.—שָׁכַר, incubriari, Jer. xxv. 27; xlviii. 26; ii. 7, 39, 57.—Hithp. of עָרָה only here. Jeremiah uses the verb in no form. Perhaps there lies in עָרָה an allusion [ironical?] to that עָרָה, עָרָה of the Edomites, Ps. cxxxvii. 7.

Ver. 22.—The perfects in this verse indicate, that the Poet transfers himself into the future, in such a manner that he sees what is yet future, as if it were actually transpiring before him.—עָלָה, see ver. 6.—יָמָּה, frequent with Jeremiah, i. 3; vi. 29; xxiv. 10, etc. The phrase עָלָה יָמָּה occurs only here.—Jeremiah uses Hiphil of נָלַל very often, xx. 4; xxii. 12, etc.: also the Piel, see ii. 14, where the construction with עָלָה also occurs.—פָּקַד, Jer. v. 9, 29; xxv. 12, etc. The phrase פָּקַד עָלָי is a characteristic of the Pentateuch, Ex. xx. 5; xxxiv. 7; Lev. xviii. 25; Num. xiv. 18; Deut. v. 9: yet it is also found in Jeremiah, xxv. 12; xxxvi. 31.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Vers. 21, 22. In conclusion the Poet addresses a word of threatening to Edom, in the midst of which a word of comfort addressed to Zion, renders the severity of the threatening still more impressive. That the Edomites most maliciously rejoiced in the destruction of Jerusalem, and even contributed towards it, we know from Ps. cxxxvii. 7; Ez. xxv. 12; xxxv. 15; xxxvi. 5. See remarks on Jer. xlix. 7-22, to which the ironical יִשְׂמְחֵת, יִשְׂמֵחַ, rejoice and be glad, here refer.

Ver. 21. Rejoice—exult—and be glad, O daughter of Edom, that dwellest in the land of Uz. Whether this refers to an extension of the dominion of Edom that existed at that time, or at an earlier period, or whether it merely refers to such an extension in a general way, is very questionable. EWALD (on this text and Gesch. d. B. Isrl. IV. 8. 9) is of the opinion, that Nebuchadnezzar had extended the dominion of the Edomites "in the land of Uz far to the north-east." But this position of the land of Uz [north-east of Idumea] is very problematical. See remarks on Jer. xxv. 20. At all events, the words are most easily explained if the dwelling in the land of Uz is regarded as an evidence of success and a cause for rejoicing on the part of Edom. The historical accounts are too sparse to enable us to ascertain anything on this subject with certainty. See CARL VON RAUMER, Eastern Palestine and the land of Edom, in Berghaus' Annals, 1830, Vol. I pp. 563, 564. [BROUGHTON: "From Essay to the Herods Edom hated Jacob, and no less than ten prophecies are against them, as BARBINEZ noteth upon Obadiah" CALVIN: "The Idumeans, above others, had manifested hostility to the chosen people. And the indignity was the greater, because they had descended from the same father, for Isaac was their common father; and they derived their origin from two brothers, Esau and Jacob. As, then, the Idumeans were related to the Jews, their cruelty was less tolerable; for they thus forgot their own race, and raged against their brethren and relatives."].—The cup also shall pass through unto thee—also to thee shall the cup pass over. [CALVIN: "He employs a common metaphor; for adversity is denoted in the Scripture by the word cup; for God, according to His will, gives to drink to each as much as He pleases. . . . Nor does He allow any one either to reject the cup offered, or to throw away the wine, but He constrains him to drink and to exhaust to the very dregs as much as He gives to each to drink. Hence it is for this reason that the Prophet says now that the cup would pass over to the Idumeans; for we know that, shortly after, they were subdued by the Chaldeans, with whom they had before been united. But when they had by their perfidy fallen off from their treaty, they were in their turn punished"].—Thou shalt be drunken. Thou shalt get drunk. [By drunkenness here we are to understand "that judicial infatuation" (BLAYNEY) which leads to all sorts of shame and self-injury, and exposes its subject to the cruel mercies of his enemies.—W. H. H.].—And shalt make thyself naked. Drunkenness and denudation, intoxication and shame go together: see Gen. ix. 21; Hab. ii. 15, 16.

Ver. 22. The punishment of thine iniquity (marg. simply, Thine iniquity) is accomplished.—Blotted out is thy guilt [or we can translate Dr. NAEGLSBACH'S translation, Thy debt is paid, Getilgt ist deine Schuld. GERLACH: thy guilt is at an end. All the English translators, except OWEN, take יָצָא in the first member of the verse as the punishment of iniquity, and in the second member as iniquity itself. OWEN translates the word iniquity in both members, but explains the first as meaning punishment: "to complete iniquity," he says, "can here mean no other thing than to complete the punishment due to it." It is an awkward confusion of terms and injures the antithesis between the two members of the verse to put two meanings on this one word. We are, doubtless, to take the word in both clauses in the sense of guilt, desert of and liability to punishment, and understand the whole verse as intended in a prophetic and anticipatory sense. The exile the Jews were now suffering would exhaust, as it were, the demands of justice against them; and in view of this the Prophet says, Thy guilt is blotted out, or cancelled, or at an end. WORDSWORTH: "Rather, thy sin (see ver. 6) is accomplished, completed and taken away; and for this use of the verb (tâm) here, see iii. 22; Jer. vi. 29; xlv. 12; where it is rendered by consumed, and GESEN. 867."—W. H. H.].—He will no more carry thee away into captivity—he will not banish thee longer [lit. he will not add to banish thee. This does not imply, as many commentators seem to apprehend, a promise that God would never again send the Jewish nation into captivity. But it means only that their present exile should not be prolonged beyond the limit determined by their guilt. It involves rather a promise of a return to their own land, when their iniquity was thus cancelled by the punishment received.—W. H. H.].—He will visit thine iniquity—He visits thy guilt. See i. 8.—O daughter of Edom, he will discover—he uncovers—thy sins. The two halves of the verse correspond to each other: each of them has the name of a nation for its central point; to the עֲוֹנֶיךָ, finished or cancelled is thy guilt, of the first half, corresponds the בְּפֶקֶד עֲוֹנֶיךָ, he visits thine iniquity, of the second; and to the הַגְלִיתֶךָ, to banish thee, of the first half, corresponds the גִּלְיָה, uncovers, of the second.

[This is more apparent in Hebrew, because the last two words referred to are derived from the same verbal root. Some have attempted to make the correspondence complete by giving the same sense to both these words. Thus BOOTHROYD translates the first he will no more expose thee, and the second he will expose thy sins. But the Hiphil form of the first phrase will not allow us to translate it in the same sense as the Kal form of the second word, nor does the Hiphil ever seem to be used in any other sense than that of leading away, causing to go away, driving away, or carrying captive. HENDERSON, on the other hand (BLAYNEY and OWEN give the same sense), translates the first phrase he will no more hold thee captive, and the second he will carry thee away captive because of thy sins, which agrees with the marginal reading in our English Bible. But the Kal might mean to go away into captivity, but cannot have the Hiphil sense of carrying away. More than this, the grammatical construction would require us to understand that he made their sins captive instead of their persons. And more than all the Hebrew phrase is constantly used in the sense of uncovering sins, for the purpose of exposing them to contempt, rebuke and punishment. For these reasons it seems necessary to acquiesce in the translation above given.—WORDSWORTH: "He hath uncovered the sins of Edom; and hath covered those of Israel."—W. H. H.]

*Note on Authorship. It seems to me that this Song contains some hints in reference to its author that are worthy of consideration. 1. The brilliant descriptive sketch of the Princes of Judah, given by the Poet in ver. 7, should be considered. 2. He charges the blame of the prodigious misfortune entirely to the Priests and Prophets, vers. 13-15 (see also ii. 14), whilst it appears from Jeremiah that the secular leaders of the people [die weltlichen Grossen] were not less guilty. See Jer. ii. 26; v. 5, 25-28; xxiii. 1, 2; xxxiv. 19; xxxvii., xxxviii. xlv. 17. His way of putting things conveys to us the impression, that the author may have been an accomplished member of the lay aristocracy, possessed of great love for his own particular order. 3. This conclusion is favored by the fact, as he gives us very plainly to understand, that he was one of the companions of the king in his flight, vers. 17-20. It would seem then, that he was one of the polished and well-disposed Princes belonging to the Court of the King. Was he, perhaps, that Seraiah, who was the son of Neriah and brother of Baruch (Jer. li. 59)? [The arguments here indicated have been already sufficiently answered. It remains only to say, 1. That Jeremiah was fully equal to a much fuller and more "brilliant" description of the princes, than that contained in ver. 7, both from his personal knowledge of the court, and his imaginative, poetical and rhetorical abilities, as exhibited in his book of Prophecies. 2. The author, even supposing him to be one of the Princes, can not be charged with the criminal partiality of attempting to throw a veil over the sins of his own peers. While ver. 13 charges special guilt on Prophets and Priests, as also Jeremiah (himself both Prophet and Priest) does; yet the whole people are represented as given up to sin, like the inhabitants of Sodom of old, ver. 6; and the 1, with which ver. 6 begins, shows that the secular nobility, represented in ver. 5 as those who "fed delicately" and were "brought up in scarlet," suffered the punishment of their own "iniquity." If it could be shown that the book of the prophecies of Jeremiah, written by a Prophet and Priest, sought to extenuate the guilt of those two classes and to lay the blame chiefly on the secular nobility, then there might be some show for the argument that this Book of Lamentations, which lays the onus of the guilt on Prophets and Priests, was not written by Jeremiah. But the very opposite of this is true: and in Jer. xxvi. 7-24, the Prophet actually represents the Princes as resisting the conspiracy of the Prophets and Priests, to put him to death. Who then would be more likely to show a preference for the Princes, to the other two orders alluded to, than Jeremiah himself? In fact, however, no such preference is shown. 3. Vers. 17-19 do not and cannot describe the flight and capture of the king and his army. If it were possible to interpret them of those events, we must decide that they are anything but "graphic," and have none of the characteristics which would mark the report of an eye-witness of those events and a participator in them. Only an author capable of the brusque personation of Jeremiah in the third chapter, by the abrupt introduction of "I am the man," could possibly be guilty of such an awkward and preposterous absorption of the king, princes, and "all the men of war" in his own person, by tumbling them all into the narrative condensed into the single pronoun "us," without any other announcement or the slightest intimation of the rank, character and numbers of those who now appear upon the scene. As Dr. NAGELSBACH can accept the absurdity involved in the idea that Jeremiah was not the author of the third chapter, he can be pardoned for the absurdity involved in the idea, that the "us," in ver. 17 of this chapter, means king Zedekiah and his companions in flight, including "all the men of war." But where are the graphic features of the description, "die er so anschaulich beschreibt, dass man sich fast genöthigt sieht, ihn für einen Theilnehmer derselben zu halten," i. e., that there is no escape from the conclusion that the writer was a participant in the scenes he describes? Where are the allusions to the facts that they escaped under cover of the "night," "by the way of the gate between the two walls, which was by the king's garden," that "all the men of war" went with the king and that when the king was taken the army was "scattered from him" (2 Kings xxv. 25; Jer. lii. 6-8)? On the other hand, here are facts inconsistent with those referred to, that they were on their watch-towers, watching for help, not attempting escape, ver. 17, and that they could not go in the streets without being arrested by those who hunted their steps, ver. 18, involving the idea that the city was already in possession of the enemy,—whereas, before the enemy were actually in the city, Zedekiah and his army made a secret and unobserved escape, and were not pursued till after they had gone completely round the walls of the city from west to east and were on their way to the plains of Jericho. Finally: it should be observed that the completeness of the Poem requires us to interpret these last verses of the events that followed the capture of the king. They describe the last scene in the catastrophe, the feelings and the fate of the people, remaining in the city, when the Chaldeans took possession of it and proceeded to their work of plunder, violence and destruction. And it is written just as we would suppose Jeremiah, who was found in imprisonment by the Chaldeans, at that time, and who actually witnessed what he describes, would have written it.—W. H. H.]

* [This note, appended to the introduction to the chapter by the author, has been transferred to the end of the chapter by the Translator, in order to preserve the connection unbroken.—W. H. H.]

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. Ver. 1. "If the violation of a material Temple, such as that of Jerusalem formerly was, is so sad and sorrowful a spectacle; how much more sad and sorrowful would be the violation of spiritual temples, such as the bodies of Christians? Yet they are violated by other crimes against conscience, as well as especially by fornication and murders (1 Cor. vi. 15-20). But woe to such a violator! For he in turn shall be destroyed by the just judgment of God (1 Cor. iii. 16, 17)." FÖRSTER.

2. Vers. 1, 2. The children of Zion are here denoted as of noble extraction, and on that account compared to precious metals and precious stones, which never could become so black and vile, as to be thrown into the corners of the streets as worthless. Israel was in fact the nobility of the human race. For the heathen are nothing else than the homo communis, the ordinary natural man, without higher life-power. But Israel, as the chosen people, represented the power of the higher and eternal life, though only typically. Therefore it represents only, as it were, the lower nobility, or nobility in the lowest degree. Yet this is always a real nobility. The meanest Jew carries about with him to this day, in his crooked nose, a diploma of nobility, which elevates him above all the nobility of our modern European aristocrats, for he is thereby legitimized as a son of Abraham. But what is this and all other kinds of nobility of the earthly high-born, compared to the nobility of those born again of Christ through the Word and Sacrament? Nothing but "dung," as Paul decides, who in Phil. iii. 8 tears his theocratic patent of nobility into shreds. For all that springs from the earth, is perishable, corruptible, subject to bondage (Gal. iv. 23-25); but what comes from Heaven, is incorruptible, eternal, glorious, truly free (Gal. iv. 26). Before that absolute nobility, moreover, all earthly distinctions vanish away; here is neither Jew nor Greek, here is neither bond nor free, here is neither male nor female; for ye are all one in Christ Jesus (Gal. iii. 28). And on this account the Apostle speaks such earnest words against those who violate their Christian nobility (1 Cor. iii. 16, 17; vi. 14-16).

3. Vers. 1, 2. "We are here reminded that there is no greater happiness on earth, than when Churches and Schools are built, in which God's pure word is preached and His worship duly and rightly observed; as on the other hand, there can be no greater evil than when all these are destroyed, wherefore Jeremiah here mourns first of all and most of all over such a destruction. And although Churches are not adorned with gold and silver, as the Temple at Jerusalem was, yet God's word and Divine worship rightly performed are more than all silver, gold and fine gold. To which purpose David says, The words of the Lord are pure words; as silver tried in a furnace of earth, purified seven times, Ps. xii. 7 (3): The law of Thy mouth is better unto me than thousands of gold and silver, Ps. cxix. 72. Therefore we should look to it, that we do not by despising the divine word forfeit such a precious treasure, as did the Jewish people; on the contrary, loving God's word and observing diligently a pure worship and by the maintenance of pure doctrine, we should look to it, that the precious gold does not grow dim nor the fine gold lose its lustre." Würtemb. Summarien.

4. Ver. 2. "The Jews excelled in three respects: in profound and accurate knowledge of God (Ps. cxlvii. 20); secondly, in the beauty of a virtuous life (Sir. xlv. 6); thirdly, in careful observance of a pure worship (1 Mac. iv. 43)." THOMAS AQUINAS, in Ghiesler, p. 176.

5. Ver. 2. "Sons of Zion, to wit of that looked-for city, which the Lord hath built, that it may be seen in its glory,—sons of the supernal Jerusalem, which is free, our mother; illustrious by the dignity of their condition; clothed in the primest gold, by their likeness to God. How then have we, who have become esteemed as earthen vessels, degenerated from these [Sons of Zion] into these vile and fragile bodies!" BERNHARD V. CLAIRV. in Ghiesler, S. 177.

6. Ver. 2. "Let men of noble rank regard this as said to themselves, lest, because they are likened to gold on account of the celebrity of their family, they grow proud and imperious, but rather let them be persuaded to remember, that they are in the hands of the celestial potter (Sir. xxxiii. 13), who can easily transmute gold into earthen vessels, yea, and break these up into pieces (Ps. ii. 9)." FÖRSTER. [SCOTT: "The glory of outward distinctions and privileges may soon be obscured: Sin tarnishes the beauty of the most excellent gifts; and when the Lord leaves churches or nations, their 'glory' is departed." But that 'gold tried in the fire' which Christ bestows, will never be taken from us; not can its excellency be diminished."]

7. Vers. 3, 4. [SCOTT: "Extreme necessity has a tendency to render the heart callous and unfeeling: they who have improperly indulged their children when in prosperity, have often been most regardless of them in distress: and the human species has frequently been found more cruel and insensible, than the most ferocious and stupid of the irrational creatures."]

8. Ver. 5. "Per quod quis peccat, per idem puni-tur et ipse, that in which a man sins is the means of his punishment." FÖRSTER. [HENRY: "It is the wisdom of those who have abundance, not to use themselves too nicely, for then hardships, when they come, will be doubly hard, Deut. xxviii. 56."]

9. Ver. 6. "As the grace afforded us in the manifestation of the word of God is greater than that given to the inhabitants of Sodom, so is our impenitence more heinous, and severer punishment on that account is to be expected. So Christ clearly shows in Matt. xi. 20-24. Verily! we should not despise this thunder-clap; for it certainly applies to us, who are richly endowed with the gospel, but do not walk consistently with it or worthily of it, but its daily invitations, inducements, and warnings are given to the wind; thus, as the Prophet Jeremiah here says, The iniquity of my people is greater than the sin of Sodom, that was suddenly overthrown." EGIN. HUNNIUS. "The sin of the people called of God is always the greatest, because it has most abused the revelation of God. Therefore is its punishment also worse than that of Sodom, which was suddenly destroyed, without suffering long torments from barbarous enemies. God often chastises us here longer than He does the heathen; but He does it to spare us the punishment which is eternal." DIEDRICH.

10. Ver. 6. "We are admonished here, that as there is disparity of punishments, so is there disparity [in the heinousness] of sins. Hence the paradox of the Stoics, who esteemed all sins equal, is shown to be false." FÖRSTER. "The iniquity of the Jewish people was rendered greater than the sin of the inhabitants of Sodom, because the latter transgressed only the law of nature, while the former transgressed both natural and written law." RHABANUS in Ghiesler, p. 185.

11. Vers. 7, 8. This is an instructive example of the perishable and transient nature of all merely earthly splendor. What is there in all the beauty, wealth, and pomp of the young noblemen and their wives and daughters! Can there be a finer picture of the aristocrat's condition than we read here in the seventh verse? Is not the difference between the common race of man and the nobly bred placed here before our eyes in the distinctest manner? Yet, it is seen from ver. 8, that if our Lord God has only hung the bread-basket above their reach, the bodies of princes make no better show than those of burghers and peasants. From which we learn that there is no essential difference between them.

12. Ver. 7. "Kings and Princes, their courts and courtiers appear, now-a-days, just the same as they were long ago portrayed in David's Psalms, in the Ecclesiastes and Proverbs of Solomon, and in the Wisdom of Sirach. What we say of them now in German, Latin, or French, is just what was said long ago in Hebrew or Syriac." DOCTOR LEIDEMIT, p. 43.

13. Ver. 9. "Four principal judgments are especially enumerated by the Prophet Ezekiel in his fourteenth chapter; namely, War, Famine, Pestilence, and Wild-beasts. Of these, Famine is by no means the least, but by far the greatest and most severe, so that here, in the Lamentations, it is said, That it may have been better for those killed by the sword than for those who perished through hunger. But this is not meant of hunger that happens by chance, or is the result of natural causes alone, but we must regard scarcity and starvation as God's rod (Deut. xxviii. 23, 24)." EGID. HUNNIUS.

14. Ver. 10. If mothers cooked their children, this was an unnatural crime, only to be explained as the effects of blind madness. But had not Israel also, against its better nature, forgotten the Heavenly Father (Is. i. 2-4)? [HENRY: "This horrid effect of long sieges had been threatened in general, Lev. xxvii. 29; Deut. xxviii. 53, and particularly against Jerusalem, in the siege of the Chaldeans, Jer. xix. 9; Ez. v. 10. I know not whether to make it an instance of the power of necessity, or of iniquity; but as the Gentile idolaters were justly given up to vile affections, Rom. i. 26, so these Jewish idolaters, and the women particularly, who had made cakes to the queen of Heaven, and taught their children to do so too, were stript of natural affection, and that to their own children. Being thus left to dishonor their own nature, was a righteous judgment on them for the dishonor they had done to God."]

15. Ver. 11. "The Lord accomplished His fury upon Jerusalem, when her wickedness was full, just as the sins of the Amorites were, when they were destroyed (Gen. xv. 16). He did, indeed, pour out (effudit) the fire of His indignation, but it was only when she (Jerusalem) had abandoned herself (se diffudit) to the commission of all sorts of vices and crimes; and He devoured her foundations, when she had refused to accept the foundation, which is Christ. Truly she rejected Him, the precious, square stone, laid at the foundation of our whole structure: Who, when He saw this same unhappy Jerusalem, wept over her, saying, that in her not one stone should be left upon another (Matt. xxiv. 2)." PASCHASIUS in Ghisler., p. 192.

16. Ver. 11. [CALVIN: PRAYER. "Grant, Almighty God, that as Thou showest by Thy Prophet that, after having long borne with Thine ancient people, Thy wrath at length did so far burn as to render that judgment above all others remarkable,—O grant that we may not, at this day, by our obstinacy or by our sloth, provoke Thy wrath, but be attentive to Thy threatenings, yea, and obey Thy paternal invitations, and so willingly devote ourselves to Thy service, that as Thou hast hitherto favored us with Thy blessings, so Thou mayest perpetuate them, until we shall at length enjoy the fulness of all good things in Thy celestial kingdom, through Christ our Lord. Amen."]

17. Ver. 12. "The Holy Ghost here teaches us that there is on earth no city so secure, no kingdom so powerful, no stronghold so impregnable, that it may not be destroyed by sins and unrighteousness (as by the strongest battering-rams, CRAMER). On that account, to trust in strongholds is idle, and is rebuked and condemned by the Holy Ghost." EGID. HUNNIUS. "The heathen princes themselves had not before this believed that such a calamity could happen to Jerusalem, for they regarded it with a certain feeling of awe, because they had an inward testimony that the true God had prepared there a place for His manifestation." DIEDRICH.

18. Ver. 13. "The Holy Spirit further teaches us here what a corrupt condition ensues in the whole spiritual theocracy, when those quit the right path of the only true, genuine service of God, who should most of all keep to it, namely, the teachers among the people, who should be to them those whose lips should preserve instruction, and out of their mouth should be sought the law of the Lord of Sabaoth. When they let God's word and pure instruction slip, the people are well-nigh done for. Then follow all the preposterous things which Jeremiah here indicates by the mention of false Prophets and bloody-minded Priests." EGID. HUNNIUS. [CALVIN: "This passage teaches us that Satan has from the beginning polluted the sanctuary of God, by means even of sacred names; for the prophetic office was honorable—so also was the sacerdotal. God had established among His people the priesthood, which was, as it were, a living image of Christ: there was then nothing more excellent than the priesthood under the Law, if we regard the institution of God. It was also a singular blessing that God promised that His people should never be without Prophets. As then Prophets and Priests were two eyes, as it were, in the Church, the devil turned them to every kind of profanation. This example then reminds us how much we ought to watch, lest empty titles deceive us, which are nothing but masks or spectres [phantoms]. When we hear the name of Church and pastors, we ought reverently to regard the office as well as the order which has proceeded from God, provided we are not content with naked titles, but examine whether the reality also corresponds. Thus, we see that the whole world has, for many ages, degenerated from true religion; under what pretext? even this,—that those who led astray miserable souls boasted that they were the vicars of Christ, the successors of the apostles, so that they still arrogantly boast of these titles, and are inflated with them. But we see what happened in the time of Jeremiah. . . . Prophets and Priests had destroyed the very Church of God."—WORDSWORTH: "This sin of the Priests and Prophets of Jerusalem, who conspired against Jeremiah, and slew other servants of God, reached its height when they murdered the Just One; see the words of Christ, Matt. xxiii. 31, 37; and of the first martyr, Acts vii. 52; and of St. Paul, 1 Thes. ii. 15; and those of James the Just, who himself was murdered by them at Jerusalem, Jam. v. 6."]

19. Ver. 13—15. "Thence follows the most pernicious corruption, and from that again the persecution of the really true doctrine and of its faithful followers and servants. . . . This is always the way and character ecclesie malignantium, that is to say, of the congregation and faction of malicious hypocrites, inquisitors and conspirators, that they, from perverted love for their preconceived error and prejudice, are excited and inflamed by instigation of the evil spirit with such bitter hatred against pure doctrine and its faithful defenders, that they begin to maintain their error with fist and sword, and to persecute the churches of God, and thus sprinkle themselves with the blood of the righteous, to shed which they incite others, and give them counsel and help thereto. . . . Further, as those priests, in Jeremiah's time, covered over and adorned all their falsehoods and tyranny with the pretence of the succession and of the titles and names of the church, on which account they cried out against Jeremiah, Templum Dei, Templum Dei, 'here is the Temple of the Lord, here is the temple of the Lord, here is the Temple of the Lord' Jer. vii. 4; and, again, Jer. xviii. 18, 'Come, let us devise devices against Jeremiah; for the law shall not perish from the priest, nor counsel from the wise, nor the word from the Prophet;' so in our day, the constant everlasting cry, with the Pope and his crowd, that they shout against us, is—Church, Church, Church! The Pope cannot err in the faith and articles of religion, for he is a successor of St. Peter, and sits in his chair. Yet the church of God is not so bound to the external succession or order but that those, who certainly were in the orderly external succession of the Levitical priesthood, established by God Himself, in Jeremiah's time, and also in Christ's, wandered far, far away from the truth, and those who sat in Moses' seat, namely the Scribes and Pharisees, became the bitterest enemies of our Lord Jesus Christ and of His chosen, holy church (Matt. xxiii.). What then may not happen in the case of the Pope, who can, without difficulty, prove that God in the New Testament proposes to have a Pope who shall exalt himself over all, but in fact, through St. Paul, has designated such a Primate of the Papacy as an unfailing sign of the Antichrist? (2 Thess. ii. 8, 4)." Egid. HUNNIUS.

20. Vers. 13, 14. "Such to-day are the sanguinary priests of Rome, and especially the Jesuits, who wish to be esteemed priests κατ' ἐξοχήν. . . . Hence those famous emblems of theirs (Jesuitæ in Censura Coloniensi, Fol. 136): 'If LUTHER had been removed before his fortieth year by fire or sword, or if others were removed from the midst of us, the whole world would not be confounded by such abominable dissensions.' In accordance with these sentiments are those of Andrew Fabricius Leodius, Counsellor of the Princes of Bavaria, in his Preface to the Harmony of Augustine's Confessions, 'Let our most mighty emperor gird his sword upon his thigh, and subdue these heretics, the most pernicious enemies of the Christian name. The shedding of Lutheran blood is useful, for by that means the members are preserved entire.'" FÖRSTER.

21. Vers. 13, 14. "When God has in view the purification and reformation of an ecclesiastical constitution, dependence is, least of all, to be placed on Theologians by profession, and their assistance and support, or even only their comprehension and assent. When the economy of the Old Testament came to an end, the Priests and Scribes were the bitterest enemies and persecutors of Jesus and His doctrine, the stupidest in the whole world to understand the Scriptures which testified of Him. HUSS and other witnesses for the Truth, were adjudged to the funeral-pile, not by the laity, but by their own colleges and professional associates. How was it in this respect in LUTHER's time? The Princes and laity were always more just, more tolerant, more easily convinced of the truth, more prepossessed in its favor, than the Bishops, the Scholars and the clergy generally." Doctor LEIDEMIT, p. 44.

22. Ver. 15. [HENRY: "They upbraided the corrupt Priests and Prophets, with their pretended purity, while they lived in all manner of real iniquity. You were so precise, you would not touch a Gentile, but cried, Depart, depart, stand by thyself, I am holier than thou, Is. lxxv. 5. Thus the prosecutors of Christ would not go into the judgment-hall, lest they should be defiled. But can you now keep the Gentiles from touching you, when God has delivered you into their hands? When you fly away and wander, . . . these serpents will not be charmed or enchanted . . . no, they will not respect the persons of the priests, nor favor the elders."—SCOTT: "The wickedness of those who are by office engaged to support religion, and yet betray her interests, is the great cause of national judgments, and of the ruin of flourishing churches: especially when they have shed the blood of the just in the midst of them. They who have thus polluted their garments, have commonly been recompensed in the same way; and rendered an execration even to the vilest of mankind."]

23. Ver. 17. "Hence appears the truth of David's apothegms in Ps. cxviii. 8, 9; cxlvi. 3, 4; with which accords Jer. xvii. 5; as well as the Son of Sirach, vi. 7-9, where, on the margin, LUTHER wrote these beautiful rhymes,

Freunde in der Noth
Gehen 25 auf ein Loth.
Sollt's ein harter Stand sein, Gehen 50 auf ein Quintlein." FÖRSTER.

"Pious people should, according to this, avoid putting their trust in men, as a great sin and a species of idolatry, and all the more because all such trust in men leads us into danger, finally disappoints us and covers us with shame. For men either wish not to help us, or when they are willing they cannot, or when they promise it, they do not keep their promise, for their very nature is vanity. Hence David takes occasion to dissuade us from trusting in men or gazing after them, when he says in Ps. lxiii., Men are only vanity; men of high degree are wanting, they weigh less than nothing, whatever they may be." Egid. HUNNIUS.

24. Ver. 18. "Here occurs a proof text concerning the fatal end and period of affairs, which is decreed, as our text bears witness, to cities and nations,—nay to all things in the universe (Eccl. iii., Sir. xiv. 20), but above all to individual men (Job xiv., Ps. cxxxix. 16). That end depends indeed on the foreknowledge of God, but not simply and absolutely on that foreknowledge, but as that foreknowledge is directed with regard to second causes, especially with reference to piety and impiety, as is attested both by the promises of God, such as that added to the fourth [fifth] commandment (Eph. vi. 2, 3), and by His threatenings, Ps. lv. 24 (23). Hence it appears, that the end of human life is not so definitely ordained as by fate, because it can be prolonged by the practice of piety, and shortened by the practice of impiety." FÖRSTER.

25. Ver. 19. [CALVIN: "When the hand of God is against us, we in vain look around in all directions, for there will be no safety for us on mountains, nor will solitude protect us in the desert. As, then, we see that the Jews were closed up by God's hand, so when we contend with Him, we in vain turn our eyes here and there; for, however, we may for a time entertain good hopes, yet God will surely at last disappoint us."]

26. Ver. 20. In the Sept. the verse reads: The Spirit of our countenance, Christ the Lord was taken in their destruction (συνελήσθη ἐν ταῖς διαφθοραῖς), of whom we said, In his shadow will we dwell among the nations. JEROME translates, The Spirit of our mouth, Christ the Lord, was taken in our sins, to whom we said, In thy shadow will we dwell among the nations. It is, therefore, not to be wondered at that this passage was regarded by the ancients generally as one of the most decided Messianic prophecies. "This text," says GHISLER., "was very frequently quoted by the early Fathers, and was interpreted by their common consent of Christ the Son of God." A collection of the various patristical expositions may be found in GHISLER. They make chiefly a threefold use of the text. 1. TERTULLIAN proves from it against PRAXEAS (cap. 14), that the Father could in no sense have been a facies [form or manifestation] of the Son, but, on the contrary, the Son was a facies [manifestation] of the Father. 2. They recognize in this passage a clear prediction of the sufferings of Christ. Thus, for example, THEODORET says, "Let the Jews say, Whom does the word of prophecy call Christ? Who of those called Christs by them, whether king, or prophet, or priest, has been named Lord (κύριος)? But they could not point to such an instance, although they made use of much falsehood. It is evident, therefore, that the Prophet foretold as the Saviour and our Lord (κύριον), Him who has been taken by them through the destruction of their impiety." [THEODORET adapts his language to that of the Septuagint (see above), συλληφθέντα παρ' αὐτῶν διὰ τὴν τῆς ἀσεβείας αὐτῶν διαφθοράν.—W. H. H.] 3. But they find also the calling of the Gentiles predicted in this text. ORIGEN, particularly, says this (Hom. on Cant. ii. 3) with reference to Luke i. 35, "If, therefore, the overshadowing of the Most High attended the conception of His (Christ's) body, it is reasonable that His shadow shall give life to the Gentiles."

27. Ver. 20. "The question arises, how could these titles (Messiah, breath of the people's nostrils, shadow), apply to the wicked king Zedekiah? They apply to him, not by reason of his personal character, but 1st, by reason of his office, which ought to have been, and was expected by the Hebrews to be what these titles import. 2d. By reason of the Antitype, of whom David, with his posterity, in his kingly office was a type. But who is this Antitype? Our Lord Jesus Christ, the son of David according to the flesh (2 Tim. ii., Rom. i.), that anointed one of the Lord (Luke

ii. 26), whose breath is in His nostrils (Is. ii. 22), and who is our shadow against the heat of God's wrath (Is. xxv. 4), and to whom the Lord God gave the throne of His Father David (Luke i. 32, 33). Magistrates are here admonished both of the authority and the functions of their office. They, too, can be called by that name of authority—the anointed of the Lord. And the functions of their office are, that they may be, by their counsel and efficient aid, the breath of the nostrils,—and such a shadow as that prefigured in the tree in Dan. iv. 7-9 (10-12)." FÖRSTER.

28. Ver. 21. "Here is a proof-text concerning ἐπιχειρεκακίᾳ, rejoicing in the misfortunes of others, from which crime Christians, of all men, should be furthest removed. For those who delight in the misfortunes of others, stripped of all humanity, no longer imitate the tastes and dispositions of mankind, but those of the devil." FÖRSTER.—CUP. FÖRSTER remarks here that the figure of a cup is used metaphorically in three ways. 1. Cup denotes the misfortune of the righteous as well as that of the ungodly, Ps. lxxv. 2. It denotes the good or bad fortune of the righteous, Ps. cxvi.; Matt. xx. 22; xxiii. 39, 42; Mark x. 38; John xviii. 11. 3. It denotes the misfortune of the ungodly, Is. li. 17, 22; Jer. xxv. 15; Lam. iv. 21; Ez. xxiii. 31; Hab. ii. 16; Rev. xiv. 10; xvi. 19.

29. Ver. 21. "We learn from this that God has filled their certain measure of trouble for all men, and He lets the cup pass round and no one is overlooked, as it is written in Ps. lxxv., The Lord has a cup in His hand, and fills it full of strong wine, and pours out from the same, but the ungodly must drink up the dregs. That is, the pious must also drink of the cup of wormwood, sorrow and pain. But Christ has presented for them the foretasted cup of such a bitter, sour potion, and with the wood of His cross has made sweet and tolerable for His own to drink the bitter waters of Mara, as is beautifully and figuratively represented in Ez. xv. 23-25. But the ungodly must at last taste the lees and dregs of God's wrath, which potion constitutes their final and utter ruin." EGID HENNIS.

30. Ver. 22. He will no more carry thee away into captivity. "Here it is, indeed, averred, that the Lord would not after this again cause the people to remove from the land, which certainly seems to conflict with the prolonged exile which the Jews at this day are enduring. But the answer is easy and obvious, from the rule commonly accepted by Theologians: All God's promises are to be understood as having the condition of penitence annexed to them." FÖRSTER.

31. Vers. 21-22. "Zion's punishment will sometime have an end, because God in spite of all His judgments upon His people, will yet fulfil His kingdom; the punishment of Eloum, on the contrary, and of all maliciously disposed worldly powers, is eternal and without hope. Heathendom, as such, cannot be regenerated, notwithstanding all God's judgments; it can only perish, because it has not God's word. But the greater is God's punishment of His people, the more sure is His plan for their salvation. That same Christ, who said, 'Father, if it be possible, let this cup pass from Me,' and sweat blood, yet most certainly was and continued of His own accord and by His own act in the bitterest agony of death and in the deepest humiliation, and He has brought to light our eternal victory, for as many of us as abide in faith on His word, however helpless at present we may be in ourselves. Christ is our life and our strength." DIEDRICH.

32. Ver. 22. [CALVIN: PRAYER. "Grant, Almighty God, that as Thou seest that at this day the mouths not only of our enemies, but of Thine also, are open to speak evil,—O grant that no occasion may be given them, especially as their slanders are cast on Thy holy name; but restrain Thou their insolence, and so spare us, that though we deserve to be chastised, Thou mayest yet have regard for Thine own glory, and thus gather us under Christ our Head, and restore Thy scattered Church, until we shall at length be all gathered into that celestial kingdom, which Thine only-begotten Son our Lord has procured for us by His own blood. Amen."]

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

1. Vers. 1-6. The destruction of Jerusalem by the Chaldeans an example of God's great and impartial righteousness. 1. Israel was among the nations, what gold is among the metals and precious stones are among minerals, vers. 1, 2. 2. But the sin of Israel was greater than the sin of Sodom, ver. 6. 3. Therefore the punishment of Israel was severer than that of Sodom, vers. 3-5.

2. Vers. 7-11. The relation of spiritual hunger to physical. 1. The relation as it should be. a. Both are sanctioned, Matt. vi. 11, 32; 1 Tim. vi. 8. b. But spiritual exigency should have the preference, Matt. vi. 33; iv. 4; xvi. 5-12; Jno. vi. 27, 32-35. 2. The relation as it should not be, Luke xvi. 19-31. 3. The consequences of the perversion of the right relation. a. With regard to physical hunger, Lam. iv. 7-11. b. With regard to spiritual hunger, Amos, viii. 11, 12; Rev. ii. 5.

3. Vers. 12-16. The warning, which John Baptist gave to the Jews, Begin not to say within yourselves, We have Abraham to our Father (Luke iii. 8), concerns all persons and communities, in this day, who believe that they are assured of their Divine vocation. How well grounded this warning was, could be shown at that time by a reference to the first destruction of Jerusalem. Let us avail ourselves of the same fact in order to impress the solemn truth, that no Divine vocation can save us from eventual destruction. For, 1. Israel's vocation was (a) attested by the promises given to the Patriarchs; (b), confirmed by many proofs of actual Divine interposition in their behalf; (c), recognised even by the heathen. 2. This vocation was not unconditional, as carnal Israel imagined. 3. The non-fulfilment of the conditions, for which the Priests and Prophets were chiefly guilty, ensured as a consequence the judgment of the first destruction. Conclusion: What befell Israel, the natural olive tree, may much more readily befall that which is only an engrafted branch (Rom. xi. 12) of the same.

4. Vers. 12-16. The great responsibility of those possessed of spiritual authority. 1. The duty is imposed upon them, of directing the people by word and example to keep the conditions on which the Divine promises have been given. 2. To them belongs the guilt, if by their neglect, the people find the curse instead of the blessing.

5. Vers. 17-19. Human help is useless. For, 1. It, is by itself, impotent. 2. Those who depend upon it, (a), experience the pain of disappointed expectation; (b), they come to a terrible end.

6. Ver. 20. The reciprocal duties of rulers and subjects. 1. The duties which subjects owe to their rulers. It is to be observed, that the Prophet, "in this text confers an honorable title on the ungodly king Zedekiah, that he calls him the Anointed of the Lord, and here a beautiful lesson is taught us, with what respect we should regard and speak of our superiors and rulers, and honor in them the office, which God has conferred upon them, even if in personal character they are wicked and ungodly." 2. The duties which rulers owe to their subjects. Let them remember that their "office, in the words of the Prophet, should be, next to God and under God, a refuge under whose shadow their poor subjects may live." EGD. HUNNIUS

7. Vers. 21, 22. The reciprocal relation of those who suffer and those who take pleasure in the sufferings of others. 1. That one, who first has suffering, will afterwards have joy, if he bear his suffering in the right way. 2. That one, who first has malicious pleasure in the sufferings of others, will at last have sufferings himself, (a), because he has calumniated God by the presumption that He was not influenced by love in His punishments; (b), because he has been destitute of love to his neighbor and thereby has provoked against himself the sentence of retaliation (Mark iv. 24).

8. Ver. 22. [HENRY: "1. An end shall be put to Zion's troubles. The punishment of thine iniquity is accomplished, O daughter of Zion. The troubles of God's people shall be continued no longer, than till they have done the work for which they were sent. 2. An end shall be put to Edom's triumphs. He will visit thine iniquity, O daughter of Edom. It is spoken ironically in ver. 21, Rejoice and be glad, O daughter of Edom. This is a good reason why we should not insult over any who are in misery, because we ourselves also are in the body. But those who please themselves in the calamities of God's church, must expect to have their doom, as aiders and abettors, with them that are instrumental in those calamities. Sooner or later, sin will be visited and discovered."]

CHAPTER V.

DISTRESS AND HOPE OF THE PRISONERS AND FUGITIVES: [EXPRESSED IN THE FORM OF A PRAYER;
OR, E. V., A PITIFUL COMPLAINT OF ZION IN PRAYER UNTO GOD.—W. H. H.]

- VER. 1. Remember, Jehovah, what has come upon us!
Look down and see our reproach.
- VER. 2. Our inheritance has fallen to strangers,
Our houses to aliens.
- VER. 3. We have become orphans, without father,
Our mothers—as widows.
- VER. 4. Our water we have drunk for money,
Our wood comes for a price.
- VER. 5. On our necks we have been pursued;
We have been weary,—there was no rest for us.
- VER. 6. Towards Egypt have we stretched the hand,— Towards Assyria,—to be satisfied with bread.
- VER. 7. Our fathers sinned. They are no more;
We have borne their iniquities.
- VER. 8. Servants have ruled over us:
There was none to deliver from their hand.
- VER. 9. At the peril of our lives we get our bread,
Because of the sword of the desert.
- VER. 10. Our skin has been parched as an oven,
Because of the ragings of hunger.
- VER. 11. Women in Zion have been humbled,— Virgins—in the cities of Judah.
- VER. 12. Princes have been hung up by the hand:
The persons of Elders have not been honored.
- VER. 13. Young men have carried mill-stones;
And boys have fallen under [burdens of] wood.
- VER. 14. Elders have forsaken the gate,—
Young men—their music.
- VER. 15. Ceased has the joy of our heart;
Our dance has been changed to mourning.
- VER. 16. The crown has fallen from our head.
Woe unto us! for we have sinned.
- VER. 17. For this our heart has become faint;
For these things our eyes have become dim.
- VER. 18. As to Mount Zion, which has become desolate,
The foxes have walked upon it!
- VER. 19. But Thou, Jehovah, reignest forever;
Thy throne is from generation to generation.
- VER. 20. Wherefore should'st Thou always forget us,
And abandon us for length of days?
- VER. 21. Turn us, Jehovah, unto Thee, and we shall turn; Renew our days as of old;—
- VER. 22. If Thou hast not utterly rejected us,
And art wroth against us exceedingly!

ANALYSIS.

The subject is chiefly composed of the particular incidents of those grievous days which followed the capture of Jerusalem. The Poet lets the people speak, yet not as an ideal female person, but in the first person plural as a concrete multitude. The Song is divided into an introduction, ver. 1, two principal parts, vers. 2-7, 8-16, and a conclusion, vers. 17-22. In the introduction, ver. 1, the Lord is entreated to regard the sorrows that had befallen Zion [the people]. In the following two principal parts, vers. 2-13, these sorrows are described in detail. The first part embraces vers. 2-7. All their property, fixed and movable, is seized by the enemy, ver. 2; families are scattered, fathers have disappeared, mothers are as widows, ver. 3; the captives receive no subsistence, they must buy what they need, though as the product of their own land it is really their own property, ver. 4; on the march to Babylon, they are driven beyond their strength, and no rest is allowed them, ver. 5. Besides all this, the whole people do not even remain together. Whilst one party is compelled to throw itself into the arms of the Egyptians, another party belongs to Assyria; both are in such straits as to rejoice if able only to prolong their lives, ver. 6. But this great misfortune is caused by the sins of the fathers, the consequences of which now their posterity have to bear, ver. 7. The second principal part embraces vers. 8-16. Whilst those forced to Babylon groan under the rods of the rough servants, who are their drivers, ver. 8, those who wander to Egypt, must seek for subsistence amidst constant danger from the robbers of the desert, ver. 9: both parties suffer the consuming pangs of hunger, ver. 10. To this is now added a recital, partly the recollection of what had already been endured, partly an exhibition of what they still experienced, of the sufferings from which no class of the population was exempted: women have been dishonored, ver. 11; noble princes hung up or outrageously ill-treated, ver. 12; young men compelled to carry heavy hand-mills, and boys loads of wood, ver. 13. Sitting in the gate—the delight and glory of old men, and playing on stringed instruments—the pleasure of young men, have come to an end, ver. 14. In general, among all classes, deep mourning has succeeded to pleasure and joy, ver. 15. The crown of glory has fallen from the head of Zion, and, verily, those who suffer this, are obliged to acknowledge, that it has happened, not merely because their fathers had sinned (ver. 7), but because they themselves have sinned, ver. 16. The conclusion contains a prayer, to which vers. 17, 18 are introductory. In these verses it is declared, that all the affliction of the Israelites culminates in the destruction of the Sanctuary. But this thought suggests the encouragement, which the Poet now presents in his prayer; although the external Sanctuary is destroyed, Thou Thyself, O Lord, remainest for ever, ver. 19. Wherefore shouldest Thou forget and forsake Thy people for ever? ver. 20. Lead us back to Thyself, that we may be again what we have been in former times, ver. 21. This will be done, for it is not to be supposed, that Thou canst have utterly rejected us, ver. 22. [Ver. 1, introductory; vers. 2-10, descriptive of general suffering from oppression and want of necessities of life; vers. 11-13, instances of individual suffering; vers. 14-18, effect on the feelings and sentiments of the people; vers. 19-22, the prayer.—W. H. H.]

PRELIMINARY NOTE ON CH. V.

This chapter is not acrostic. Yet it is evident from the agreement of the number of the verses with the number of the letters of the alphabet, that the chapter should be regarded as belonging to the four preceding ones as a member of the same family. The acrostic is wanting, because the contents are in prose. The Poet would make apparent, even in the external form, the decrecendo movement, which we perceive from the third chapter onward. Were there not 22 verses, this chapter might be regarded as an entirely disconnected supplement. But the number of verses is a vinculum, that in a way even externally observable, unites this prosaic chapter with the preceding poetical ones.

[Various reasons may be given for the absence of the acrostic in this chapter.* 1. There may be something in the notion that the alphabetical structure was not allowed to embarrass freedom of thought and expression in prayer (GERLACH, ADAM CLARKE). 2. We may suppose the writer felt less need of the artificial restraint in controlling his feelings and restricting their expression. It is not true that this Song "is of less impassioned character" than the others, as WORDSWORTH says, but it is true, as he further says, that "the writer, being less agitated by emotions, and having tranquillized himself by the utterance of his sorrow, and by meditations on the attributes of God, did not need the help of that artificial appliance to support and control him." Besides, new restraints are imposed upon the writer in this Song, which more than supply any assistance derived from the alphabetical curb in the preceding songs. The verses are reduced from three and two members each, to a single member, and this not only balanced by a cesura or pause as in the other songs, but composed of corresponding parallelisms of ideas and expressions. To have added, to the production of these distinct and emphatic parallelisms, the difficulties of the acrostic, could have served no useful or artistic purpose. 3. In the last fact referred to, the introduction of parallelisms of thought and sentiment, may be found the most satisfactory reason for the absence of the acrostic. As long as the parallelisms were merely rhythmical, as in the first four songs, the alphabetical index served a good purpose in rounding off and defining the successive verses. Now it is no longer needed. We find here then an argument in favor of the theory advanced, in Additional Remarks to the Introduction, p. 23, in reference to the relation of the Acrostic to rhythmical parallelisms.

Is this chapter poetry or prose? Dr. НАБОКОВ-БАХ says, "the acrostic is wanting because the contents are in prose."* He certainly cannot mean that the chapter is prose, because the

* [The opinion of BEAUFORT, that the Prophet "either had no more time to spend in the troublesome choice of initial words, or that he grew tired of this trifling process and deliberately relinquished it," (quoted by GERLACH in his Intr. p. x.), is sufficiently refuted, not only by its own irreverence, but by what has been said in reference to the acrostic in Additional Remarks to Intr. pp. 23, 24.—W. H. H.]

* [We cannot misunderstand our author, for besides speaking of this as a "prosaic chapter" and comparing it with the preceding "poetical chapters" (see also Intr. pp. 3, 4, 5), he puts his new translation into good German prose—while he has given us most beautiful metrical translations of the other four chapters.—W. H. H.]

acrostic is wanting; and yet unless he implies this, he has not even suggested a reason for this most extraordinary assertion. This chapter has poetical characteristics, that the preceding chapters do not possess; besides having all that they do possess, except the acrostic, which in itself is unpoetical. 1. It has that unfailing mark of Hebrew poetry, of which the preceding chapters are nearly destitute, parallelisms of thought, one half the verse exactly and beautifully corresponding in its sentiment and form of construction to the preceding half, and successive verses connected by underlying analogies, comparisons, or relations, such as parallelisms involve. 2. The language is so unmistakably rhythmical as to be almost metrical. The first line of each verse never consists of more than four words, nor of less than three, counting compound words as one. The second line never consists of more than three words (unless in two instances, where מָל ver. 12, and וְ or מִן ver. 16, may be joined to the word following them), and if it have two words only, those two are in that case invariably long words. In this song, if anywhere in Hebrew poetry, we can detect evidences of such metrical feet as the Hebrew language was capable of. 3. There is throughout the Song such assonance as cannot be accidental, and could only be allowed in poetry. The Song is full of rhymes. This may not justify us in calling it a "strictly rhymed Song" (as does BELLERMAN, Metr. d. Hebr., S. 220, quoted by GERLACH), but it is certainly a result of the evident regard to assonance in the choice of words. Thus in this Song that is composed of only 44 short lines, א occurs 55 times, and 44 times as final letter of words; ב occurs 21 times as final letter of words: out of the 184 words the Song contains, 65, or only 2 less than one half, end in either א or ב. 24, or more than half of the lines, end with א, 17 end with ב, 9 end with ג. In 9 verses (1, 2, 4, 5, 11, 12, 15, 16, 17) both lines end with the same letter (or letters) and vowel point. 28 lines end with the same letter that terminates one (or both) of the lines of the verse immediately preceding or following. Other evidences of a studied assonance are apparent: such as אָכַל, אָכַלְתָּ, as terminations of ver. 3; אֶצִּיץ, אֶצִּיץְךָ, first words in the lines of ver. 4; אֶפְרַיִם as first word in second lines of verses 9, 10, making a parallelism in sound as well as in sense; שָׁכַחְתָּ, שָׁכַחְתָּ, in near relation and parallelism, vers. 14, 15, and possibly an equivalent for failure of rhyme in ver. 14; אָנֹכִי, as last word in first lines of vers. 15, 17; etc. So obvious is the prevailing paronomasia in this Song, that the remark has been made, that the Song appears like 'the effort of a youth playing with words' (quoted by GERLACH). To the slur contained in this remark, it may be replied, that no unskilled youth, even if capable of choosing his words so artfully, could have arranged them so as to give both harmony and sense, and thus produce a poem equal in fervor, force and beauty to this. But the fact that such an insult could be offered to this Song, proves that it is written in a style only adopted in poetry. 4. In spirit as well as in form, this chapter is poetry, and that of the highest order. There is nothing prosaic about it, not even in the recital of hard facts and detailed incidents. As the Song proceeds the lyre is tuned to higher chords than even inspired minstrels often reach, and vers. 14-19, are so exquisitely beautiful that we cannot imagine anything to excel them in all the Songs of Heaven and earth. I cannot repress the expression of these sentiments and be a silent instrument in giving to American readers, this strange opinion of an eminent man, that this chapter is a bit of prose writing, tacked on to a splendid poem, by the poor expedient of its containing twenty-two verses (though it is something new to write prose in verses). Were I more diffident of my own judgment, I might take refuge under the shadow of DEAN MILMAN, who in culling from the Lamentations what he regards as specimens of "the deepest pathos of poetry," gives us a metrical translation of nearly the whole of the 5th chapter (14 out of the 22 verses), while he selects only three verses from chap. i., eight verses from chap. ii., three verses from chap. iv., and none from chap. iii. It is to be inferred that in his judgment, the fifth Song excels in its poetry the four Songs that precede it. I agree with him.

That the only connection of this chapter with the preceding four chapters is found in the corresponding number of its verses, without which it might be regarded as a supplement to those chapters, but not as an integral part of the Poem, is an opinion that will not sustain examination. 1. It is, as we have seen, lyrical in its structure, and thus assimilated to the preceding Songs. 2. The Poem could not end with the fourth chapter. Such an ending were too painfully abrupt. Even as it is, the burden of Edom seems to be intruded at that place, and we only comprehend it, when we know that it was Jeremiah's habit to represent the security of the church of God, by depicting the destruction of its enemies. But to end the Poem with that threat against Edom, would seem to be impossible. Something more is needed, and that something is just what we have in the prayer of chap. v. 3. The only way to account for the omission of the usual prayer (see i., ii., iii.) at the end of the 4th Song, is by the fact that its omission was to be more than supplied by the 5th Song. Here is the groove into which the fifth Song is dovetailed so securely, that we cannot break the connection, without marring the harmony and completeness of the whole poem. 4. The structure of this last Song, gives the last needed touch to the manifest unity of the whole poem. The preceding chapters may be regarded as composing a poem not unlike the modern ode, in which great liberties in the versification are allowed. But the Ode, complete in its main parts, is wound up at last with a Hymn of prayer to God, constructed according to the strictest rules of lyrical poetry, metrical and harmonious, and forming an apt conclusion because it recites all that has been before said, briefly and forcibly,—sums up, as it were, the whole case, and leaves it in the hands of God. Finally DR. NÄGELSBACH's beautiful fiction of a crecendo and a decrecendo movement, does not need the flattening out of the Poem into a piece of prose writing, attached to what precedes only by the number of its verses. It is enough that the decrecendo movement, in the music of the Poem, is arrested at the close, and the Poet's most plaintive lyre pours forth a final strain of impassioned, yet melting and delicious harmony.—W. H. H.]

V. 1.

1 Remember, O LORD, what is come upon us: consider and behold our reproach.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 1.—זָכֹר. See Is. xxxviii. 3; Mic. vi. 5; Job iv. 7.—הִנֵּה. See i. 11. [BLAYNEY: "Forty-one MSS. and four Editions read with the Masora הִנֵּה, with the ה paragogic." HENDERSON: "The ה thus added to the Imperative, expresses the emotion of ardent desire on the part of the speaker."—חַרְפָּתֵנוּ. See iii. 30; Ps. lxxiv. 22; lxxxix. 51.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Ver. 1. Remember, O LORD, what is come upon us,—Remember, Jehovah, what has befallen us,—consider and behold—look and see—our reproach.—[The word translated consider (see i. 11), when followed by רָאָה, to see, means to direct attention to a thing in order to see it. BLAYNEY and NOYSE translate, Look down and see—which gives the sense, but the word does not express direction, but the intensity of looking.—W. H. H.] This first verse constitutes the introduction. It contains the prayer, that Jehovah would regard the affliction and reproach fallen on Zion [the people], some features of which the Poet recounts in what follows. The Poet presents himself before God, as it were, and all that follows is to be regarded as addressed to God.

V. 2-10.

2, 3 Our inheritance is turned to strangers, our houses to aliens. We are orphans and fatherless, our mothers are as widows. We have drunken our water for money; 5 our wood is sold unto us. Our necks are under persecution: we labour, and have 6 no rest. We have given the hand to the Egyptians, and to the Assyrians, to be 7 satisfied with bread. Our fathers have sinned, and are not: and we have borne 8 their iniquities. Servants have ruled over us: there is none that doth deliver us 9 out of their hand. We gat our bread with the peril of our lives, because of the 10 sword of the wilderness. Our skin was black like an oven, because of the terrible famine.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 2.—נַחֲלָה, frequent in Jeremiah, ii. 7; iii. 19; xii. 7-9, etc.—נִהְיָנוּ, see i. 20; iv. 6. Jeremiah uses in this sense נָכַח, vi. 12. This word represents the transfer of property to another owner, in Is. lx. 5 also.—יָרִים Jeremiah uses frequently, i. 25; iii. 13; v. 19, etc.—נִכְרִים Jeremiah uses only once, in the fem., נִכְרִיָּה, ii. 21.

Ver. 3.—לֹא, Jer. v. 28; vii. 6, etc.: in Lamentations only here.—אֶבֶן. See Is. xlvii. 1; Jer. ii. 32; my Gr. §106, 3. [אֶבֶן—ohne, without, NABEELS. Gr.] The K'ri, אֶבֶן is unnecessary.

Ver. 4.—כִּי־נִמְכַרְנוּ, Jer. vi. 7; xlv. 7; i. 38.—כֶּסֶף, Jer. vi. 30, etc.—עֵצִים, Jer. v. 14; vii. 18, etc.—כִּחְיֵר, Jer. xv. 13.—בְּכֶסֶף. Ewald translates, our wood is sold for silver. He also takes בְּכֶסֶף in the sense of the Latin vineo, vinire. But I do not think that בְּכֶסֶף is ever used in this sense. At the most, only 1 Kings x. 14 could be cited, where the word is used with reference to the revenues.

Ver. 5.—צָדָרָא, see i. 14.—רָדָה, Jer. xix. 18; Lam. i. 6: in the sense of driving, chasing, the word is not elsewhere found in Jeremiah. [It is doubtful if that is its sense here.—W. H. H.]—עָנָה, Jer. xiv. 3, which place is very closely allied in sense to our place here, ii. 68.—הִנֵּחַ. The Hophal is found only here: Jeremiah uses only the Hiphil הִנִּיחַ, xiv. 9; xxvii. 11; xliii. 6.

Ver. 6.—מִצְרַיִם and אֲשׁוּרִי are to be taken as Acc. localis, in answer to the question whither? See my Gr. § 70, b. [There is no necessity of supposing an ellipsis of the preposition ל, as HENDERSON; nor any grammatical reason for translating, O Egypt, O Assyria, as BLAYNEY does, diverting the prayer from God to these heathen nations.—W. H. H.]—שָׁכַנְנוּ, see iii. 30.

Ver. 7.—אֵינָם. Four times in this chapter, the Masorites would read אֵינָם, where it is wanting in the text, vers. 3, 5, 7 twice. But the author generally uses Vav sparingly. Only once is the second clause of the verse begun with \vee . In this verse, an error might arise from its use. If it were וְאֵין , some would be led to understand their non-existence, as the consequence of their sinning. See Jer. x. 20. But this cannot be the author's meaning; for he immediately asserts that the generation now living has to bear the punishment. Their being no longer in existence, therefore, is the simple result of the course of nature.— כָּבֵל Jeremiah never uses. It represents bearing the burden of sin, Is. liii. 4, 11; comp. xvi. 4, 7.— עֵין , see li. 14.

Ver. 8.— נִשְׁלַח , Jer. xxii. 30; xxx. 21, etc.— פָּרַק , see Gen. xxvii. 40; Ps. vii. 3; cxxxvi. 24; Jeremiah never uses the word, neither does it occur again in the Lamentations.

Ver. 9.— נִכְשָׁנִים (נ) pretii, see my Gr., § 112, 5 a). See i. 11; 2 Sam. xxiii. 17; 1 Chron. xi. 19.— הָרִיבָא , see i. 21. [We have the future here, as the historical imperfect, implying the recurrence of what is related.—W. H. H.]— לָחֶם , i. 11.— חֶרֶב הַדְּבָרִים , which can only indicate the robber tribes of the desert (Gen. xvi. 12), is found only here. [CALVIN translates הָרִיבָא drought, and wonders that any one ever thought of calling it sword. It may have the meaning of drought in Deut. xxviii. 22, though even there E. V. has sword. In this verse, all the Versions, and commentators generally, translate sword.—W. H. H.]

Ver. 10.— כָּבֵר occurs only in Niphal, and besides here only in three places, Gen. xliii. 30; 1 Kings iii. 26; Hos. xi. 8. The sense is caufactum, adustum esse (see חָכַר , i. 20; li. 11). The plural shows that עֵינִי is regarded collectively. [It also shows the preference in this Song for termination in י . Yet, "fifty-eight MSS., and the Sonc. Bible read עֵינֵי in the plural" (HENDERSON).—W. H. H.]— עֵינִי , see iv. 8.— הַנֶּגֶד , see Hos. vii. 6, 7, is not found in Jeremiah, [nor any equivalent for it.—W. H. H.]— וְלֵעֵפֹתֵי , ustus vehementer, Jeremiah never uses. It is found, besides here, only in Ps. cxix. 53; xi. 6.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

[Vers. 2-10 describe the distressed condition of the people generally, and especially the sufferings caused by deficiency in the necessities of life. Vers. 2, 8, describe their disinherited and bereaved condition.—W. H. H.]

Ver. 2. Our inheritance is turned to strangers, our houses to aliens—foreigners. [CALVIN: "The land had been promised to Abraham four hundred years, before his children possessed it; we know that this promise had been often repeated, 'This land shall be to you for an inheritance.' . . . No land has ever been given to men in so singular a way as the land of Canaan to the posterity of Abraham. As, then, this inheritance had been for so many ages possessed by the chosen people, Jeremiah does not without reason complain that it was turned over to aliens."—Our houses to aliens. Many expositors (VAHINGER for instance) understand from the second clause of this verse, that not all the houses of Jerusalem had been destroyed, but those which still remained were at the disposal of the Chaldeans; which is the same as saying that they dwelt in them. They appeal to 2 Chron. xxxvi. 19, where the destruction of the palaces only is spoken of. Although in Jer. lii. 13; 2 Kings xxv. 9, it is expressly said that all the houses of Jerusalem were destroyed, yet, they say, this is to be regarded as merely a rhetorical hyperbole, since elsewhere the houses of the great [the nobility] are alone specified. Compare Jer. lii. 13. We have, however, no evidence that the Chaldeans inhabited Jerusalem after its destruction; and Nehemiah (ii. 3) mourns that Jerusalem is חֲרֵבָה , desolate, and its gates burned with fire.

When it is said here that the houses were given up to the Chaldeans, this can only mean that they disposed of them as they pleased. In fact, they destroyed the houses, but carried away the movable property found in them as booty. Although the houses and their contents could be designated as an inheritance, yet by נַחֲלָה , inheritance, which is here distinguished from the houses, the land is especially intended (see Lev. xx. 24; Num. xvi. 14; xxxvi. 7-9; Jos. xiii. 23; etc.). We may say, therefore, that נַחֲלָה , inheritance, and בָּתִּים , houses, are related to each other substantially as fixed and movable property.

Ver. 8. We are orphans and fatherless—we have become orphans, fatherless [without a father, CALVIN, BLAYNEY, BOOTHROYD, NOYES, GEBLACH]—and our mothers are as widows. That the first words cannot be understood exclusively of the loss of their own fathers, is evident from the expression as widows. PAREAU is of the opinion that widows and orphans indicate, in a general way only, as a proverbial formula, tritissimam sortem [a very sad lot], and appeals to Is. i. 17; Ps. xciv. 6; James i. 27. But in all those places, widows and orphans in the strict sense of the terms, are to be understood. TRENTUS understands by the mothers, the wives of the King, who were with the little company among whom our song originated. But even if we allow, that as some of the Princesses of the royal family, according to Jer. xli. 10, escaped transportation, so also may some of the wives of the royal harem, yet we cannot suppose that the Poet indicated these as the mothers of himself and his companions, because they were not, in fact, their mothers, nor was it customary to call them so. EWALD refers orphans and fatherless to the loss of the sovereign (the father of his country, ii. 9; iv. 20) and of the theocracy, but widows to the communities and cities (i. 1). This is without doubt correct, as far as this, that all the Israelites had, in this respect, become fatherless and their mothers widows. But why might not the Poet, at the same time, have alluded to the fact, that in the prevailing confusion most of the mothers could not certainly know whether their husbands were dead or alive, and therefore it could be correctly said of them that they were "as widows" (see i. 1)? I believe, therefore, that ver. 8 embraces every species of orphanage that might have existed at that time. [There were so many orphans and mothers separated from their husbands among the people, that a Poet might well exclaim, Behold in us a people composed of fatherless orphans, whose mothers are as widows! But the particle of comparison attached to the last word, as widows, suggests the probability that the whole verse is intended metaphorically. We are like fatherless orphans and our mothers like widows. This is GERLAOH's explanation.—W. H. H.]

[Vers. 4-10 relate to the general distress occasioned by the want of the necessities of life and the oppression of their masters.—W. H. H.]

Ver. 4. We have drunken our water for money; our wood is sold unto us (marg. cometh for price unto us). Our water we drink for money; our wood comes to us for payment. That the want of water before the capture of the city is not here intended, is evident from the expressions our water, our wood; for the prominence of this idea can only signify that the Jews were obliged to buy from their enemies the wood and water that were rightly their own; but this could have been the case only after the capture of the city. We perceive from the description, that the companies of the captives, in all cases narrowly watched, were not at liberty to go, at their own pleasure, to bring wood and water. But they were furnished, either with no provisions at all, or in insufficient quantities, so that in order to secure the necessities of life, they were obliged to apply to their guards, who made them pay dearly for the services rendered them. It appears further from this passage, that the Poet has here in his eye that period of the captivity when the captives were still in their own land, else he could not say "our water, our wood." There seems to be a rhetorical reason for the use of the perfect (שָׁתִּינוּ) in the first clause, and of the imperfect (נִשְׁמָנוּ) in the second. For, grammatically considered, either the perfect or imperfect should be used both times, since the two acts are entirely homogeneous. But the Poet wished to bring variety into his period, perhaps also to avoid the clashing together of two tone-syllables, which would have happened, if it had been written נִשְׁמָנוּ. He could introduce this variety, since the limit between these two verbal forms is a fluctuating one, determined by the subjective conception of the speaker. For, in many cases, the same action can be regarded as already completed and as still in progress. See for example הִכָּהֵן הָאֵלֹהִים (Jos. ix. 8) and נִשְׁמָנוּ (Gen. xlii. 7), my Gr. §§ 84, 87. So here the drinking of water for money is represented by שָׁתִּינוּ as something accomplished, being constituted by many acts of drinking, but by נִשְׁמָנוּ the fetching of the wood is represented as something not yet finished, something still continuing. We are at liberty to translate both tenses, so far as they are concerned, by the present or by the preterit. The context shows which the Poet intends. He evidently is describing the journey of the captives going into exile. But nothing indicates that he looks back upon it as already accomplished, that he would represent it as already terminated in the land of exile. Consequently, we are obliged to translate all the tenses, which refer to different incidents of the journey, in the present. [There is a studied effort in this Song, as shown in the preliminary note to this chapter, to multiply words ending in י, ו, and we may add in ו.]

In the expressions "Our water," "our wood," the pronoun is added merely, if we may so say, for the sake of the rhyme, or, more correctly, the assonance, just as in ver. 9 he says, "our bread." The writer could legitimately gratify the ear by this expedient, for what they bought and used certainly became their own. It is obvious, therefore, that the meaning of the verse can not turn on the use of the word our. If this had been intended to be emphatic, and to represent the water and the wood as their property before they bought it, then this verse should have immediately followed ver. 2, where the transfer of their property to new owners is represented. Otherwise, the third verse intrudes a new idea between two thoughts that are closely related, the loss of their inheritance and houses, and the necessity of purchasing what had been their own property. If, on the other hand, we take our text as a simple statement of the fact that they were obliged to purchase such common necessities of life as water and wood, we are enabled to translate the preterit verb in the past indefinite time. The Prophet is by no means describing the incidents of the journey of the exiles from their own land. He is enumerating and heaping together en masse the various features of sorrow and suffering experienced by the unhappy people, without particular reference either to the time or place of their happening. Among other things that had happened was their having to pay money for the water they drank: and he uses the preterit tense, We have drunken our water for money,—this is among the things that had happened, perhaps once only, perhaps oftener; but there was another hardship of more frequent occurrence, one often repeated, and that may have continued down to the time when he wrote, and this he expresses, as the Hebrew so constantly expresses the recurrence of events even after they are past, by the future form of the verb, which we may render as an historical imperfect—our wood came to us, or was coming, that is, it came in that way only, for a price, or we may render it as a present—it comes still only for pay.—W. H. H.]

Ver. 5. Our necks are under persecution (marg. On our necks are we persecuted); we labor and have no rest. We are driven headlong [Ueber Hals und Kopf werden wir gejagt, lit. over neck and head (over head and ears, as we say in English) are we driven]; are we tired, rest is not permitted us. The Septuagint connects עָלָנוּ upon our necks, with what precedes, ἐν τῷ ἡμῶν ἐν ἀλλάγματι ἦλθεν ἐπὶ τὸν τράχηλον ἡμῶν, our wood in exchange for our money came upon our neck. So also the Arabic version. The Syriac closes ver.

4 with בְּנִיחֵר and refers נִשְׁמָנוּ to what follows, so that it also translates venerunt super collum nostrum, they came upon our neck, where either ligna, wood, or hostes, the enemy, may be regarded as the subject. Among the moderns, ABEN-EZRA and J. DAV. MICHAELIS also connect the phrase upon our necks with what precedes. The latter gives the sense thus, ligna nostra pretio empta cervicibus nostris imposita in urbem importantur, our wood bought with a price and laid upon our necks is carried into the city. The explanation of the Syriac produces a very harsh zeugma in ver. 4, renders the following sentence unintelligible, and expresses a thought that may be termed at least unnecessary. The objections to the other versions are as follows. 1. בְּכֶחָרִי, for pay, ver. 4 must be taken, either as dependent on a verb to be supplied (emta), or as belonging to בְּכֶחָרִי, in the very unsuitable sense, that the Jews were paid for carrying the wood. 2. The symmetrical proportions of the verses are destroyed; ver. 4 is too long, ver. 5 too short. We will then follow the Masoretic division of the verses. But as thus arranged, this verse has undergone various interpretations. PAREAU translates super cervicibus nostris inessores patimur, we bear sitters [riders] upon our necks. But בְּכֶחָרִי cannot mean we are ridden, or we carry riders. As little can it mean naturally, we bear persecutors or oppressors, which would correspond with PAREAU's idea, only without a figure. Others (RASCHI, DE WETTE, EWALD, 1st ed., MEYER, VAHINGER, ENGELHARDT) translate on our necks the yoke, or the yoke on the neck are we persecuted. But as THENIUS has remarked, the yoke here is a superadded idea entirely arbitrary. [BLATNEY reads עַל, yoke, instead of the preposition עַל, upon. But we must then, as he does, take the verb in a sense it cannot have of being burthened with, With the yoke of our necks are we continually burthened; or, as BOOTHROYD does, supply the preposition on and the verb is, and make an independent proposition of the first two words, The yoke is on our necks, we are pursued; or, as NOYES does, supply two prepositions, With the yoke upon our necks, we are driven.

HENDERSON, without changing עַל into עַל, thinks that upon our necks we are persecuted expresses "elliptically the great hardship to which the Jews were reduced in being compelled as captives to bear a heavy yoke on their necks;" and translates, We are persecuted with a yoke on our necks. So WILLIAM LOWTH seems to understand the text and refers to Deut. xviii. 48. "We are driven to our work like the bullock that has a yoke about his neck" (ADAM CLARKE).—W. H. H.] All these explanations fail in this that they let עַל depend, not immediately on בְּכֶחָרִי, but very unnecessarily on an entirely different idea supposed to be concealed therein. THENIUS and EWALD (2d ed.) have perceived the right sense, when they translate, on the neck were we pursued (so EWALD: THENIUS expresses the same sense by the words, they pursued us over our necks, i. e. since they are ever close behind us). I translate, We are driven on over our necks, that is to say, so that the driving goes over our necks onwards—and this idea corresponds exactly with our German phrase, "über Hals und Kopf" [lit. over neck and head, i. e. headlong]. LUTHER: "über Hals." [In full: Man treibt aus über Hals.] Besides, בְּכֶחָרִי cannot be taken in the sense of pursuing, for not fugitives, but captives are here spoken of, who are already in the hands of the enemies and are driven onward without mercy. This appears plainly from vers. 5, 8. The meaning to drive, to chase, undoubtedly lies in the root כָּרַךְ (see the kindred roots כָּרַךְ, נָכַר, כָּרַךְ), and is as plain as daylight in such places as Lev. xxvi. 36 (the sound of a falling leaf shall chase them), Job xxx. 15; Is. xvii. 18. [It would be a relief to accept Dr. NÄGELSBACH's simple explanation, and translate, They drove us, or we were driven headlong, or as we would say in our colloquial English, heels over head, but there is no evidence that the Hebrew words are used in any such colloquial sense. The next best thing is to adopt the translation of MAURER, THENIUS, EWALD, OWEN and GERLACH, which Dr. NÄGELSBACH also approves of, On our necks were we pursued, i. e. our pursuers followed us so closely as to be, as it were, on our necks. "We are hunted by pursuers who are ever hanging over our neck" (WORSWORTH). The objection to taking the verb in the sense of pursuing, on the ground that the people are here considered as captives and not fugitives, grows out of the incorrect interpretation of ver. 4, and involves an entire misconception of the intention of this Song. It is not the design of the Prophet to give a detailed account of successive and related events, but to heap up together, in one rapid and vehement recapitulation, all the wrongs, indignities and sufferings the people had endured, without reference to times or places.—W. H. H.]

Ver. 6. Whilst the Poet describes the onward march of the larger part of the people to the land of banishment, he is reminded that the people are, by this means, still more widely separated and torn asunder; for one part, by far the smaller part, has been compelled to turn southwards towards Egypt. [This verse confirms the opinion that the Prophet is not relating successive events in the order of their occurrence and in their relations to each other; but is stating independent facts and instances, all of which contribute to present to God an appeal for pity and mercy. There is no close connection, therefore, between vers. 5, 6, such as OWEN and GERLACH would find, when they say that ver. 6 relates what they did when so closely pursued. According to Dr. NÄGELSBACH's interpretation, that ver. 6 refers to the Jews on their way to Babylonia, driven before their captors, the connection of ver. 6 is impossible. While they were so closely pursued that their pursuers were on their necks, did even a small part of them miraculously escape and flee to Egypt? Dr. NÄGELSBACH does not mean to assert this; but his theory of interpretation would seem to demand it.—W. H. H.]—We have given the hand to the Egyptians, and to the Assyrians to be satisfied with bread.—Towards Egypt stretched we the hand,—Towards Assyria,—in order to be satisfied with bread. To stretch out the hand can mean here only, to stretch out the hand as a suppliant; see Jer. l. 16; 1 Chron. xxix. 24. [CALVIN: "To give the hand, is explained in three ways: some say that it means humbly to ask; others, to make an agreement; and others, to extend it in token of misery, as he who cannot ask for help, intimates his wants by extending his hand.

But the Prophet seems simply to mean that the people were so distressed by want, that they begged bread." But in what sense did the Jews stretch out the hand to Assyria? They had submitted to this great power, not willingly, as they had thrown themselves into the arms of the Egyptians, but by compulsion. Yet they must, if they would live, stretch out their suppliant hand, to receive a morsel of bread from the hand of Assyria bestowing it upon them. But what power is intended by Assyria? It has been understood of Assyria strictly speaking, which carried the ten tribes into exile. But it would be strange, indeed, if the Poet here overlooked the Babylonish exile. That he says Assur, and not Babel, may be explained on the ground that he has in mind the Assyrian, as well as the Babylonish captivity. While Babel never stands for Assur and Babel, the name Assur is so used as to embrace both countries; see 2 Kings xvii. 24; xviii. 11; xxiii. 29; 2 Chron. xxxiii. 11. The brief words of our text exhibit also the fact, that Israel no longer existed as a nation, but was entirely given over to the power of the kingdoms of this world, on whose favor its very life depended; and, while the smaller part found itself in the power of Egypt, the larger part, which included both Israel, carried away into Assyrian exile, and Judah, deported to Babylon, is subject to Assur,—to Assur in the widest sense of the term, understanding thereby, not only Assyria in the strict sense, but Babylon also. See also Jer. ii. 18. [Noyes is of the opinion that giving the hand, imports submission, as in Jer. l. 15; to stretch out the hand to be bound, as it were. Thus, he remarks, "in 2 Chron. xxx. 8, what is translated in the common version yield yourselves unto the Lord, is in the original give the hand to the Lord." The context here, nevertheless, favors the idea that the Jews were reduced in many instances to abject beggary, and entire dependence for the necessities of life on these heathen nations, the greatest enemies their country had.—W. H. H.]

Ver. 7. Our fathers have sinned and are not: and we have borne their iniquities.—Our fathers have sinned: they are not; we bear their sins. [There is no sufficient reason for rendering the last verb as a present. The English version is more literal.—W. H. H.] Comparing this verse with ver. 16, a certain parallelism is observable. In both the sins of the people are asserted to be the cause of the calamities previously described. But ver. 7 says, Our fathers have sinned and we bear their guilt. Ver. 16, on the contrary says, Woe to us, we have sinned. Here, as in i. 5, 8, 9, 14, 18; ii. 14; iii. 42; iv. 6, 12-14, the description of calamities endured constitute a principal feature in the confession of sin. As one paragraph ends with ver. 7, and another with ver. 16, ver. 8 begins a new paragraph. [This division separates verses closely allied. The subject down to ver. 10 is chiefly related to sufferings connected with the want of the necessities of life. With ver. 11 begins a description of individual instances of outrage and cruelty (vers. 11-14), followed by a description of the effects of all these calamities, public and private, on the theocratic people who offer the prayer. Ver. 16 is as intimately connected with what follows, as with what precedes it.—W. H. H.] There is at least some truth in the assertion made in ver. 7. For the great catastrophe had been brought about, not only by the guilt of the last generation, but also by that of previous generations (Jer. iii. 25; xv. 4; xvi. 11, 12). But ver. 7, without ver. 16, would contain only a partial view of the truth. The two verses complete each other. [WORDSWORTH: "The sins of their forefathers were visited upon them, because they themselves had sinned, as they themselves confess. . . . There is, therefore, no reason for supposing, with some, that these words could not have been written by Jeremiah, being at variance with the doctrine in Jer. xxxi. 29."—And are not (אֵינָם), without], see GR. notes above; they are not.) These words connect themselves rather with what follows, than with what precedes. Our fathers have sinned. Whilst they are no more, we bear their sins.

Ver. 8. Servants have ruled over us: there is none that doth deliver us out of their hands.—[None delivered from their hands.] Who are these servants? Satraps are suggested. So say those who understand ver. 5 of the residence of a part of the people in Palestine or elsewhere. But we see from ver. 5, that the subject of discourse is the march of the actually exiled hosts. Satraps, it is true, are the king's servants, but they are not merely servants, they are not slaves. That men of distinguished descent and high rank should stand under Satraps was a reproach, when considered in a theocratic point of view, but not to be regarded as a matter of sufficient importance to be mentioned in this place. Besides, in fact Gedaliah ruled in Judea, himself a Jew and, according to the testimony of Jeremiah (xl. 7-12), a well-disposed man. But that real slaves were employed for overseers and drivers of the marching captives, this was certainly in the highest degree hard and likewise disgraceful. [This again is to be regarded as one feature of the great variety of sufferings that befell the people. It is not necessary to suppose that the whole people were at any time under the lordship of slaves or under-servants. It is not necessary to suppose an exclusive reference to the bands of captives that were driven to Babylonia. It is enough that in their degraded state it often happened that they had to submit to domineering and harsh treatment from men that were themselves menials.—W. H. H.]

Ver. 9. We gat our bread with—at—the peril of our lives, because of the sword of the wilderness. ROSENMUELLER refers this verse to the dangers which the corn-transports out of Egypt may have had to encounter in the wilderness. But is it supposable that corn was brought from Egypt, when the larger part of the people had been led away to Babylon, and the smaller part had themselves fled to Egypt? EWALD, on the other hand, finds in these words "a remarkable indication, that most of the fugitives in Egypt dwelt at the north-eastern border close to the desert," and so were compelled "to wring their bread from the desert and its robbers." But when in the world was bread brought from the desert, even by those dwelling on the borders of Egypt, and not from the interior of the country? THENIUS presumes that this Song was written amid the circumstances of one of those small companies that remained in Palestine and were scattered about in that land. These, falling in on their pasture-grounds with the warlike tribes sojourning among them, would be compelled to get their subsistence by fighting for it. But that supposition is confirmed neither by the history (observe Jer. xlii. 1, "all the people," etc.), nor by the contents of our Song (compare ver. 8 especially, with the opinion of THENIUS, that the little company, among whom the Song was written, preferred liberty in poverty, to dependence in prosperity, ver. 6). The view of VAHINGER rests on the same opinion, and differs from that of THENIUS only in this, that he understands the bringing of bread to refer to merchant travellers who were in peril from Bedouin robbers. I am of the opinion, that the expedition here indicated, was an incident belonging to the experience of those Israelites who had not been led away to Babylon, and especially of those who had fled to Egypt. It is allowable to suppose, both from general reasons and particularly from ver. 6, that this one of the two parts of the people is intended. Much is touched upon in the Song, that happened to all in common (vers. 2, 3, 7, 10-12); much that only befell those who suffered captivity (vers. 4, 5, 8); here (ver. 9) we have a description that suits only the condition of those fugitives to Egypt, who yet retained their freedom. But I refer the verse, not as EWALD to those already settled in Egypt, but to events and circumstances preceding their settlement. According to Jeremiah xli. 8, ten men bought their lives of Ishmael, the murderer of Gedaliah, at the price of provisions which they had hidden. From this we see that provisions were scarce and that there were bands of robbers who hunted for them. Is it not then in the highest degree probable, that the crowd which fled to Egypt (Jer. xli. 16-18), both while they were still in Palestine, and frequently when they were in the desert, could obtain what was necessary for subsistence only at the peril of their lives?—[We gat our bread. Here again we have a future tense, נִכְנֵן; intimating the frequent recurrence, and doubtless the continuance, at the time of writing, of this peril.—W. H. H.]

Ver. 10. Our skin was black like an oven. [So BROUGHTON, CALVIN and HENDERSON. See Ps. lxxviii. 13.] Our skin is burnt [has been burnt] like an oven. [This sense is the one generally adopted, on the ground that it is more consistent with the effects of famine, and more congenial with the derivation and use of the Hebrew word. BLAYNEY and NOYES translate the verb parched.—W. H. H.]. The effect of hunger on the skin is compared to that of heat on the walls of the oven. Like these, that has become hot, dry, hard, cracked. There was hunger enough with the two parts of the people, who stretched out their hands, one to Assyria, the other to Egypt, until the one had arrived in Assyria and the other in Egypt.—Because of the terrible (marg. terrors, or storms of) famine,—because of the heat (or hotness, Gluten) of hunger. [Because of the burning (BROUGHTON) or burnings (CALVIN, NOYES). GERLACH translates the word raging, or fury (Wüthien), and so it is rendered by ALEXANDER (in Ps. xi. 6; cxix. 53, the only other places where the word occurs), who remarks, that "no English word is strong enough to represent the Hebrew except rage or fury." BLAYNEY translates stormy blasts of hunger, and HENDERSON the hot blasts of famine.—W. H. H.]

V. 11-13.

11 They ravished the women in Zion, and the maids in the cities of Judah.
12, 13 Princes are hanged by their hand: the faces of elders were not honoured. They took the young men to grind, and the children fell under the wood.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 11.—נָחֲשׁוּ, see ill. 33.—נָחֲשׁוּ, see Jer. i. 15; iv. 16; ix. 10; and elsewhere very frequently.

Ver. 12.—נָחֲשׁוּ is found nowhere in Jeremiah.—נָחֲשׁוּ Jeremiah never uses; see Lev. xix. 15, 32; Ex. xxiii. 3.

Ver. 13.—מִלֵּחַ, handmill, is ā. Aey. See elsewhere מִלֵּחַ Prov. xii. 4, and the verb Deut. xi. 8; Jud. xvi. 21; Is. xlvii. 2, etc. Jeremiah uses neither the verb nor the substantive.—כָּשַׁל with בְּ, Jer. vi. 21; Is. viii. 15; Lev. xxvi. 37.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

[Vers. 11-13. The sufferings of individuals, of all ages and conditions, especially their degradation, are described. These verses still further confirm the opinion, that this Song belongs to no special time or locality, but that it is a general enumeration of the various evils the people had suffered, from the time when Jerusalem was invaded, to the time when the Prophet indited this Poem.—W. H. H.]

Ver. 11. In this and the following verses (to ver. 15) are described the sorrows which befell particular classes of persons at the capture of the city. These are incidents which partly belong to an earlier period of the history, and partly still continue in force. The violation of the women and the hanging up of the Princes are past events, but the pain they caused still survives.—They ravished—dishonored. [OWEN: "There is here a delicate word for a disgraceful act. The words literally are,—Women in Zion they humbled (or, were humbled). It is humbled by the Sept. and Vulg." They suffered not only the worst, but all sorts of indignities. —W. H. H.].—The women in Zion and the maids—virgins—in the cities of Judah. [BLAYNEY, BOOTHROYD, HENDERSON and NOYES translate the first word matrons. The Hebrew word is as generic as our word women. Besides, this transfers the antithesis from Zion and the cities of Judah, where it belongs, to the distinction between matrons and maids, which the parallelism does not require. The women generally were humbled, even in Zion, yea and throughout all the cities of Judah. CALVIN: "He mentioned Sion rather than Jerusalem,—it was indeed to state a part for the whole; but that place we know had been chosen by God that His name might be there worshipped. . . . As, then, God had there His palace, that He might dwell in the midst of His people, it was a disgraceful sight in the extreme to see women ravished there, for the temple of God was thus violated."—W. H. H.]

Ver. 12. Princes are—were [have been]—hanged up—hung—by their hand [i. e. suspended by the hand.—W. H. H.]. This has been explained in three ways. 1. The Princes hung themselves with their own hand. But since, according to Deut. xxi. 23, he that is hanged is accursed of God, this is incredible. Why could they not have killed themselves in some other way? CALVIN indeed surmises, that they were compelled to hang themselves. But would not this have been explicitly stated, if the Jews had been compelled to do it? 2. At their side [i. e. Princes were hung beside or near the cities (so EWALD), or at the side, or in near proximity to the humbled women]. But against this are (1) the masculine suffix, (2) and yet more the preposition בְּ,—it should be לְ (1 Sam. xix. 3; Prov. viii. 3; 1 Chron. xviii. 17; xxiii. 28). Only two places can be named, where בְּ may stand for לְ, namely, 1 Sam. xxi. 14; Job xv. 23. But in the first passage it is, יְהוֹחָנָן בְּ, he reaved in or under their hands; and in Job xv. 23, the sense, as the connection shows, is,—he knows that he himself (by his own hand) has prepared the day of darkness. Nothing else remains for us, therefore, but to translate, 3. by their hand, and to refer the suffix to their enemies. The sense, indeed, is somewhat feeble; but verbal and substantial arguments render this explanation necessary. [GERLACH adopts the same view. Besides the evident awkwardness of this construction, it is open to the very serious objection, that the enemies have not been mentioned in the preceding context, nor are they prominently in the mind of either writer or speaker. The preceding verse merely tells us that women in Zion and virgins in the cities of Judah had been humbled. But by whom? The natural inference is, by the public enemy. Yet this is not said; is not even inevitable, and if it were, the mind of the reader is occupied with the women who suffered, not with the men who inflicted the injury. The pronoun, if it refers to any subject in the preceding verse, must, it would seem, refer to the women, or possibly to the cities. But that it does not refer to either of these is evident from its gender, and from the absence of any intelligible sense in which it can refer to them. We must conclude that it refers to the persons immediately named in close and preceding connection, and who according to all fixed rules of grammar, must be its subject. If this is so, then it can only mean either, what CALVIN says, that the Princes committed suicide, and that by hanging themselves, which as has been said is utterly incredible; or else, what the collocation of the words in the original naturally suggests, that the princes were hung up, i. e. suspended, by the hand, or their hand. The pronoun may properly be dispensed with, for its presence here seems entirely due to the preference of the writer for words ending in ו; it belongs to the rhyme, or assonance, and is not intended to be emphatic. So the Vulgate translates, omitting the pronoun: Principes manu suspensi sunt.—HENDERSON also omits the pronoun: but he overlooks the Niphal form of the verb and makes the enemy its subject. He translates, Princes they hung up by the hand. BOOTHROYD, more correctly, Princes were hung up by the hand. He supposes that the Princes and elders were first murdered and then hung up. OWEN: "The most obvious meaning of the words is, that Princes were hung or suspended by the hand, and not by the neck. Such a punishment . . . may have been a barbarity resorted to by the Chaldeans. This seems to be the meaning conveyed by the Versions and the Targum." If they were not tortured to death in this way, it is not unlikely that "the sons of Zedekiah," and "all the Princes of Judah" were slain in Riblah by being beheaded, and that their headless trunks were suspended by the hands on the walls of the city. Thus the headless, naked body of Saul, and the bodies of his three sons, were fastened to the walls of Bethshan (1 Sam. xxxi. 8-12). "It was a custom with the Persians, after they had slain, strangled, or beheaded their enemy, to hang their bodies upon poles or empale them. In this way they treated Hirstæus of Miletum, and Leonidas of Lacedæmon. See Herodotus, Lib. vi. c. 80; Lib. vii. c. 238" (ADAM CLARKE). Or, there may have been instances in which Princes were thus suspended, not after death, nor for the purpose of killing them, but as an ignominious and torturing punishment. It is said that "no punishment is more common in the East. Has a master a refractory slave, . . . several men are called, who tie the offender's hands and hoist him to the roof till he beg forgiveness" (Comp. Comm.).—W. H. H.] The faces of Elders were not regarded. This is said in allusion to Lev. xix. 32, "Thou shalt honor the face of the old man," comp. Lev. xix. 15; Ex. xxiii. 8. Although in the places referred to, the word Elders is intended as a designation of age, not of dignity, yet we are obliged to take it in the latter sense here; because it is placed in parallelism with Princes, and because the aged in contrast with the youthful are spoken of in ver. 14.

Ver. 13. They took the young men to grind—the young men are obliged to carry the mill —[NOYES: Young men carried mill-stones]. The Vulgate translates, Adolescentibus impudice abusi sunt (same as, Adolescentes molitionem passi sunt). [DOUAY: They abused the young men indecently, which is explained by this note, "i. e., made them grind naked in the mill." But the second clause of the verse is against any such interpretation of the first clause. The explanations, Juvenes ad molendum sumserunt, Young men were taken to grind, and Juvenes molas agitarunt or versarunt, Young men shook or turned mills, are verbally incorrect, for the verb שָׁבַת does not mean agitare, to shake: to give it the sense of turning, ל would be necessary. But the simple literal meaning of the word [to lift, GERLACH:—to carry], entirely suffices. For not only was the carrying of the hand-mills on the journey a heavy burden, but that they carried these implies that they were also compelled to turn them, i. e., to grind with them. As thus explained, the first clause corresponds with the second. And [The omission of the conjunction in this song, where it might be expected, makes its expression here more emphatic. Young men have been compelled to carry mill-stones, even boys, or mere children have fallen under the heavy burdens of wood they were forced to carry.—W. H. H.] הַיְלָדִים the children fell under the wood.—Boys fall [properly, fell, or have fallen.—W. H. H.] under the wood. The בְּחַיִּים, the most blooming and strongest of the youth were obliged to carry the mill-stones (see HEZ. R.-Enc. x. p. 82), the boys generally were required to drag the wood. [The most laborious and menial services were required of the Jewish youth and children.—W. H. H.]

V. 14-18.

14 The elders have ceased from the gate, the young men from their music. The 15 joy of our heart is ceased; our dance is turned into mourning. The crown is 16 fallen from our head: woe unto us, that we have sinned! For this our heart is 17 faint; for these things our eyes are dim. Because of the mountain of Zion, which 18 is desolate, the foxes walk upon it.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

[Vers. 14-18 depict the depressing effects of these various wrongs and humiliations on the feelings and deportment of the people.—W. H. H.]

Ver. 14. The elders have ceased from the gate, the young men from their music. [The German language enables GERLACH to give a verbally literal translation: Die Aeltesten feiern vom Thor, die Jünglinge von ihrem Saitenspiel. We have no words in English that so accurately translate שָׁבַת and נָנְיָהּ. NOYES' translation, which is also LUTHER'S—The elders sit no more at the gate; the young men have ceased from their music—restricts the meaning of the first clause, mistranslates the verb, and renders it necessary to supply a verb in the second clause. The idea is not merely that the elders no longer occupy their seats in the gates,—but that they rest or cease from all those duties and pleasures that pertain to their age and dignity. While elders here designate old men, in antithesis to young men, it is not to the exclusion of the official elders, who are regarded as types and representatives of those past middle-life,—of those who especially delighted in resorting to the gates of the city, whether their official duties called them there or not. HENDERSON: "It is common in the East for aged men to meet in the open space without the gate of the city, to pass the time in narrating or hearing the news of the day, or the stories of bygone years. From this an easy transition is made to the jocund pastime of the young."—W. H. H.] The gate was, as it were, the court of the elders of the people, and, at the same time, the principal place of social entertainment. See WINER, R. W. B. s. v. Thore. For this reason, and also on account of the second clause of the verse, we must consider, not only the discontinuance of public business, but the loss of that pleasure which the gate afforded to the older men. The young men from their music. THENIUS remarks correctly that Jeremiah "in the threatenings, vii. 34 and xvi. 9, expresses himself concerning the loss of happiness in a way similar to this, and yet differing from what is said here." [To suppose this verse to refer especially to the city of Jerusalem (CALVIN) is in itself absurd. There were no longer gates, elders, or young men in Jerusalem, of whom these things could be said. Throughout this song, the Prophet generalizes and does not particularize with reference to times and places.—W. H. H.]

Ver. 15. Whilst, as has been said, vers. 11-14 enter into details, vers. 15, 16, generalize the facts. [Ver. 14 is more closely connected with what follows than with what precedes it. It describes the disheartening effects, on the minds and conduct of the people, of what had happened. It does not state, as all the preceding verses do, some special cause of humiliation or suffering.—W. H. H.] The joy of our heart is ceased; our dance is turned into mourning.—[Ceased has the joy of our heart, changed to mourning our dance. Is ceased. GATAKER: "Heb. hath rested: the same term that was before, ver. 14, and it may seem to have some glance at such mirth and cheer, as they were wont to have at their solemn festivals and on their Sabbaths, Deut. xvi. 11, 14; xxviii. 47, 48; 2 Chron. xxix. 86; Ps. xlii. 4; lxxxi. 1, 2; xcii. 1, 2."—W. H. H.]

Ver. 16. The crown is fallen from our head [marg. The crown of our head. So BLAYNEY, BOOTHROYD, HENDERSON, OWEN. It is more literal, but bad English. The crown of the head, in English, is something very different from the crown on the head. The one cannot fall without the head it belongs to. The other may fall from the head; so here: Fallen has the crown from our head.—W. H. H.] Woe unto us, that—for—we have sinned. I must regard the second half of this verse as a conclusion [i. e. of a paragraph, or one of the principal parts of the chapter], corresponding to that of ver. 7. I do not, therefore, believe that ver. 16 is to be connected with ver. 17, and that by the crown on our head is to be understood "Jerusalem, as a diadem set upon Zion with its splendid palaces" (THEOPHILUS), although the expression by itself could have such an interpretation. Rather, I believe that the first clause of ver. 16 is in very close connection with ver. 15; and that the first clause of ver. 16 declares, that not only all joy, but also all honor has forsaken Jerusalem. The crown on the head of Jerusalem had consisted in this, that she was great among the nations, a princess among the provinces, and perfect in beauty, the joy of the whole earth (i. 1; ii. 15). [It confuses the sense to suppose that Jerusalem is the subject from whose head the crown has fallen. The people generally are the subject; "the crown of our head has fallen." In the loss of independent nationality, and of all honor among the nations, who now treated them with the utmost contempt, the crown had indeed fallen from their heads. However intimately related are vers. 7 and 16, however striking and fine it would be, rhetorically considered, if each stood in the position of an emphatic conclusion to corresponding strophes (if this is poetry), or paragraphs (if it is prose); yet, in point of fact, each of these verses is too intimately connected with the verses immediately following it, to be separated from them without injuring the logical connection of the thoughts.

—W. H. H.]—We have sinned! A gratifying advance is observable here, in so far as the people now openly and honorably confess their own guilt. See iii. 39-42.

Vers. 17, 18. These two verses constitute the introduction to the closing prayer, vers. 19-22. They refer to a fact which must be the cause of deepest pain to a heart truly attached to the theocracy,—the desolation of the holy mountain. But this gloomy and dark image constitutes only the background for those noble and consolatory thoughts with which the Bard (Sänger) comforts himself in his prayer.

Ver. 17. For this our heart is faint; for these things our eyes are dim. On this account is our heart faint, therefore are our eyes become dim. For the reasons given above we refer the pronominal phrases עַל־זֶה, on this account (darob) [E.V., for this], and עַל־אֵלֶּה, therefore (darüber) [E.V., for these things], to what follows in reference to Mount Zion in ver. 18. [The objections to this interpretation are insuperable. 1. In point of fact, the desolation of Zion was not the only, nor the absorbing cause of grief, as is evident from the whole of the preceding part of this Song, in which abundant and terrible causes of distress are given, without a single allusion to the desolation of Zion. 2. The second pronominal suffix

עַל־אֵלֶּה (correctly translated in English Version, for these things) is plural, and must include more than the first suffix עַל־זֶה (for this thing), which is singular. It is obvious that both cannot refer to the single statement in ver. 18, that Mount Zion has become desolate. Nor can it be said, that two things are stated in ver. 18, namely, that Mount Zion is desolate; and that the foxes run upon it. For the latter statement is a mere expansion or illustration of the first: and it would be very absurd to make the latter a special and additional cause of grief, regarded as in any sense distinct from the first great fact that the mountain is desolate. 3. This interpretation involves a redundancy of relative expository phrases, all referring to the same thing, that is useless, inelegant, and utterly incongruous with the prevailing style of composition in the Lamentations, which is terse, compressed and remarkable for the absence of words not actually indispensable, as, for example, of the connecting ! (which the Masorites were so anxious to insert), and of the repeated verb, causing a constant recurrence of the Zeugma, see vers. 2, 3, 6, 8, 11, 14, 19. Is it likely that such a writer would say, on account of this thing (עַל־זֶה), on account of these things (עַל־אֵלֶּה), on account of (עַל) Mount Zion, etc., our heart is faint, our eyes are dim; using three relative expository phrases, where one would have sufficed? 4. By referring the verse to what precedes it, these relative phrases, instead of being redundant and cumbersome, become significant and impressive. For this (namely, that the crown has fallen from our head because we have sinned), our heart is faint; for these things (namely, all the evils that have been recited), our eyes are dim. We may then take ver. 18 as an additional reason for lamentation, translating לְ , on account of, or take it as an independent, but not unrelated, thought, translating לְ , as to: see remarks on that verse.—W. H. H.]—Our eyes are dim [our eyes have become dim]. We must regard weeping, according to ii. 11, as the immediate cause of the eyes becoming dim. [Weeping suggests itself as a sufficient physical cause, and if the Prophet means this, then our eyes have become dim, is a poetical way of intimating how greatly they have wept. But there is no allusion to tears in the context; the period of violent weeping, indeed, we may regard as past: and the parallelism is better carried out by regarding the dimness of the eyes as the effect of the faintness of the heart. So Noyes: "our eyes are dim; i. e., through faintness the sight of our eyes departs. On the other hand, the eyes are said to be enlightened when the strength is restored and faintness departs. See 1 Sam. xiv. 29." We are not to restrict the thought to merely physical causes and effects. The faintness of the heart suggests a moral cause, the effect of which would be that moral dimness of sight which ensues, when God is no longer seen and hope expires. It is this underlying thought that connects ver. 17 with ver. 18.—W. H. H.]

Ver. 18. Because of the mountain of Zion, which is [has become] desolate, the foxes walk upon it. The Mount of Zion is here evidently intended, not in the restricted sense, but in the wider sense in which it "includes Moriah." See DELITZSCH on Ps. ii. 6; ix. 12; lxxvi. 3, etc. [The name Zion is used throughout the Lamentations, with great uniformity and precision, of Jerusalem as the theocratic city, where God has His dwelling-place, and always with special reference to the most sacred precincts of that city, where were the Temple of God and the palace of the king. Here the word Mount makes the designation more plain. The whole city, doubtless, is intended; but it is the city regarded as the dwelling-place of God, the throne of the Theocracy. Probably the word is always used by the Prophets in this sense; and a regard to this fact will spare us the difficulties of determining whether Mount Moriah, the Temple mount, was included generically in Mount Zion, or is always to be distinguished from Mount Zion.—W. H. H.] — The foxes walk [have walked] upon it. Where these beasts live the habitations of men must have ceased to exist. See Ps. lxxiii. 11; comp. Judg. xv. 4; Ex. xiii. 4. It may also be properly assumed, that if Jerusalem had been destroyed within a few weeks, those ravenous beasts were busily engaged roaming through its holy precincts seeking for the carcasses of the dead. [Foxes. דְּלָאִים . Jackals, BOOTHROYD, WORDSWORTH, GERLACH. See KITTO's Cyc. Bib. Lit. If preying on dead men was mentioned, or even distinctly hinted at, we might be sure that the jackal, or wolf, or some other ravenous member of the canine species, is probably intended; for foxes are not addicted to this. A better reason for supposing that jackals are meant, is the plural form of the word (though this could be explained by the preference of the writer for terminations in ים , as if they went about on the Holy Mount in companies; for the jackal is a gregarious, the fox a solitary animal.

But the Hebrew דְּלָאִים , may mean, not walking about on the mountain, but walking in the frequentative sense, or living (see דָּלָה , Piel in Eccl. iv. 15) in the mountain. In this case the reference would be to these animals, whether foxes or jackals, having their burrows there, remaining there permanently and undisturbed. This gives a better idea of the utter desolation that reigned on Mount Zion, and is more consonant with the fact, that more than "a few weeks" must have elapsed since the city was completely destroyed and consumed to its foundations, and, therefore, there were no corpses there to invite the predatory excursions of the jackals.—But what is the connection of ver. 18 with ver. 17? How is the preposition לְ to be translated? BROUGHTON very elegantly preserves the obscurity of the original; "For this our heart is sick, for these things our eyes be dim. For Mount Zion which is desolate, the foxes walk upon it." We can translate לְ , as in the preceding verse, on account of, and then this verse is immediately connected with the preceding verse, and assigns an additional reason, why the heart is sick, and the eyes dim, namely, that Mount Zion is desolate. That is the same as saying, that God has withdrawn from His people: their heart is faint and their eyes dim on account of past and present troubles, and also because there is no prospect of relief for them, for God's house is destroyed, and Jehovah has forsaken His people. This is excellent sense, and were there no question as to the grammatical construction we might be satisfied with it. But we may translate לְ , as to (GERLACH, über), as to Mount Zion which has become desolate, the foxes have walked upon it. Thus rendered, this verse is independent of the preceding verse as to grammatical construction, but intimately related to it in sense. This is recommended by several considerations. 1. לְ , by itself, rarely has the sense of on account of. 2. The וְ , relativum, properly throws the idea connected with it into a parenthesis. If so, then the idea that Zion lies waste, is not the prominent idea, but is subordinate to what, in itself is an insignificant fact, that the foxes walk upon it. Surely that could not constitute the climax of their grief, who had to lament for dishonored women, princes, and elders, and the cruellest oppression of tender children! 3. If the foxes walking on Zion is a fact significant of something else of far deeper import (as in truth it is, though this method of construction does not suggest that interpretation), yet in such a case it is to be observed, that the לְ should be repeated before the last clause. Our heart is faint, our eyes dim, Because of Mount Zion, because the foxes walk upon it. In every case the construction is awkward.

4. By taking לְ in the sense of as to, we have perfect grammatical construction: As to Mount Zion, which has become desolate, the foxes walk upon it! 5. This at once suggests the real force of the expression, the foxes walk upon it, and gives dignity to what else would be an insignificant culmination point of the sublime grief expressed in what precedes. As to Mount Zion, from whence ought to come our help and salvation, the foxes have it now for their home! It is no longer the dwelling-place of God, and the refuge of His people. This is no sentimental effusion of grief, that the foxes roam where the proud and happy city once stood. It is the expression of a terrible truth, that Jehovah had forsaken His people; and what had been His dwelling-place, now laid waste and destroyed, is the home of wild beasts. 6. This explanation is favored by the emphatic declaration that follows in ver. 19, and especially by the emphatic expression of the personal pronoun: Thou, Jehovah art forever. Thy dwelling-place is the home of the wild beasts, but Thou Thyself dost still exist, dost still reign, and Thy people pray Thee to return to them, and have mercy upon them.—W. H. H.]

V. 19-22.

19 Thou, O LORD, remainest forever; thy throne from generation to generation.
20, 21 Wherefore dost thou forget us forever, and forsake us so long time? Turn thou 22 us unto thee, O LORD, and we shall be turned; renew our days as of old. But thou hast utterly rejected us; thou art very wroth against us.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 19.—[BLAYNEY: "The LXX., Syr., Vulg. and Arabic all express the conjunction at the beginning of this verse. Two MSS. read ואתה, and so it is found in the notes of the celebrated printed Bible, No. 300"]—בְּעַדְךָ, frequently in Jeremiah, i. 15; iii. 17, etc.—לְדוֹר וָדוֹר Jeremiah never uses. He says only once דוֹר וָדוֹר, i. 39. [The writer who only once used a common expression with a common preposition, is the very one who would be likely only once to use the same expression with another preposition.—W. H. H.]

Ver. 20.—לְנֶצַח, Jer. iii. 5; i. 89.—שָׁבַח, Jer. ii. 32; iii. 21, etc.—עוֹנֵךְ, Jer. ii. 13; xli. 7, etc.—אָרָךְ Jeremiah never uses. See Ps. xciii. 6; xciii. 5.

Ver. 21.—The verb הָרַשׁ (except here, used only in Piel and Hiph.) is not found in Jeremiah.—בְּכָרְךָ, see Jer. xxx. 30.

Ver. 22.—כִּי־אָמַרְתָּ, Jer. xiv. 19, ii. 37; vi. 30, etc.—בְּצַדְךָ, Jer. xxxvii. 5.—כִּי־אָמַרְתָּ Jeremiah uses twice, xviii. 13; xlviii. 16; עַד־אָמַרְתָּ never. [Poor little עַד, slighted by Jeremiah twice! takes its revenge by having the last word to say against his authorship of the Lamentations.—W. H. H.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Vers. 19-22. This short prayer contains four thoughts. 1. A positive source of consolation; the throne of the Lord stands immovably fast, ver. 19. 2. A question: Why then should the Lord forget His people forever? ver. 20. 3. A petition: that the Lord would re-establish His people spiritually and temporally, ver. 21. 4. A negative source of consolation: the Lord cannot be angry forever, ver. 22.

Ver. 19. Thou, O LORD.—Thou, Jehovah. [BLAYNEY, BOOTHROYD, NOYES: But Thou, Jehovah. See Textual notes above. Whether the originally belonged to the text or not, the emphatic expression of the personal pronoun אתה, and the parallelism between vers. 18 and 19, involve the sense of but, yet, or as to, before the pronoun. As to Zion, it is desolate,—but Thou endurest forever, or as to Thee, though Thy dwelling-place is gone, Thou endurest. GATAKER indicates this in this brief note. "But, or Yet, to be supplied."—W. H. H.]—Remainest forever.—[lit., sittest forever. But when this is said of God or of human monarchs, it always refers to their occupying the throne; see Ps. lxi. 8 (7); ix. 5 (4), 12 (11); Zech. vi. 13. The king sits, the subject stands. The instant mention of the throne, shows that this must be the meaning here. Not God's continual existence, but His uninterrupted sovereignty over His creatures. HENDERSON and NOYES translate, sittest as king. But this seems to lower the thought to a comparison with human monarchs. Though God is called and is a King, yet it is not as any ordinary king that He occupies the throne. GERLACH translates, Thou art enthroned forever. This produces a slight tautology. Thou reignest forever (GATAKER), may, perhaps, be as accurate a translation of the word, as our English affords.—W. H. H.]—Thy throne from generation to generation. See Ps. xlv. 7; lxxxix. 6; xciii. 2. In opposition to the desolation of the external sanctuary, the Poet holds up before himself the consolation, that the Lord Himself nevertheless sits firmly on His throne and His kingdom remains immovable. The heathen could destroy the Temple; to the Lord Himself they could do no harm. See Ps. ix. 8 (7); xxix. 16, cxlvi. 10; cxlv. 1.

Ver. 20. Wherefore dost thou forget us forever, and forsake us so long time? (marg. for length of days). Why shouldst Thou forever forget us, and forsake us for long time? It ought to be distinctly observed, that it is not said שָׁכַחְתָּנוּ, Thou hast forgotten, עָזַבְתָּנוּ, Thou hast forsaken. The Poet does not ask, Why hast Thou forgotten and forsaken us forever? But why wouldst or shouldst Thou forsake us forever? That He would do this, the Poet cannot believe. See Ps. lxxiv. 2 (1); lxxvii. 8-10 (7-9). [As

OWEN has suggested, we are undoubtedly to regard this as a prayer for present and immediate relief. The Prophet well understood that the captivity would not end before seventy years. That for that time at least Zion must remain desolate. He also firmly believed that after that time, the people would return to their own land, and God would dwell on Mount Zion. He could not therefore ask, with any reference to the possibility of such a thing, if God intended to forsake the Jewish people forever? But what He does ask is, if He would forever or always (נצח, constantly, continuously) forget and forsake for length of days, for a long period of time, or for all their life-time, that suffering generation of His people? Would He leave them in their present misery without any relief, any show of mercy? Though Zion was desolate, and God had withdrawn His theocratic presence from the people, and the Prophet knew that He would not in that sense return to the people again, till that sinful generation was dead, yet, he says, Thou still art God, Thou reignest forever, Thy throne remains unmoved by any mundane events,—why then shouldst Thou continuously, persistently forget us and completely abandon us to our present sorrow? The pronoun us here, embraces the persons of those embraced by the us in the preceding verses of the Song. Had he intended the people as such, and not the people individually considered, he would probably have used some such designation as the daughter of Thy people, or simply Thy people. The prayer as thus interpreted was answered. Long before the captivity ended, God had mercy on the sufferers, gave them favor in the eyes of men, and relieved them from many of their distresses. The verse then ought to be translated, Wherefore shouldst Thou always forget us, shouldst Thou abandon us—i. e. to our present misery—for length of days, that is, for any long but indefinite period of time?—W. H. H.]

Ver. 21. Turn Thou us unto Thee, O LORD—Jehovah—and we shall be turned. The Poet well knows that a restoration is possible; but he also knows its conditions. He has before his eyes what is said in Jer. xxxi. 16-22; iii. 1-4, 12, in which the idea שׁוּב [to turn] is employed in a variety of ways.—The words הִשְׁכֵּנִי וְנִשְׁכְּרָה [turn us and we shall turn] are a direct quotation from Jer. xxxi. 18. See remarks on that passage. Comp. Ps. lxxx. 4 (3), 8 (7), 20 (19). The question is whether the Poet prayed only for temporal, or only for spiritual restoration? It is in point of fact not imaginable, that there could be one without the other. But he knows that in order to either kind of restoration, the Lord must take the initiative. And especially, first of all, He must lead back the people to Himself. Only when the Lord has accomplished this—but then most certainly—will the people return back to the Lord and to the place of His gracious presence and so be restored to the old covenant relationship. [There are three ways of understanding this prayer, which Dr. NÄGELSACH has not distinguished with his usual admirable perspicuity. 1. It can be understood as a prayer for the restoration of the old condition of things, involving a return to their own land. OWEN: “The meaning of this sentence is,” says GROTIUS, ‘Restore us to Thy favor, that we may be restored to our ancient state.’ Were this evidently the meaning, the rendering ought to be thus,—Restore us, O Jehovah, to Thyself, that we may be restored.” It is obvious that the words so translated do not express what is claimed for them. Restore us to Thyself, that we may be restored, can only mean that we may be restored to Thyself. This might involve as a consequence the return of the “ancient state.” But if that had been the main idea, it would have been differently expressed. Besides people are apt to pray for what they most need and are likely to get. The pressing need of the people now, was instant relief from suffering. This they might have without a return to their land. The latter they could not expect for themselves, and were sure that it would come eventually to a future generation. 2. In a strictly theocratic sense. That God would bring them back to Himself and they be restored to His favor and blessed with all the blessings of the covenant. This would not involve necessarily an immediate return to their own land; and gives a good sense. Yet it does not seem fully to express the natural meaning of the words. Nor is it grammatically correct to take שׁוּב in a passive, instead of an active sense.

3. It can be regarded as a prayer for converting grace. Turn Thou us to Thyself and we shall turn, i. e. to Thee. This is the simplest and most natural translation. It is consistent with the fact, that the people throughout this Song, while speaking collectively, are yet regarded as individuals. It harmonizes with the evident meaning of ver. 20. It is such a prayer as was eminently proper in their circumstances. It is consistent with the whole doctrine of the Bible in regard to converting grace, or the grace of repentance. Finally, it prepares the way for the final petition, renew our days as of old.—W. H. H.].—Renew our days as of old. The construction is a prolepsis. Renew our days, i. e. vitam, vitam conditionem, Job x. 6, so that they may be as they were formerly. [This petition is general and comprehensive. It reaches forward to the time when all they had possessed and enjoyed would be theirs again as a people,—Country, Temple, Priest, Prophet, and King. But it does not require the instant or even speedy fulfilment of these things; nor does this petition afford any ground for the argument (OWEN) that the preceding petition must be of the same purport.—W. H. H.]

Ver. 22. But Thou hast utterly rejected us; (marg. For wilt Thou utterly reject us?) Thou art very wroth against us. Or hast Thou wholly rejected us, and art exceedingly angry with us? The verse contains, as remarked above, a negative fundamental statement. The meaning of the conjunction וְאִם [but, except, unless] is, it may be then that. See Gen. xxviii. 17; Is. xlii. 19; Prov. iii. 12; my Gr. § 110, 4, note, EWALD, § 356. The idea of realization is to be supplied before the conjunction, from the foregoing prayer; this will be done, unless Thou mayest have utterly abandoned us. [CALVIN: Except Thou hast wholly rejected us, and hast become very angry with us. BOOTHROYD puts the first clause interrogatively, For wilt Thou altogether cast us off? Thou hast been wroth against us exceedingly. But both verbs are preterites, and neither can be taken in a future sense. For the same reason, the verbs cannot be translated as NOYES renders them, taking both clauses interrogatively, For shouldst Thou utterly reject us? Shouldst Thou be so exceedingly wroth against us? We must either accept the sense of Dr. NÆGELSBACH's translation, with which CALVIN and GERLACH agree, or accept the text of the English Version, with which agree Sept., Syr., Arab., Vulg., Targ., BROUGHTON, BLATNEY, HENDERSON, and OWEN, an imposing weight of authority. If we adopt the latter sense, then we must accept of OWEN's as the only possible explanation, that the reference is to themselves as individuals, not as representatives of the Jewish race. They knew that God had not utterly rejected the nation. They knew that as a nation, they would be restored to their land. In either case, the opinion that this prayer is a prayer for immediate relief as individuals, and not for final restoration as a nation, is evident. For, if we adopt the sense of the text of the English version, we cannot believe that Jeremiah meant to announce the utter rejection of the nation; and if we prefer the sense of the margin of the English version, we cannot believe that Jeremiah would close this magnificent poem with a question involving the possibility of God's utter rejection of the whole nation. Rather, we must regard these closing words as one last plaintive cry for mercy,—unless Thou hast utterly rejected us, who are now in misery, and hast become exceedingly angry with us, so that Thy wrath cannot be appeased, and the mercy, we implore in vain for ourselves, is to be reserved for another and more pious generation of Israelites.—W. H. H.]

The Hebrew codices repeat, for the purpose of synagogue reading, after ver. 22, the words of ver. 21, as they do also [repeat the verse before the last, after the last verse] at the close of Isaiah, Malachi, and Ecclesiastes, "in order to close with consolatory words." See DELITZSCH, Is. p. 651. [HUGH BROUGHTON: Turn us, O Eternal, unto Thee, and we shall return; renew our days as of old. The ver. 21 is one of the four which, in the Massoreth Bible, are printed as a postscript for better memory. Another is the last save one in Ecclesiastes, another the last save one in Esay, the fourth the last save one in Malachi; as I noted upon Ecclesiastes. These sayings contain the main of the writers. That in Ecclesiastes biddeth us look for all happiness in the world to come, that of Esay telleth how all Moyse's policy shall end. That of Malachi sheweth how John Baptist shall begin the New Testament. And this of Jeremy telleth that God will begin a new state for his people. Upon that they studied in Babylon fifty years, and they made themselves a golden age, knowing that the kingdom of Christ was in suffering. Afterwards they are plainly told of the true kingdom, and be renewed, as of old. This verse was given in the beginning of the captivity for a comfort that way." WORDSWORTH: "Turn Thou us unto Thee, O Lord, and we shall be turned. A very appropriate prayer for Israel weeping over the ruins of Jerusalem,—destroyed first by the Chaldean armies, and next, on the anniversary of the same day, by the power of Rome, for its sins. Israel says, 'Turn Thou us, O Lord, and we shall be turned;' and the Apostle of Israel, the great Hebrew of the Hebrews, St. Paul, says, 'Even unto this day, when Moses is read, the veil is upon their heart. Nevertheless, when it shall turn unto the Lord, the veil shall be taken away' (2 Cor. iii. 15, 16). May He hasten the time! Then the dirge of Lamentation will be changed into a jubilee of joy."]

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. Ver. 1. Remember, O LORD. "It is unworthy of the majesty of God to impute the fault of forgetfulness to Him, but He may be entreated to be mindful or to remember, in order to render speedy assistance to the needy, and thus make manifest what [viz. His remembrance] was before concealed." RHABANUS IN GHISLER., p. 213.

2. Ver. 1. [Consider, and behold. CALVIN: "The words, though brief and concise, yet contain a useful doctrine, that God is pleased to bring help to the miserable when their evils come to an account before Him, especially when they are unjustly oppressed. It is indeed certain, that nothing is unknown to God, but this mode of speaking is according to the perceptions of men; for we think that God disregards our miseries, or we imagine that His back is turned to us when He does not immediately succor us. But He is simply to be asked to look on our evils, . . . as soon as He is pleased to look on the evils we suffer, aid is at the same time prepared for us."—Our reproach. CALVIN: "There is mention especially made of reproach, that the indignity might move God the more; for it was for this end that He took the people under His protection, that they might be for His glory and honor, as Moses says. As then, it was God's will that the riches of His glory should appear in that people, nothing could have been more inconsistent than that, instead of glory, they should have nothing but disgrace and reproach. This, then, is the reason why the Prophet makes a special mention of the reproach of the people."]

8. Ver. 1. "He does not say, 'Remember, O Lord, our enemies, that they may suffer as their deeds deserve,' but, 'Be mindful of what has happened to us,' as if he would say in effect, 'Remembering the evils which we suffer take them away, but overlook the doers of them.' When he says, 'What has happened,' or 'what has been done to us,' he discriminates between what we suffer and what is natural [normal], for these evils are not natural or normal, but accidental, resulting from the manifold effects of sin." PASCHASIUS IN GHISLER., p. 213.

4. Ver. 1. "The cross seems all the lighter when we lament over it to a true, confidential friend, and show him how it pains us, and he with brotherly sympathy or good advice, removes from us a part of our burden. But men cannot always help us, however sincerely they desire to do so. But he who commends his affairs to God, complains to the right and faithful Helper, who has invited us to pray to Him (Ps. xlii. 6; xxvii. 8; xxxvii. 5; lv. 23; Sir. ii. 11)." EGID. HUNnius. "In adversity we should not, with the Papists, fly for assistance to the dead, who are ignorant of our afflictions (Is. lxiii. 16;) nor, with the superstitious and profane, to magicians and wizards (Is. viii. 19, 20); but, after the example of the church in this passage, we should fly to the Lord (Hos. vi. 1-3 [E. V. Hos. v. 15-vi. 2]; 2 Chr. xx. 12)." FÖRSTER.

6. Vers. 2-16. "Because everything contained in this list of evils was long before predicted to the Israelites with the greatest exactness [lit. to a very hair's breadth] in the ancient Mosaic list [of curses], contained in the twenty-eighth chapter of Deuteronomy, . . . we learn from the agreement of the Mosaic list with the manifest eventu or fulfilment in the captive people of Judah, how the threatenings, contained for us in God's word are to be regarded, not as mere empty, inefficient words to terrify us, but for an undoubted, sure, and certain reckoning and list, whereby God's temporal and eternal wrath from Heaven against the ungodly is revealed and threatened, as it is written in the first chapter of Romans." EOID. HUNNIUS. "This is useful, that we may carry the cup straight, and look well to ourselves, lest it may happen to us in the same way that faith comes to be experience." CRAMER.

6. Ver. 2. "That these things may not happen to us also, let us be pious, upright, and temperate in the acquisition, possession, and use of our property; in reference to which Paul admonishes us in 1 Cor. vii. 30, 31, that while we are in the world, we should not use the world [Vulg.], that we may have worldly possessions, but should possess them as though we had them not. Besides that threefold woe of Habakkuk (ii. 6) presses hard upon us. Use is commendable, abuse criminal." FÖRSTER.

7. Ver. 8. Our mothers are as widows. "By mothers are intended the seven synagogues, which are known to have been established principally on the Mount Olives, from which flowed the milk of doctrine. . . . But in the time of the siege or of the Chaldean ravages, their children having been removed, they were abandoned and consumed with fire." PASCHASIVS IN GHISLER., p. 214.

8. Vers. 4, 6, 9, 10. "We learn especially how God punishes the misuse of His gifts of plenty and abundance; when, for instance, men are not thankful to God in times of profusion and cheapness, but squander uselessly His gifts, wine and fruits of the earth, by gormandizing and carousing, gluttonizing and guzzling, banqueting and tipping; then God withdraws His blessings and gifts; food becomes scarce so that it is not easily procured; and He sends a famine so that water and precious bread can hardly be obtained, as was the case with the Jewish people. But they had well deserved it by their rioting, which the Prophet Isaiah long before rebuked, when he enumerated, among other gross vices of the house of Judah, drunkenness also, and called down a woe upon it (Is. v. 11-13, comp. Amos vi. 4-7) . . . But the punishment terminates not in temporal poverty. Excessive indulgence in eating and drinking is such a pernicious vice that a man forfeits thereby his part in the Kingdom of Heaven (1 Cor. vi. 9, 10), and must be deprived of eternal happiness, and must suffer thirst with the rich drunkard eternally in the flames of Hell (Luke xvi.; Is. v. 14)." EOID. HUNNIUS.

9. Ver. 6. "According to the real meaning of the Hebrew, the church weeps for her children, when members of Christ and ministers of the altar, for the sake of earthly things, give the hand to those more powerful or to worldly men, who are rendered foul by the blackness of their [ill-gotten] wealth or other crimes." PASCHASIVS IN GHISLER., p. 216.

10. Ver. 7. "Undeservedly, O Roman, must thou pay the penalty for the sins of thine ancestors." HORACE, Odes, B. III., Ode 6. "Already have we sufficiently expiated the perjury of the Laomedonian Troy with our blood." VIRGIL, Georg. I., 501, 2. "This is rightly lamented in the church also, that when the priests and the princes of the earth are delinquent, for their faults, as it were, the people are punished." PASCHASIVS IN GHISLER., p. 218. "When their kings act the fool, the Greeks are punished." HORACE.

11. Ver. 7. [POOL'S Annot.: "We must not understand this in the same sense as Ex. xviii. 2, where God reflecteth upon them for using a proverb to this sense. It is the Prophet who here speaketh, and in the name of the godly Jews, who would not excuse themselves as if they suffered merely for their forefathers' sins. But the Prophet confesseth and bewaileth that God had punished their iniquities and the iniquities of their forefathers together; and it was better with their forefathers who had sinned, and were dead and gone, than with them, upon whom the punishment of their iniquity did abide, and was like so to do for a long time."—Our fathers have sinned, and are not. CALVIN: "Our Prophet's object was to turn God to mercy; and to attain this object he says, 'O Lord, Thou indeed hast hitherto executed just punishment, because our fathers had very long abused Thy goodness and forbearance; but now the time has come for Thee to try and prove whether we are like our fathers; as then, they have perished as they deserved, receive us now into favor.' We hence see that thus no quarrel or contention is carried on with God, but only that the miserable exiles ask God to look on them, since their fathers, who had provoked God and had experienced His dreadful vengeance, were already dead."—And we have borne their iniquities. CALVIN: "When he says that the sons bore the iniquities of the fathers, though it be a strong expression, yet its meaning is not as though God, without reason, punished their children and not their fathers; for unalterable is that declaration, 'The son shall not bear the iniquity of the father, nor the father the iniquity of the son; but the soul that sinneth it shall die' (Ex. xviii. 20). It may yet be said that the children are loaded with the sins of their fathers, because God, as He declares by Moses, extends His vengeance to the third and fourth generation (Ex. xx. 5). And He says also in another place, 'I will return into the bosom of children the iniquity of their fathers' (Jer. xxxii. 18). God then continued His vengeance to their posterity. But yet there is no doubt but that the children who had been so severely punished, bore also the punishment of their own iniquity, for they deserved a hundred deaths. But these two things well agree together, that God returns the iniquity of the fathers into the bosom of their children, and yet that the children are chastised for their own sins." HENRY: "They acknowledge the reproach of sin which they bear. This comes in, in the midst of their complaints, but may well be put in the front of them. This is not here a peevish complaint, or an imputation of unrighteousness to God, like what we have in Jer. xxxi. 29; Ez. xviii. 2, but a penitent confession of the sins of their ancestors, which they themselves had also persisted in, for which they now justly suffered. Thusthey submit themselves to the Divine justice, and refer themselves to the Divine pity. And, truly, the sins God looks back upon in punishing, we must look back upon in repenting, and must notice all that will help to justify God in correcting us. And if we be penitent and patient under what we suffer for the sins of our fathers, we may expect that He who punishes will pity, and soon return in mercy."]

11. Ver. 8. "Here occurs a lesson concerning slavery, in reference to which we must hold, that it may be regarded as belonging to the law of nations, but cannot be considered as belonging to the law of nature, because man was created and born for a state of liberty, but slavery is the punishment of sin, as is evident from Gen. ix. 25, where slavery was legally imposed upon Ham, who is, as it were, the patriarch of slaves." FÖRSTER.—[Servants have ruled over us. CLARKE: "To be subject to such is the most painful and dishonorable bondage:—

Quid domini faciant, audent cum talia fures?
Virg. Ecl. iii. 16.

'Since slaves so insolent are grown,
What may not masters do?']

12. Vers. 11-14. "We see by means of a passage relating to the Jews of that same period, when women begin to be haughty and virgins proud, that they are brought to dishonor and shame (Is. iii. 16-24). We see and learn also, when princes and chief men and the nobles in a land and nation boast of their position and worth, what perchance sometimes happens to them on that account. . . . Likewise when the old men or elders in the gates, or in their courts, let every sort of unrighteousness go free and for the sake of reward and gifts pervert the right, and yet will not allow their jurisdiction to be amended, as the elders in Judah would not be rebuked by the Prophets, then we see and learn, what follows thereon, that God lets the court and court-houses at last be reformed by the warriors with the broad axe, that court and judges may be converted, and court-houses lie in dust and ashes.

. . . Further, if the young men make too much of their sports, and young women of their songs and dances, we see and learn that God can cast the instruments of music out of their hands, and change their songs and dances into woful lamentations, as happened to the wilful youth among the Jewish people: to those who, before the Babylonish captivity, treated that matter too lightly, misused their music in their feasts and entertainments, so that the Prophets, Isaiah in his fifteenth chapter, Amos in his sixteenth, as also Jeremiah and others, were compelled to preach against it with all their might. But because their preaching was not heeded, God sent the Babylonians, who stopped their proceedings, so that their pipes fell into the ashes, and their stringed instruments into the dirt, and they at Babylon had to hang up their harps on the willow-trees that were there, as is said in Ps. cxxxvii., and to carry instead of them mill-stones and wood, till they stumbled and fell under their burdens." EOID. HUNNIUS.

13. Ver. 13. "The children fell under the wood. The reason for this, according to our explanation was, because they were unwilling to believe on the Christ hanging on the wood. Hence one of the Apostles says, The cross is foolishness to the Gentiles, and to the Jews a stumbling-block. So then, they fell down under the wood, because they were unwilling to acknowledge that life which hangs upon the wood in order to destroy death." PASCHASIUS in GHISLER., p. 218.

14. Ver. 14. Music. "Music is an unsuitable mode of expression for grief." Another saying of RHABANUS in GHISLER., p. 221. [And one wholly unworthy of repetition; especially impertinent as a comment on a lyrical dirge that sang its sorrows with the accompaniment of musical instruments. The young men gave up their merry, jovial songs, to stand weeping around their aged Prophet, as he poured out the lamentations of the church, in measured cadences, that added the melting pathos of music to his words and helped to relieve their swelling hearts of some of their tumultuous grief.—W. H. H.]

15. Ver. 16. The crown is fallen from our head. "When the church loses the grace of faith, her crowning honor falls from her head, because she exchanges the Lord of glory for the perfidy of falsehood. But that the Lord is indeed the crown of the church, Isaiah testifies, when he says, 'In that day the Lord of hosts shall be a crown of glory and a diadem of joy to the residue of His people' (Is. xxviii. 5). . . . Virtually the crown on our head vanishes, when His good-will is lost. In reference to which the Prophet sings in congratulatory strains, 'With the shield of Thy good-will Thou hast crowned us, O Lord,' Ps. v. 13 (12)." PASCHASIUS. [CALVIN: "By the crown of the head he no doubt understands all those ornaments, by which that people had been adorned. They had a kingdom and priesthood, which were like two luminaries or two precious jewels; they had also other things by which the Lord had adorned them. As, then, they were endued with such excellent things, they are said to have borne a crown on their head. But a crown was not only taken for a diadem,—it was also a symbol of joy and of honor; for not only kings then wore crowns, but men were crowned at weddings and feasts, at games also, and theatres. The Prophet, in a word, complains that though many ornaments did belong to the people, yet now they were denuded of them all: The crown, he says, has fallen from our head."—"We can use this plaint to-day, not inappropriately, with regard to the condition of the Roman empire; and that it may be restored, by Divine favor, to its integrity and splendor, we should devoutly pray." FÖRSTER.

16. Ver. 16. The crown has fallen from our head. "Here arises a question, How can this be reconciled with the promise or prophecy of Jacob, in Gen. xlix. 10? . . . The Rabbins have given it as their opinion, that the prophecy of Jacob must be understood thus,—The sceptre shall not depart from Judah, until the king of Babylon, Nebuchadnezzar, comes, who will cast down the sceptre of Judah. To this we answer, firstly; That their banishment was only a punishment for an inconsiderably short time. . . . Again it happened, that after the Babylonish captivity they had again their own regent in their own country. . . . Besides, God so wonderfully ordered it, that in the midst of the Babylonish captivity this sceptre of Judah made itself plainly visible. Whereas Daniel and his companions, who were of the royal lineage, and also of the house of David, were not only elevated to high position at the Babylonian court, but Daniel was appointed at Babylon one of the chiefest princes over the whole land (Dan. iii.). . . . Add to this, that Jehoiachin, the king of Judah, must be raised up again from the dust, and honored and treated as a king." Egid. HUNNIUS.

17. Ver. 18. [Woe unto us, that we have sinned!] CALVIN: "When we are pressed down by adversities, Satan will excite us to sorrow, and at the same time hurry us on to rage, except this doctrine comes to our minds, that we have to do with God, who is a righteous Judge. For the knowledge of our sins will tame our pride, and also check all those clamorous complaints, which the unbelieving are wont to utter when they rise up against God. Our evils, then, ought to lead us to consider God's judgment and to confess our sins."—SCOTT: "As wasting wars, terrible famines, and heavy oppressions or persecutions come upon nations, for the sins of former and present generations, when their appointed measure of iniquity is filled up: so the accumulating sins of a man's whole life will be punished with tremendous vengeance at last; except he obtain an interest in Him, 'who bare our sins in His own body on the tree.' The wrath of God turns the sinner's mirth into mourning, his liberty into bondage, and his honor into disgrace: for this the crown is fallen from our heads, and woe unto us that we have sinned!"

18. Ver. 17. "Rightly is the heart said to be made sorrowful on account of sin, because where iniquity takes possession of the heart and burdens it, it is no longer the habitation of the Holy Spirit; but the whole mind is obscured by the mist of sin, while the grace of the Most High Paraclete disdains to shed abroad its enlightening influences in that mind. For the Holy Spirit of knowledge flees from deception (factum, i. e. facturam, fraudem), and wisdom will not enter a malevolent soul." RHABANUS, in GHISLER., p. 221.

19. Ver. 18. The foxes walk upon it.—"The same fate which Mount Zion formerly experienced, many Mount Zions, i. e. churches, experience to-day, which a few years ago were enthusiastically devoted to the Lutheran faith, but now, alas for their wretchedness! the foxes run about them destroying the vineyards (Cant. ii. 15)." FÖRSTER.

20. Vers. 19-21. "After Jeremiah has related copiously and in detail all his own sorrows and those of his people, he closes at last with a prayer, to be a lesson to us, that we should do likewise. And as Jeremiah did not permit himself to be deterred from prayer by his own sins and those of the people, which were more in number than the sands of the sea, nor frightened from it by the grievous wrath of God; so we also, neither on account of our sins, nor yet because of the wrath of God, should restrain prayer." Würtemb. Summarien.

21. Ver. 19. Thou, O LORD, remainest forever. "His is an eternal continuance. But that Being (Esse) which exists, is that Being (Esse), in which the Father in the Son and the Son in the Father exist, so that they have a common eternity and are essentially one forever." PASCHASIUS in GHISLER., p. 223. [FAUSSET: "(Ps. cii. 12). The perpetuity of God's rule over human affairs, however He may seem to let His people be oppressed for a time, is their ground of hope of restoration."—CALVIN: "When we fix our eyes on present things, we must necessarily vacillate, as there is nothing permanent in the world; and when adversities bring a cloud over our eyes, then faith in a manner vanishes, at least we are troubled and stand amazed. Now the remedy is, to raise up our eyes to God, for however confounded things may be in the world, yet He remains always the same. His truth may indeed be hidden from us, yet it remains in Him. In short, were the world to change and perish a hundred times, nothing could ever affect the immutability of God. There is, then, no doubt but that the Prophet wished to take courage and to raise himself up to a firm hope, when he exclaimed, 'Thou, O God, remainest forever.' By the word sitting or remaining, he doubtless meant that the world is governed by God. We know that God has no body, but the word sitting is to be taken metaphorically, for He is no God except He be the Judge of the world."]

22. Ver. 19. [Thy throne from generation to generation.] CALVIN: "The throne of God designates the government of the world. But if God be the Judge of the world, then He doeth nothing, or suffereth nothing to be done, but according to His supreme wisdom and justice. . . . The throne of God is set in opposition to chance or uncertain changes which ungodly men dream of; for when they see things in great confusion in the world, they say that it is the wheel of fortune, they say that all things happen through blind fate. Then the Prophet, that he might not be cast down with the unbelieving, refers to the throne of God, and strengthens himself in this doctrine of true religion,—that God nevertheless sits on this throne, though things are thus confounded, though all things fluctuate; yes, even though storms and tempests mingle as it were heaven and earth together, yet God sits on His throne amid all these disturbances. However turbulent, then, all the elements may be, this derogates nothing from the righteous and perpetual judgment of God. This is the meaning of the words; and hence fruit and benefit may be easily gathered."]

23. Ver. 20. Wherefore dost Thou forget us forever? "Not that God could have lost the treasures of memory or of knowledge; but because He delays, on account of some hidden purpose, to render aid immediately, while He seems to condemn those who pray to Him and offers no consolation to their hearts. . . . By reason of human frailty, the mind burdened with troubles thinks God forgetful. For forgetfulness closes the fountain of charity, quickly takes away the faculty of compassion, blunts the edge of the grace that is to be conferred, and does not allow immediate assistance to those who are placed in misery." PASCHASIUS in GHISLER., p. 224. [CALVIN: "He seems here to expostulate with God; but the faithful, even when they patiently bear their evils, and submit to God's scourges, do yet familiarly deposit their complaints in His bosom, and thus unburden themselves. We see that David prayed, and no doubt by the real impulse of the Spirit, and at the same time expostulated, 'Why dost Thou forget me perpetually?' Ps. xiii. 1. Nor is there a doubt but that the Prophet took this complaint from David. Let us, then, know, that though the faithful sometimes take this liberty of expostulating with God, yet they do not put off reverence, modesty, submission, or humility. For when the Prophet thus inquired why God should forever forget His people and forsake them, he no doubt relied on his own prophecies, which he knew had proceeded from God, and thus he deferred his hope until the end of the seventy years, for that time had been prefixed by God. But it was according to human judgment that he complained in his own person and in that of the faithful, that the affliction was long; nor is there a doubt but that he dictated this form of prayer to the faithful, that it might be retained after his death. He, then, formed this prayer, not only according to his own feeling, and for the direction of those of his own age; but his purpose was to supply the faithful with a prayer after his own death, so that they might flee to the mercy of God. We now, then, perceive how complaints of this kind ought to be understood, when the prophets asked 'How long?' as though they stimulated God to hasten the time; for it cannot be, when we are pressed down by many evils, but that we wish help to be accelerated; for faith does not wholly strip us of all cares and anxieties. But when we thus pray, let us remember that our times are at the will and in the hand of God, and that we ought not to hasten too much. It is, then, lawful for us on the one hand to ask God to hasten; but, on the other hand, we ought to check our impatience and wait until the suitable time comes. Both these things the Prophet no doubt joined together when he said, Why shouldst Thou perpetually forget us and forsake us?"]

24. Vers. 21, 22. "Since the people in their prayer longed so earnestly for their fatherland, that they might be permitted to return home again, we should take example from this, in what fashion we should yearn after the heavenly fatherland, out of which we have been driven by sin and transgression, and thrust into this empty Babylon of a sinful world. . . . In Ps. cxvi. the unspeakably great joy is described, which the Jews will experience when they return again into their fatherland, out of the Babylonish house of slavery and imprisonment. . . . If the people of God so rejoiced and exulted with loud shouts of joy, over the return to their earthly fatherland, how much greater joy there will be, when the elect are actually in the great blessed home-gathering, brought into the eternal, imperishable Jerusalem." EOID. HUNNIUS.

25. Ver. 21. "Whom the Lord hath converted, that one will assuredly be saved, 'but whom He hath despised, no man can correct,' Eccl. vii. 13 [Vulg.]. But when he says, Renew our days as from the beginning, he seems to ask this, that as from the beginning He made the first Patriarchs, Abraham, Isaac and Jacob devoted to Himself in the plenitude of their faith and love, that He would therefore make them [who offered this prayer] also faithful and devoted to Himself, by bestowing upon them the same gifts, which was promised to them in the advent of Elias, by the Prophet Malachi, as many think (Mal. iv. 5)." RHABANUS in GHISLER., p. 224.

26. Ver. 21. Turn Thou us unto Thee. "Except by grace no backslider can be converted; because it is of ourselves that we have fallen, but of God that we rise again." PASCHASIUS in GHISLER., p. 224. [HENRY: "They here pray for converting grace, to prepare and qualify them for mercy; Turn us to Thee, O Lord. This implies an acknowledgment of their own weakness and inability to turn themselves, and that the cause of their distance was in themselves. There is in our nature a bent to backslide from God, but no disposition to return to Him, till His grace works in us both to will and to do. So necessary is that grace, that we may truly say, Turn us, or we shall wander endlessly; and so powerful and effectual is that grace, that we may as truly say, Turn us and we shall be turned; for it is a day of Almighty power, in which God's people are made willing and obedient."] And we shall be turned. "When we are converted, we are recalled to the beginning of renovation; but when that is attained, we will be renewed." PASCHASIUS in GHISLER., p. 224. Renew our days as of old. "God has been ready to change His sentence, if thou hadst been willing to change thy wickedness by penitence." AMBROSE on Luke, in FÖRSTER. [WILLIAM LOWTH: "Do Thou give us the grace of conversion and amendment, and then Thou wilt remove Thy heavy judgments, and restore us to that happiness and prosperity which we formerly enjoyed."]

27. Ver. 22. "He did not utter these words as if despairing of the salvation of his people, but that he might manifest his excessive grief on account of the prolonged humiliation and rejection of his nation. For he saw by the Spirit of prophecy, that the Jews themselves, at the advent of Christ, would not believe. . . . But of the ultimate conversion of his nation he entertained no doubt,—but believed most fully that in the seed of Abraham all the families of the earth would be blessed; in which universal promise themselves also are certainly comprehended." RHABANUS in GHISLER.

28. Ver. 22. "As long as we wander here in this world, we shall be called upon to observe the condition of the condemned and lost, and when we see it, we will indeed mourn over it. Yet the Church of Christ is everywhere to be found, if men seek her, and she triumphs over all death. In her also many ages perish; we shall mourn for her in time, but will be comforted in eternity, for our mother is that Jerusalem, which is from above, which is free. She is eternal, and those who here suffer for sin and have comfort only in grace, they are citizens of that eternal city." DICKRICH. [SCOTT: "Though we should mourn over the miseries of the world, and the low estate of the Church, yet the true Zion, to which believers are come, cannot be desolated, but remaineth for ever, even as the throne of our God in Heaven. This inheritance cannot be forfeited or alienated; nor can our mansions be possessed by strangers; or our relation to God, as espoused and adopted into His family, abrogated; or the liberty, wherewith Christ hath made us free, taken from us; the freeness of our salvation, disannulled; or our joy and glorying in Christ, made void. Various tribulations may make our hearts faint and our eyes dim: but our way to the mercy-seat of our reconciled God still is open; and we may beseech Him not to forsake or forget us; and plead with Him to turn, and renew us more and more by His grace; that our hopes may revive and our consolations abound as in the days of old. For the eternal and unchangeable God will not utterly reject His Church or any true believer, whatever our trials, fears or lamentations may be. Let us then, in all our troubles, put our whole trust and confidence in His mercy; let us confess our sins, and pour out our hearts before Him; and let us watch against repinings or despondency, whatever we suffer, or witness of the troubles of our brethren; for this we surely know, that it shall be well in the event with all who trust, fear, love and serve the Lord."]

29. [Prayer. CALVIN: "Grant, Almighty God, that as Thou didst formerly execute judgment so severe on Thy people.—O grant, that these chastisements may at this day teach us to fear Thy Name, and also keep us in watchfulness and humility, and that we may so strive to pursue the course of our calling, that we may find that Thou art always our leader, that Thy hand is stretched forth to us, that Thy aid is ever ready for us, until, being at length gathered into Thy celestial kingdom, we shall enjoy that eternal life, which Thine only-begotten Son has obtained for us by His own blood. Amen."]

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

1. Ver. 1. If we say. Remember, O LORD, consider and behold, this supposes that the Lord can, in some way, forget something or not see it. But in fact He is omniscient and omnipresent. If then He sometimes, in some way, seems not to know or to see something, this is to be regarded as a test (Prüfung) imposed upon us. He would then be awakened, as it were, He would be urged to think of these things and to look upon them. This reserve on the part of God has a twofold design. He would thereby, first of all, bring us to a knowledge of ourselves. For then only will we urge another, who will not hear us, with unceasing importunity, to render us assistance, when we find that we have not in ourselves, even with our utmost exertion, the means of relief. Secondly, God would thereby prove our faith. Compare the parables of the unjust Judge (Luke xviii. 2-8) and of the friend who knocks at midnight (Luke xi. 5-10). On this text, therefore, a sermon might be preached with reference to The wise purposes which God has in view, when He long closes His ears to our prayer. He would by this means, 1. lead us to self-knowledge; 2. try the strength of our faith.

2. Vers. 1-7. These verses would afford a text, in times of severe chastisement by the hand of foreign enemies, for a sermon on the theme, The cry of need of a people severely oppressed by an enemy. 1. This is a cry justified by the facts (vers. 2-6). 2. A penitential cry (ver. 7). 3. A believing cry (ver. 1).

3. Vers. 8-16. On these verses also a sermon could be preached in the days of a great national calamity brought about by the oppression of the public enemy. The thought might be extracted from these verses, that the separate items of suffering correspond with the sins that have been perpetrated (per quod quis peccat, per idem puniuntur et ipse, Wisdom of Sol. xi. 16). Theme: The just judgments of God. I. What they consist in. 1. Because we allowed ourselves to be ruled by our sins, now servants rule over us. 2. Because we despised the bread of life, which was freely and generously proffered to us, we must ourselves seek, with great difficulty, to get our daily bread. 3. Because we hungered not after righteousness, we must now suffer great pain from bodily hunger. 4. Because we crucified not our lust and passions, our wives and daughters are become the victims of the lusts of others. 5. Because we honored not our old men and rulers, our Princes and Elders are now ill-treated by foreigners. 6. Because the youths and boys would not bear the easy yoke of the Lord, they must now bear the heavy yoke of our enemies. 7. Because old and young had been too much addicted to worldly pleasure, they must now relinquish all joy, even that which in itself is innocent and allowable (vers. 14, 15). 8. Because we have not striven after the crown of life, the crown of earthly honor is dashed from our head. II. Where to they should exhort us. 1. To genuine lamentation over our sins. 2. To believing invocation of Divine grace and mercy.

4. Vers. 15, 16. FÖRSTER remarks, "These verses afford material for an address to be delivered in a time of public mourning, or at the funeral of a prince or any man of illustrious merit in the commonwealth, either ecclesiastical or civil."

5. Vers. 17-22. In times of great internal or external distress of the church, these words would afford a text for a sermon, and the theme thence deduced is, The complaint and consolation of the Church. I. The complaint. 1. The cause of it (ver. 18). 2. The expression of it (ver. 17). II. The consolation. 1. The power of the Lord of the Church is not shaken. 2. He has not rejected His Church forever, but will re-establish it, (a) inwardly, (b) externally.

6. Vers. 21, 22, and iii. 24-26, preached upon by CUNO MAURICE ZIMMERMANN, when pastor in Döbeln; How God the Lord renews His Church. 1. Behold with adoration and thanksgiving how He did it in the days of Luther. 2. Behold with rapture and obedience, how He does it in our day. In "My last six official sermons in Döbeln, in the year 1863." Leipzig, Teubner, 1864.

LANGUAGE AND THE STUDY OF LANGUAGE.

TWELVE LECTURES ON THE PRINCIPLES OF LINGUISTIC SCIENCE.

By WILLIAM DWIGHT WHITNEY, Professor of Sanskrit and Comparative Philology in Yale College. New Edition with Analysis. One vol., crown 8vo, cloth, $2.50

From the New York Times.

"This work of Professor Whitney is one of unusual interest, which will afford to the general reader a better survey than he can elsewhere find of the present state of linguistic science, and it is also full of original and profound conclusions respecting the nature and office of human speech. By its perusal, an intelligent reader will of necessity be quickened to higher intellectual action, while the facts and principles he will learn will be suggestive and fruitful in all future studies respecting the character and history of man."

ORIENTAL AND LINGUISTIC STUDIES.

FIRST SERIES.

THE VEDA, THE AVES TA, THE SCIENCE OF LANGUAGE. By Prof. W. D. WHITNEY, of Yale College. One vol., crown 8vo, cloth, . . . $2.50

From the Atlantic Monthly.

"We would warmly recommend this book to teachers and students, and to all who take any interest in the condition of one of the most fascinating of sciences. We trust that the author will fulfil his half promise of giving us another volume; there is no superfluity of such books in the American market, nor in any market, for the matter of that."

ORIENTAL AND LINGUISTIC STUDIES.

SECOND SERIES.

THE EAST AND WEST; RELIGION AND MYTHOLOGY; ORTHOGRAPHY AND PHONOLOGY; HINDU ASTRONOMY. By Prof. W. D. WHITNEY, of Yale College. One vol., crown 8vo, cloth, . . . $2.50

From the Providence Journal.

"We feel assured this volume will receive a glad welcome from scholars, and we hope the author may be moved to follow it up with a third. He will ever find an audience ready to listen to whatever he may think worthy of being said, especially on matters pertaining to language."

Three Important Theological Works.

THE PARACLETE:

An Essay on the Personality and Ministry of the Holy Ghost, with some Reference to Current Discussions.

By JOSEPH PARKER, D.D., Author of "ECCE DEUS," etc. One vol., 12mo, cloth, $1.50

From the Church Journal.

"It is written in a warm, devout, earnest manner, with much power of reasoning and wealth of illustration, and very much suggestiveness, as though the author were rather burdened with the amount he had to say and used necessary repression. The introduction, and the essays reviewing Mr. Huxley, at the end, are perhaps the best parts of the book."

MODERN DOUBT AND CHRISTIAN BELIEF.

A SERIES OF APOLOGETIC LECTURES ADDRESSED TO EARNEST SEEKERS AFTER TRUTH. By THEODORE CHRISTLIEB, University Preacher and Professor of Theology at Bonn. One vol., 8vo, cloth, . . . $3.00

From the Presbyterian.

"One rises from the reading of this volume with mind and heart expanded and enriched, feeling that he has seen the gigantic and imposing structure of skepticism shattered and the solid rock of Divine truth disclosed. He knows not which to admire most—the author's wide and thorough research, the exhaustiveness of his discussion, his even-balanced and judicial impartiality, or his clear and finished style. Every minister and every lay student of theology needs the work, and no one who saw and heard its gifted author while in this country will need urging to procure it."

THE SUPERHUMAN ORIGIN OF THE BIBLE

INFERRED FROM ITSELF.

By HENRY ROGERS, Author of "THE ECLIPSE OF FAITH," etc. One vol. 12mo, cloth, . . . $2.00

From the Congregationalist.

"Mr. Rogers has constructed a volume which is to outlive all his other writings. It is an instructive, stimulating, well-compacted book. Most of the considerations which he has marshaled in proof of his thesis have been presented by others, some of them with greater fulness and equal brilliancy. He has brought together what has been scattered in many treatises. He has freshened familiar illustrations and welded into many common proofs, so that they carry a new persuasiveness, and he has added not a few subtle and suggestive and most satisfactory illustrations of the wonderful nature of that Word which abideth."
